Well, now, if I had continued my Sunday walk into Monday and into Wall Street, or other busy quarters of the city, I should have seen O, and in fact all the letters of the alphabet, as busy as they could be in their various occupations. I should have seen the eager Omicron leaving his family at eight o'clock in the morning to be gone all day, barely sparing himself half an hour for lunch, steadily intent upon his work, and not relaxing his hold until sunset. I should have followed him, possibly, in the carriage adorned with large O's, into the gate-posts of his villa similarly decorated, and I should have seen him giving a few minutes to his children before they went to bed and he went to dinner. I should have multiplied this by six and have had his weekly life before me, with the Sunday relaxation of a drive with the children and a few friends to an earlier dinner. Suddenly, if I had continued my walk long enough and far enough, I should have seen a dropping of the capital O, a fit, a paralysis, an apoplexy, and then the newspapers would "regret to state that Belah Omicron, well known in financial circles, lies in a very critical condition." After a few months the loiterers at Greenwood, or in some quiet country churchyard, would see a new head-stone with a very large O cut on it. Would it mean merely finis, zero, cipher—nothing?

Now that is what I call letting your name stand for riches only. Who wants to be Midas? When Oliver Goldsmith died there was not money enough in his purse, I imagine, to pay for a coffin. But the poor women, his neighbors, sat on the stairs crying. That capital G, it seems, stood for goodness. If Bellamy died I don't believe any body would think that a rich man was dead. Every body would say that a good man was gone. And yet I am sure that Omicron does not think of this. He does not even know that people come into that fine gateway and laugh at the huge O upon the posts, and eat his O dinners from his O silver, and see all the O magnificence, and yet laugh and joke about Omicron and his ridiculous O's all the time. I don't say that they are any better than he, and I have no doubt he has his laugh in turn at their letter in the alphabet. Do you suppose, my dearest Pythagoras, the girls who distort their figures into what is called the Grecian bend do not laugh at each other? It seems to me women dress mainly to provoke each other's criticism. Do you remark how jealously every woman studies the dress of every other? We men have the same kind of contest in different ways. When Omicron altered the pretty villa which he bought he had Kappa's in mind, or Mu's or Nu's, and he resolved that his should be a little finer.

Some men, I have observed, write their initial letter over their whole lives, not only upon their gate-posts and note-paper. Indeed, not only upon their lives, but upon their very persons. There is Gregory Gumbo—he decorates his face with an enormous G. It isn't goodness in his case; for as twenty-four letters have to do all the spelling in the language, they each begin a great many and very different words. Just now in Goldsmith's case—the dear, pensive poet, the sweet, genial soul, Goldy, who seems so personally known to all of us—G stood for goodness. But in Gumbo's it stands for Glutton. When Peter Paul Pry sees Gumbo's hammer-cloth, he says, "Certainly I see it, Greedy. But why embroider the fact? Is it so pretty that it must be told in scarlet?" Greedy and Glutton, yes, and if it were in soups and gravies only, it would be tolerable. But he is greedy of other people's rights and feelings. Do you know Mrs. Gumbo? Poor cadaverous lady! She is the mere sparerib of a cannibal. Gumbo consumes the comfort and happiness of his wife, as well as venison steaks and truffled turkeys. And the whole world sees it. He complacently carves G for Gumbo all over his silver, and he has also involuntarily carved G for Glutton all over his life.

The mischief of this business of ciphers is that they will not conform to the intention while they do conform to the fact. Omicron means that his great O's shall express the name Omicron, but they do not. All his O's, to any body who knows the family history, as I do, always stand for C, for Clynche—Cephas Clynche, the old miser of Boppart on the Kennebec. I remember Clynche. Every body who has been in Boppart knew him. He used to trudge about the streets, and turn over scraps of paper with the point of his cane, and pick up pieces of orange-peel, and was never known to do a generous deed or utter a human sympathy. He screwed, and squeezed, and starved, and accumulated a great fortune. I wish it had gone into good hands, but Providence gave it to Omicron. Now all his O's can not hide that repulsive original C. If old C ever revisits the glimpses of the moon, how he must sneer and sniff as he sees all his savings labeled O! Does he think, also, in that other sphere that the gate-posts tell the truth, and that all his enormous savings have truly amounted to O, cipher, zero, nothing?

Yes, my dear Pythagoras, when you resolve to put a great P upon your household utensils, and upon the bright trappings of your carriage, don't forget that there is many an old Bachelor plodding along upon the side of the road who will certainly ask what P stands for, and being told that it is Pythagoras, will immediately demand, "And what does Pythagoras stand for?" Indeed, that is the only question worth answering, and it is worth while to answer it well. The significance of the letter may be various, but that of the man is not. G stands for Goldsmith and Gumbo, but Goldsmith and Gumbo stand for one kind of man only. On the whole, if I were you, I wouldn't carve my initial upon a gate-post. To be sure, Napoleon used to have a huge N every where about his palaces. But he contrived to put his mark in other places too.

Your steady pedestrian,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

FASHIONS FOR GENTLEMEN.

FULL DRESS.

THERE are but few new features to report in the shape and general appearance of gentlemen's clothing. The standard style for full dress is substantially the same as that given at our last quotation, viz., black dress-coat with full collar rolling low, white vest, or of the material of the coat, and black doeskin pantaloons. The English fashion of blue coat and white vest, with lavender pantaloons and gloves, has been seen at some fashionable entertainments of late, and will be more generally adopted during the winter by gay young gentlemen.

An effort is being made in England to alter the whole character of evening attire, taking away its resemblance to a livery and making it more varied, and in better keeping with the picturesque toilettes in vogue for ladies. The design is a coat with broad collar rolling low, and meeting the front edge of the skirt. The vest is white, or of black cassimere embroidered, open to the waist, and displaying an elaborate shirt front, trimmed with narrow ruffles and embroidery. Gray or drab trowsers complete the costume. By way of variety velvet and rich blue cloth with mounted gilt buttons are suggested for coats, and even ruffles at the wrist are talked about. We give the rumor as it has reached us. If this style is adopted abroad it will soon become popular here, as gentlemen have long been weary of the monotonous and sombre dress prescribed for them on the most joyous occasions.

WALKING DRESS.

The fashionable walking suit is a short double-breasted frock-coat made of diagonally ribbed coating or of plain dark cloth. Vest of the same material, with broad collar rolled to suit the shape of the coat. Gray or drab pantaloons with diagonal stripes, or of a solid color with a side stripe of darker shade. Pantaloons still fit closely, but are cut wider at the ankle, giving the necessary spring over the boot. Suits of black cloth made in this manner are chosen for visiting. The coat, in this instance, is single-breasted, with wide roll. For business purposes the entire suit is of heavy Scotch goods, a dark brown dashed with a lighter shade. Later in the season the sack of Elysian beaver will be worn. It is short, double-breasted, and square in front. The vest is buttoned high and worn with a scarf. A more fanciful shape has the collar, rolled to the waist with vest to match.

OVER-COATS.

The fall over-coat is a loose sack of light drab or tan-colored cloth, with wide dark facing of silk on the roll in front. A closely-fitting surcoat, made moderately long, will be worn in winter. It is of Elysian beaver, a thick warm cloth with rough surface, but as soft as flannel. Brown, dark claret, and blue are the colors.

RIDING AND HUNTING JACKETS.

Short coats for riding are single-breasted, buttoned up high on the chest, and cut away at the waist to show the waistcoat. Tight corduroy pantaloons. Hunting jackets are long-waisted, with short skirts with a printed border or stripe around the garment. A pouch-pocket is outside each breast. Easy fitting pantaloons faced with leather to resist the brambles and mud.

LOUNGE JACKETS.

Billiard and smoking jackets are short sacks of gray cloth, lined with purple, crimson, or green flannel, trimmed with soutache the color of the lining. Smoking caps to match are cut in very narrow gores, braided with gilt. A long tassel droops from the centre.

Serviceable dressing-gowns are made of dark gray woolen serge, wadded and lined with delaine. Outside facings of green silk stitched in small diamonds with gold-colored silk. A silk cord, gold and green, edges the garment. Heavy cord and tassels at the waist. Soft cashmere, and Empress cloth in cashmere patterns, are made into handsome robes, and faced with satin.

The Cardigan jackets of ribbed wool are shown for office wear, or as extra street wrapping over the vest. A handsome one with wide fur border, called the Magyar, is marked $22.

SHIRTS.

Heavy linen with coarse threads is chosen for shirts for ordinary day use. Thin fine linen soon becomes flimsy. The broad pleats are still in favor, and plain linen doubled and shaped at the sides to prevent breaking. The style for full dress is of fine linen lawn with a delicate vine of embroidery in the centre, or medallions around the studs. An elaborate pattern for a bridegroom has two rows of fine needle-work made to simulate revers. Collar and cuffs embroidered to match. Embroidered fronts are sold singly at from $5 to $12. Half a dozen shirts neatly made and fitted, with muslin bodies and fancy pleated bosoms, cost $30. A plainer set of good materials is $20.

COLLARS AND CUFFS.

Collars are detached from shirts, and shown in a variety of shapes. The popular turned down collar, called the Faust, has rounded corners, similar to the Dickens shape. Several cords are stitched on the edge, or a narrow bias band forms a border. The Pall Mall standing collar, square in front, worn with a sailor's scarf, is a favorite style with young gentlemen. The "Wallace" has the points broken at the throat. Cuffs are square and wide, with cords and bands stitched to suit the collar.

UNDER-WEAR.

The merino underwear, manufactured by the Norfolk and New Brunswick Company, is fast superseding the English goods. These garments are shaped automatically by machinery, dispensing with clumsy gores. The seams are flat and smooth, and the material is beautifully fine and soft. They are also much cheaper than imported goods. Under-vests of American manufacture, retailed at $3 50, are of better quality and shape than a foreign article sold at $5.

The Patent Pantaloon Drawers, of linen, muslin, and flannel, are made in the neatest manner possible. They are gored in an original way at the waist and ankle, that makes them conform to the figure, and fit perfectly. The Shield under-shirt, of Canton flannel, is comfortable for delicate persons, as it has a double front, which serves as a protection to the chest.

NECK-TIES, ETC.

The neck-tie most worn is folded to resemble a sailor's scarf. It is of plain reps of quiet colors, or in diagonal stripes. It is known both as the Wallace and the Opera scarf. The Lord Stanley scarf, in broad folds, concealing the shirt-front, is popular for street wear. Tartan plaids, chameleons, and the gay Roman scarfs of rainbow stripes are worn now by fastidious gentlemen who have hitherto avoided high colors. Young gentlemen of nautical tastes wear the yacht handkerchief—a square of blue silk, bordered with white, folded around the neck, forming a loose sailor's knot at the throat. A good idea is a combination of neck-tie and watch-guard called the Norwood.

Evening ties are of white lawn, lavender satin, or black gros grain. White satin is reserved for bridegrooms.

Golden brown and maroon are the fashionable colors for gloves. Dog-skin gloves are preferred to kid for street wear. They are more durable, and cost only a trifle more. The Laporte glove, lately introduced here, is already sought after. It has great elasticity, is of good shape, and is well made, attention being paid to the smallest details. An excellent seamless glove of the same manufacture is shown. The serviceable black kids are faced inside with white, to prevent the wrist from being stained. A novel glove-button is shown that may be attached to any glove. It is in gilt, silver, and jet. Glove-powder, or Hygienique, used to facilitate putting on a new glove, is said to soften and bleach the hands.

Negligée handkerchiefs, just imported, have hems only half an inch wide, striped with hair-lines of cerise, blue, or purple. Others have solid-colored hems, either tan or maroon. Sheer linen, with wide hem and monogram, is selected for more dressy occasions.

SHOES AND BOOTS.

Buttoned and laced shoes are more fashionable than boots for street wear. The shoe is in the full English shape, with stout soles and low broad heels. The design is not to make the foot look small, but symmetrical.

For evening, gaiters will be worn made of light calf-skin cut all in one piece, with elastic sides. The tongue-boot of fine calf-skin, with light soles and morocco legs, is considered full-dress, though boots are objectionable with the present scant trowsers. Patent leather is but little used.

HATS.

The fashionable silk hat has a medium crown slightly bell-shaped, with a two-inch brim curved at the sides. Cashmere under the brim. A new felt hat, introduced by a leading house, is called the Alpine. It is shaped like the army hat on a smaller scale. The crown is carelessly dented in the middle. The wide ribbon band has a bow at the side.

FASHIONS IN CARDS.

Visiting cards for the coming season are of unglazed card board, large and almost square. Tinted cards, especially buff, are fashionable. The lettering is in old English text, or in script. The expense of fifty cards is $3 50. The plate is then given to the owner. Extra cards are furnished at $2 a hundred.

One corner of the card is turned down to denote the object of the visit. In different cities a different signification is attached to these broken cards. We give the custom of New York society. On the left hand upper corner the word Visite is engraved on the reverse side. This corner is turned down, displaying the word on the front of the card to signify that an ordinary call is made. On the right hand corner is Felicitation, to be used when making a visit of congratulation on some happy event, such as a marriage, or the birth of a child. On the left lower side is Congé, or Good-by. The remaining corner is marked Condolence.

WEDDING INVITATIONS.

All abbreviations in invitations, such as eve. for evening, Jan. for January, are in bad taste. If there is sufficient room on the card the day of the month and the hour of the entertainment should be written out. Invitations to ceremonial weddings consist of a square note-sheet embellished with a white monogram of the initials of the bride and groom, containing the invitations to the church at a specified hour. Inside this is the "At Home" card, inviting to the house immediately after the ceremony, the cards of the bride and groom united by a satin tie, and still another announcing reception days in the month following. These are inclosed in a large square envelope, adorned with a monogram.

A plainer style has the "At Home" on a note-sheet inclosing a ceremony card and cards of the bride and groom. A simple formula for a quiet wedding at home is as follows:

Mr. and Mrs. Black

Request the Pleasure of your Company at Breakfast on THURSDAY, APRIL 2, 1 O'CLOCK.
999 West Third Street.

Cards of the bride and groom are inclosed.

ANNIVERSARIES.

Invitations issued to the wooden wedding, celebrated on the fifth anniversary of the marriage, are engraved on cards of wood as thin as Bristol-board. The date of the marriage and of the anniversary are given. The form is

WOODEN WEDDING.

1863 AND 1868.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles J. White,

At Home,

WEDNESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 7,

AT 8 O'CLOCK.

(R.S.V.P.)

Another style has "Fifth Anniversary" for the caption, and "receive their friends" instead of At Home. The tin wedding, celebrated on the tenth anniversary, is announced on sheets of tin; crystallized cards are for the fifteenth year, or crystal wedding. The silver wedding, celebrated twenty-five years after marriage, requires a silvered note-sheet, with monograms stamped in silver; the golden wedding, on the fiftieth anniversary, has the monogram and lettering in gold-leaf. The approved form, headed with a monogram, is as follows:

GOLDEN WEDDING.

Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Smith,

1818. At Home, 1868.

Monday Evening, September 20, from 8 until 11 o'clock.

R. J. SMITH. SOPHIA JOHNSON.

GENERAL INVITATIONS.

The simplest forms are in best taste for general invitations. The formulas given are varied to suit déjeuner, dinner, or reception.

Mrs. Thompson,

At Home,

WEDNESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 5,

999 Fifth Avenue.

Catillon at 10.

Or this:

SOIREE DANSANTE.

Mr. and Mrs. Day

Evening at 9 o'clock.

(R.S.V.P.) 999 FOURTH STREET.

An afternoon wedding reception was announced:

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Robinson

Request the Pleasure of your Company at the Wedding

Reception of their daughter, on WEDNESDAY APRIL 15, FROM 2 UNTIL 4 O'CLOCK.

At private dinners, conducted with great ceremony, the menu, or list of dishes, is laid at each plate. An illuminated monogram is engraved at the top of the page. The list of the dishes is usually written. An illuminated and perfumed card, laid on each plate to designate the seats of the guests, has grotesque figures and chubby cherubs bearing aloft a scroll on which the name of the guest is written. A tasteful plate card is of plain white edged with scarlet. Bon appetit in red letters is engraved above the name of the guest.

ACCEPTANCE AND REGRET.

When invitations are marked R. S. V. P., or reply if you please, etiquette requires a prompt answer. Engraved notes of acceptance and regret contain the skeleton reply with spaces for names. These are sold at twenty-five cents a dozen, with envelopes to match. If the invitation is accepted, the form is:

Mr. Jenkins's Compliments to

MR. AND MRS. CHARLES J. WHITE,

Accepting with Pleasure their kind Invitation for Wednesday Evening.

If regrets are necessary, "regretting the necessity to decline" is substituted.

MONOGRAMS AND STATIONERY.

We are often asked the expense of cutting monograms. Large white bridal monograms of the initials of the last name of the bride and groom cost $8. Smaller monograms for stationery are from $4 to $6. Two white letters are $4; two colored letters $5; three letters $6. The die is then given to the purchaser for future use. The same die may be used for illuminated letters, which cost a trifle more.

French figured paper, large and almost square, is the fashionable stationery. It has delicate tracings of lines sufficient to guide without hampering the writer. Real French paper of the best quality is thin but firm and substantial. An imitation of French paper is so thin and flimsy that it is worn out while the letter is being written. The thick English paper is used by gentlemen. Calico paper in bars and stripes is a kind of negligé paper, restricted by etiquette to correspondents who are on terms of great intimacy. The name of country residences in letters of rustic design is placed at the top of note-paper—the monogram in the centre. Illuminated monograms show brilliant colors contrasted with most delicate tints. The first name in full is sometimes placed in the centre. A jockey monogram is formed of whip, horseshoe, buckle, and bit. Croquet monogram of mallet and ball. Would-be-facetious gentlemen have profiles of the Grecian bend on their paper.

For information received thanks are due, for gentlemen's clothing, to Messrs. DEVLIN & Co.; and WILLIAM R. BOWNE; for hats, DUNLAP & Co.; for shoes, G. J. GLAZE; for furnishing goods, FISK, CLARK, & FLAGG; JOHN J. HINCHMAN & Co.; UNION ADAMS; EDWARD H. PURDY; JOHN M. DAVIES; and for cards, JOSEPH N. GIMBREDE.

PERSONAL.

BISHOP ALFORD LEE, of Delaware, who preached the sermon at the opening of the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, now in session in this city, stands sixth on the roll of Bishops. There are thirty-nine his juniors. He was consecrated in 1841, and, with the exception of his immediate predecessor, Bishop WHITTINGHAM, of Maryland, is the oldest graduate among the bishops of the General Theological Seminary. He is an advanced Low Churchman, as much if not more extreme or "evangelical" in his views of Church polity than any of his brethren in the House of Bishops. He is a gentleman of fortune, a scholar, and has a pleasant little diocese to occupy his time with. The sermons before the General Convention are preached by the Bishops in the order of their consecration. Each Bishop, of course, avails himself of the opportunity to ventilate his own peculiar views, which are not, however, to be taken as the expression of the views of the body, or even of that particular party in the Church to which he is attached.

The Princess CLOTILDE, wife of Prince NAPOLEON, and daughter of the King of Italy, is said to be dying of consumption. She is well remembered in New York as being a modest, intelligent, delightful woman, very religious, and a great admirer of the late Rev. Dr. CUMMINGS, at whose church she was a regular attendant. On her return to France the King of Italy acknowledged the many courtesies of Dr. C. to his daughter by conferring upon him, at her request, the Cross of the Knight of the Old Catholic Order of S. S. Mauritius and Lazarus. On the morning of the day on which she sailed she sent to the Doctor a beautiful silver chalice, with an autograph letter, speaking in the warmest terms of all his kindness and services to her.

A young lady of high position in Boston society—Miss FANNY KIMBALL—is about to make her musical debut under the direction of MAX MARETZKE.

Wedding-tours, "with the modern improvements, and all the comforts of a happy home," are becoming quite common with notable people, as in the case of Mr. ROBERT LINCOLN, who recently wedded, at Washington, a daughter of Senator HARLAN. After the ceremony they left in a special car for New York, and partook, on board, of a splendid "spread," prepared by the great Washington caterer, the excellent WORMLEY, jun. You observe, therefore, that no time was lost.

It is announced that the large and valuable library of the late Rev. Dr. RAPHAEL is to be raffled (or raphall'd) for early next month. Tickets $10.

Governor BULLOCK, of Massachusetts, was prominent among the attendants of the recent State Agricultural Fair of that State held at Northampton. Governor BULLOCK is a good man to go to any cattle-show.

A young woman who went out to Russia recently as governess in a Russian family, writes to the London Queen as follows about the better class of people, their acquirements, the weather, and the respect that intelligent people show to those engaged in the business of instruction: "On the whole, as far as I could judge, the Russians are intelligent, generous, and kind-hearted; they generally speak several languages. The salary given to an English governess is almost always a high one, say £100 per annum, and often more. The cold is excessive in Russia for about five or six months. It freezes hard, and fur cloaks are indispensable, I think; but I have heard that English people do not wear more than they would in a cold winter in England. The atmosphere is dry and clear; therefore the climate is not really so trying as it frequently is in England. The summers are as hot as the winters are cold, which has been specially observed during the present summer. The mode of living is not like what we are accustomed to in England, but of course the tables vary according to the habit of the family. My experience is of recent date, having only returned from Russia a year and a half ago. As far as my experience goes, the position of a governess is recognized in a more becoming manner than in England."

To say that fish-culture is not entirely practicable is to doubt the veracity of GEORGE STARK, of Nashua, who is to-day proprietor of 500 trout, weighing from one-half to two and a half pounds each. And, what is better, he has nearly 10,000 fish-eggs already hatched, which are speedily to become speckled, and grow firm, fat, and toothsome for the STARK family.

Mr. SPURGEON is actually coming. A gentleman of this city has heard from him. He is to be here in '69, but whether to preach or lecture is not stated. We reckon to lecture, and take home many pounds sterling. He will be a success. Every Baptist in the country would rush to hear him, regardless, of course, of wet weather or any other damper.

The old legend, that "the Bourbons never learn any thing and never forget any thing," is untrue, as applied to the recently deposed Queen ISABELLA of Spain; for she had learned enough not to invest too much in Spanish securities, but rather to come to the United States and place confidence in 5-20's and Water-Works stock. Possibly she may come over here to live, though, on dit, she has a short temper and a long tongue.

Mr. GEORGE PRABODY, an American by birth, an Englishman by residence, an Irishman and Scotchman during the fishing and hunting months, proposes now to take out naturalization papers in Hungary, having instructed a real estate agent at Pesth to look him up some little estate thereabout worth, say 200,000 florins. He goes to Pesth next year.

The Emperors of France and Austria, and the King of Italy, have just entered the twentieth year of their reign. Twenty years is far beyond the average length of time that any sovereign occupies a throne, and it may be reasonably expected that some change will occur before long.

Miss JOANNA QUINER, a self-taught sculptor, though not very celebrated, died in Lynn, Massachusetts, a few days since. She was visiting in Dr. Bass's family at the Boston Athenæum in 1843, when she was about forty-seven years old, and there saw CLEVERGER modeling in clay. A daughter of DANIEL WEBSTER and another young woman were furnished with clay by CLEVERGER, that they might attempt modeling. On viewing their measure of success, Miss QUINER declared that she could do better. She also was furnished with clay, and at once produced a good likeness of Mrs. Bass.

Admiral FARRAGUT is having an especially good time among the potentates of the Old World. In fact, his whole cruise seems to have been little else than a prolonged jollification. This is what is said of him by an Ostend correspondent of the Paris Univers Illustré: "It did me good to notice how pleasantly the gallant American Admiral (FARRAGUT) smiled at the good-looking Queen of the Belgians when he escorted her all over his magnificent ship. The Queen, on her part, was all smiles and graciousness, and it was evident that she enjoyed the rough but chivalrous politeness of the old sailor ten times as much as the honeyed phrases of the courtiers who had accompanied her on board the American ship; and when she finally left the ship she shook hands with the Admiral so cordially that it was evident the American hero will long preserve a warm place in her Majesty's little heart."

M. EMILE DE CHAMPS, who is soon coming back to these shores to marry a daughter of Mr. PARKER, of Boston, is a young Frenchman of fine natural abilities and great accomplishments. He is the Second Secretary of the Chinese Embassy, which position he gained by his intimate knowledge of the Chinese language, customs, and manners, which he acquired with remarkable rapidity during his residence in China. He was once connected with the American house of AUGUSTINE HEARD & Co. at Shanghai. Young M. DE CHAMPS has had much experience in public affairs, and has every promise of a brilliant future. He graduated at the great University of Sorbonne as early as 1857, receiving the degree of brevet bachelor of arts. He is held in great estimation by Mr. BURLINGAME, who has taken much interest in his approaching nuptials.

Mr. KIT BURNS has consented that his celebrated rat-pit, in Water Street, may be used at certain hours of the day for prayer-meetings, when the terriers are not in conflict with the varmints. Should there be preaching, an appropriate text might be taken from the words, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?"

The British Government have a small elephant in the son of King THEODORE. They know not what to do with him. It would not be creditable to turn the youngster adrift, or make a shoemaker of him, or a news-boy, and it would be scarcely the thing to saddle him as a pensioner on the Government after spending five millions to accomplish the downfall of his father. To keep him permanently in England would also be a mistake, for one section of society would go wild with delight over a king's son, and would soon contrive to render him good for nothing. A plan has therefore been adopted which affords him a career of usefulness, and will probably satisfy his ambition hereafter. He is to be carefully trained for the Indian civil service. He will have to enter through the open gates of competition; but he is said to be a quick boy, and there will be no unusual difficulty in rendering him fit to appear before the examiners. He is to be brought up, it is stated, in the house of a private gentleman.

Captain WILLIAM H. WEST, formerly commander of the Quaker City, of the Savannah steamship line, has entered the service of the Pacific Mail Company, and been placed in charge of the Sacramento, one of the finest vessels in the Pacific.

People in New Hampshire seem to have little else to do than to grow old, as was the case with Mr. LOVERWELL, of Dunstable, who recently "shuffled off," etc., at the age of one hundred and twenty, which is the greatest ever positively known to have been attained by a citizen of that State. WILLIAM PERKINS, of New Market, reached one hundred and sixteen, and ROBERT MACKLIN, of Wakefield, one hundred and fifteen. Mr. P. died in 1732; Mr. M. in 1787. The age of FLORA STEWART, who died recently in Londonderry, is not positively known, but was at least one hundred and eight.

Another young, beautiful, and accomplished American girl is about to "change her local habitation and her name" by marrying, in Paris, an Italian nobleman. The lady is Miss LORILLARD SPENCER, and her intended is Count BOLOGNETTI CENCI, a name which recalls the heroine of so many romances, dramas, and paintings, BEATRICE CENCI, Duchess of San Giuliano.

Sir JOHN YOUNG, the new Governor-General of Canada, is a trained official, of long parliamentary experience, who has filled the offices of Lord of the Treasury, Secretary to the Treasury, Chief Secretary for Ireland, Lord High Commissioner of the Ionian Islands, and, lastly, Governor of New South Wales. He is esteemed one of the "safe" men of the time. In politics he is a Liberal, but has been selected for his present position on the score of superior fitness and ability.

An invalid subscriber inquires whether a writer in the Pall Mall Gazette was justified in attributing to ANDREW MARVELL the authorship of the familiar and beautiful hymn beginning "The spacious firmament on high." ANDREW MARVELL was the writer of the poem, which came to be attributed to ADDISON through the essayist's omission of the author's name when he inserted the lines in a Spectator.

Various Crochet Edgings.

THE edgings given are of different widths, and are worked partly with fine and partly with coarse thread.

Fig. 1 is worked lengthwise. On a foundation of the requisite length crochet, first, one round sc. (single crochet), then one round crossed dc. (double crochet), after each crossed double crochet 2 ch. (chain stitches), Lady's Embroidered Purse.

See illustration on page 837.

THIS elegant purse is made of white silk reps with embroidery in fine colored silk twist. The illustration shows the purse of the full size. The embroidered rays of the central rosette, which is the same on both sides of the purse, are worked in close button-hole stitch with silk in various bright colors, while the knots between are worked alternately with yellow and black silk. The feathered circle which incloses the rosette is worked in one color (violet in the original), either with fine silk in half-polka stitch, or with coarse silk in point russe; it may also be worked with gold tinsel, which must be cut into small pieces of a suitable length, and sewed on in the manner shown by the illustration. The two pieces of silk are joined around the edges with close button-hole stitch of violet silk, with every second stitch of which sew on a gold bead. Line the inside with white leather, and join the top to a bronze clasp with stitches in violet silk; these stitches are covered by sewing on gold beads. The gretel fringe on the edge of this purse is especially beautiful. The loops of the fringe, which are interwoven, are crocheted in white silk, and and afterward embroidered with knots of different colors of silk. The gretots are worked in single crochet over a round piece of wood or a large bead; the darker ones are worked of violet silk, and the smaller ones of white, and all are ornamented with bright colored knots.

Two Embroidered Figures.

BOTH these figures are designed for trimming cravats, blouses, under-clothing, etc. They are worked in satin stitch and raised embroidery.

Bag of Splints and Soutache.

THIS bag is not only very pretty but also very durable. It is made of fine wooden splints, which are woven with violet soutache. The foundation of the bag is eleven inches long and nine inches wide, and is sloped off to the width of six inches at the sides. On this sew or glue the splints, not too close together, and with the ends covered by a strip of violet silk three-fourths of an inch wide. Next weave the splints with violet soutache according to the design given by Fig. 1, a full-sized section of which is shown by Fig. 2. Line this with violet silk, bind the edges with violet ribbon, and join the sides in the manner shown by Fig. 1 with two pieces of violet silk which have been gathered with an elastic cord. Cover the seams with a ruche of violet ribbon three-fourths of an inch wide. Cord and tassels and a button for fastening complete the bag.

bias, and figured netting. Fig. 1 is worked in point de toile and point de reprise; in the centre of the point de reprise star make a cross and wind the threads of the central hole of the netting. Fig. 2 is worked in point de toile, point d'esprit, point de reprise, and button-hole stitch. Fig. 3 is worked on plain netting with coarse thread; it is worked in a kind of double cross stitch. Fig. 4 shows the manner of working this. In the pattern the under part of each stitch is worked with red and the upper part with gray thread. The lower edge of the corresponding lace, Fig. 5, is worked in button-hole stitch. Fig. 6 is worked on bias netting. For the thick points work four squares of the netting with fine thread in point de toile, and work around the edge as shown in the pattern with twist or enameled cotton. The remaining part is done with fine thread, and is sufficiently clear from the illustration. The lace corresponding to this figure is shown by Fig. 7, and is to be worked around the edge in button-hole stitch. The figures, Figs. 8 and 9, are to be worked on figured netting. The manner of netting this was given in No. 42 of Harper's Bazar. The figures on Fig. 8 are in point de reprise; those of Fig. 9 are overcast in the manner shown by the illustration.

DOLLS.

WE have sometimes wondered that more has not been written about Dolls, who are surely very important members of the family. For they are nothing less than the children of the children, of the mothers of the future, who rehearse with them the delights and cares of after-years.

a world, live a life which is more real to them than is their daily existence.

Of these phenomena the first and chief cause is obviously the mother-instinct. Hence the satisfaction of the very young child, whose faculties of observation and comparison are as yet feeble, with the rudest effigies of the human form, and hence the partiality—a touching suggestion of a familiar fact in real life—on the part of older children for the weakest and least-favored of the doll family. Sometimes other feelings, the sense of beauty, for instance, in an unusually early development, comes into conflict with this instinct. So it was with one young lady of our acquaintance. She, being then two years old, had placed her dolls in a row, and among them one, Miss Betsey by name, of preternatural ugliness. She was seen, as she held a spoon with food to the mouths of each of her family in turn, to administer a slap on the face to her ill-favored daughter. A short time, however, wrought a marvelous change. About a year after this event she had placed her little family, after their Saturday wash, to warm before the fire. One who had a delicate India rubber constitution shriveled before the blaze. Returning to them, she caught sight of the horrible face of her once comely child. With a shriek of grief and terror, she ran to her mother, crying, "Take it; don't let me see it again; oh, my poor Mary!" But in the midst of her agony she remembered the others, and mastering her horror of their possible condition, ran off to their rescue, and happily found them unhurt. The injured Mary was sent to the hospital and cured; that is, a facsimile was with infinite difficulty procured. Happily it had a little scar on its neck, which passed as the remains of hospital treatment and cure. Another epoch in the child's moral growth was marked by a catastrophe which happened to a later favorite. "Katie" had her cheek torn open by the mischievous fingers of her baby brother. Too old now to be imposed upon by offers of hospital cure, the child wept inconsolably for days. Alarmed at the violence of her grief, her mother attempted consolation. She should have a new doll, the image of that which she had lost. With a reproachful glance, the child said, still weeping bitterly, "Oh, it will never be my own, own Katie!" "And," writes the mother, "I felt positively ashamed of myself at having suggested such a thing; I saw that Katie was dead to the child, and that I had wronged her as much as if, instead of burying some woman's dead child and weeping with her over it, I had offered to buy or borrow another baby in its place."

"I was never désillusionnée," writes the friend whom we have quoted before, "because my dolls did not eat. I had a wash of my dolls' clothes every week, and thanked Heaven they did get really dirty. If they would only have worn out as well, every thing would have been perfect. I rubbed the tiny socks very hard and dragged the dolls' shoes on the ground, in the hope I might but once before I died have to darn 'baby's' socks." How genuine and thorough the illusion was in this case may be judged from a little trait which every mother will appreciate. "I never woke in the night without getting up to turn my dolls in their beds." But even so lively an imagination as this did not disdain assistance from without. There was a sister very clever at imitating sounds. "When, at my own request, she would imitate for me a sick or suffering fretting baby, I declare I felt my heart ache, and felt aged and worn with care as I lulled my 'Freddy' or 'Selina' on my lap." We can not refrain from giving one more extract from the letter of our friend, who, we ought, perhaps, to tell our readers, has had from babyhood a passion for books at least equal to her passion for dolls. "I once cried myself nearly ill because my brothers had to perform a surgical operation on my doll. Its winking machine would not go, and total blindness or permanent leer and hopeless squint were threatened. I would not abandon my doll, but, mother-like, stood by while my brothers, with infinite skill, beheaded my baby, and wound up its eyes to go right, and then sewed the head and shoulders on for me. I do not think agony is too violent a word for my grief at the sight which my headless babe presented."

The purely domestic life to which these experiences belong satisfies most children. Some, indeed, like to realize in their dolls the wider interests which are awakened by their reading, to reproduce incidents of travel or of history. "He," said a young lady of our acquaintance, when questioned about the disappearance of a favorite doll—"he has fallen down that crack, but they (the other dolls) don't know it. They think that he has gone to India." We have heard of the niece of a distinguished historian, accustomed to hear of great personages, who identified her dolls with kings and queens, and who, when the Revolution of 1848 occurred, promptly accepted the situation, and treated her Louis Philippe with indignity, as a monarch who could not keep himself upon his throne.

ONLY A BLUNDER.

"DON'T you know of some one who would make me a good wife, Dr. Ellsworth?" Salmon Hayden chewed anxiously on a bit of shaving as he spoke.

"Well, Hayden, I don't know. Can't you find somebody for yourself?" replied Dr. Ellsworth, folding a powder in a bit of blue paper.

"No, Doctor, I can't," answered Hayden, helplessly; "I have been refused so many times I feel rather delicate about trying. If you could do something for me! I should like to get married. It is very difficult finding help, and the best of help don't take that interest a wife would. Why, every thing's at loose ends in my house. Samantha—that's my oldest—she does the best she can; but what do young girls know about planning and contriving?"

"Sure enough," responded the Doctor, feelingly.

Having taken to himself a "child-wife" in his old age, he was supposed to know what "shiftlessness" is.

"And then again," continued the would-be Benedict, rolling the shaving under his tongue, as if it had been a cud of sweet and bitter fancy—"then, again, it costs a sight of money to hire so much. Says I to myself more'n six months ago, says I, 'Salmon Hayden, do you look round for some smart, driving, go-ahead woman, and marry her if you can!' But somehow I haven't seemed to have any luck."

"Suppose now I should say Priscilla Danley. She would make an excellent wife, I am sure; and I really think she would be willing to change her situation. There is nobody else who occurs to me at this moment."

Salmon Hayden's eyes lighted like the eyes of Jonathan after he had tasted the honey in the weed.

"Well, she's a woman I don't know; but if you think she will do, why, all right. I must consider my children, you understand, and get somebody who will make a good mother to them. But I have a great deal of confidence in your judgment, Doctor, and if it is your opinion she will suit all around you would confer a great favor by saying a good word for me."

Dr. Ellsworth folded another powder in a bit of white paper.

"I think," said he, "you had better do the speaking. I am not accustomed to such business myself; never did any thing of the kind but once, and that was on my own account."

"I can't, Doctor, I have so much bad luck. If you only would help me this once I shall always account you my best friend," said Hayden, in a pathetic tone which struck home to the Doctor's benevolent heart.

So he promised; and that very evening took occasion to call at Mr. Danley's under pretense of asking after old lady Danley's rheumatism.

Priscilla met him at the door. "I would like to see you a few minutes alone, Miss Danley," said the Doctor, blushing like Aurora.

"To be sure you may," answered Priscilla, briskly, "if you'll step into the kitchen where I'm paring apples. It's a busy time just now, and I can as well keep my hands going while I talk."

"What has he got in his head now?" thought she, as they walked along together. "Come to borrow money, I'll warrant. He may as well save his breath; for I've taken all the money out of my stocking to pay off that mortgage—as far as the heel."

"Miss Danley," said the Doctor, after a few desultory coughs, and a few preliminary ahems, "I would like to ask you your candid opinion in regard to—to matrimony."

Priscilla punched the apple-corer a little way into the ball of her thumb.

"My opinion, Doctor? You didn't come all this length of ways to hear that? If you did it's a pity you shouldn't get it, though; so I'll out with it, and not wait to be coaxed. It's my candid opinion that matrimony does very well in its place."

"But in your own case, Miss Priscilla? Suppose now a good, likely man, and an excellent provider—"

Priscilla sprang up as if one of Cupid's arrows had suddenly hit her, and ran to the sink in the most irrelevant manner, to wash her hands.

"A man that would give you a comfortable home—"

"No more of your 'supposes,' Dr. Ellsworth. If you've got any thing to say, say it."

"So I will, all but the name. I've no idea of trifling with you, Miss Priscilla. He is a man I can recommend."

"A widower?"

"Yes."

"How many children?"

"Six."

"What are his means?"

"Well to do, Miss Danley, or I wouldn't have come here on any such errand."

"What do you want me to say, Doctor? I shouldn't like to have the certificate made out, you know, and the minister spoken to, before I'd set eyes on the man!"

Dr. Ellsworth laughed. The worst was now over, and Miss Priscilla's matter-of-fact manner had set him quite at his ease.

"All I ask of you, Miss Danley, is this: Will you or will you not see him?"

"I will; certainly; why not?" replied Miss Priscilla, looking at her questioner with eyes as penetrating as two blue gimlets, and with as much composure as though it had been a suit of clothes instead of a wife Dr. Ellsworth was bespeaking.

"Oh, well! Then it's all right. I will call over with the gentleman and introduce him," returned the Doctor, hastily drawing on his gloves. "By-the-way," he added, remembering his pretended errand, and turning back at the door, "how is your grandmother, Miss Priscilla?"

Miss Priscilla threw up her nose, which was as sharp as a fish-knife, disapprovingly. "Grandmother is no better," said she, "and she will be no better while she continues to live on blue-pills and Dover's powders. All my wonder is that she is alive."

"I have told the old lady," observed Dr. Ellsworth, mildly, as became a warrior who would not speak to the prejudice of his own weapons, "that too much medicine may affect one as unfavorably as too little; but she thinks she has lived long enough to judge for herself; and as I can do nothing for her I will wish you good-by for the present, and call again soon, with your leave, to introduce the gentleman referred to."

"Of course. Only not Monday of the week, or Saturday—that is baking-day. Men are such fools, and the most foolish thing about them is, they don't know they are fools," said Miss Priscilla aside, taking up a pan of apples and setting it down again with an emphasis.

Miss Danley's figure was adapted to viry strength rather than grace, and she carried decision and capability in every thread of her chocolate calico. Her hair, which was the color of white pepper, had a way of coiling itself up in a tight twist, fastened by an inflexible steel comb; and her complexion was more like a russet apple than an apple-blossom. But, though not strictly beautiful, Miss Priscilla Danley had other attractions besides those in her money-stocking. She never made a failure of any thing she turned her hand to, from pies to poetry; and in sickness she was worth her weight in diamond dust.

Dr. Ellsworth was quite conscious of this as he shut the door of the thrifty Danley mansion; yet somehow, such is the perversity of the heart of man, he went home to his silly "child-wife's" pretty face and gay spirits with especial satisfaction that night.

Next week, on the afternoon of ironing-day, which every body knows is Tuesday, he called, with the impatient Mr. Hayden, on Miss Priscilla.

And this was the way the Fates had ordered it: She and her cousin Mrs. Pillsbury, not expecting visitors before tea, were engaged in taking to pieces and putting together again the sewing-machine. Round Miss Priscilla's slender waist was tied a blue checked apron; in her left hand was a kerosene lamp with the top off; while her right hand brandished a feather.

It was not at an opportune moment that nephew David, aged sixteen, roguishly ushered the two callers into the sitting-room. Miss Priscilla was conscious that scarlet vied with russet in her face, and that the tight twist at the back of her head was stuck full of knitting-needles.

Introductions were hurried over, and the Doctor took his leave, feeling very guilty, and very much afraid of the severe glances which the gimlet eyes were boring into his soul. The moment he left the room, however, Miss Priscilla darted after him.

"So that is your widower, is it? And a pretty time of day to bring him here, without so much as a word of warning!"

The Doctor lingered for no further reproaches, but shut the front door behind him with the utmost dispatch, while Miss Priscilla ran up stairs to arrange her toilette, leaving Mr. Hayden and her cousin together.

As it was a day of blunders, and the Fates had matters in their own hands, it is not to be wondered at that Mr. Hayden had made a mistake at the outset—the trifling mistake of supposing Mrs. Pillsbury was the lady of his love.

"I am glad it was not the other one," said he to himself, complacently; for Mrs. Pillsbury's comely face and plump little figure did certainly contrast very favorably with the grimness and angularity of "the other one." There was not the shadow of a doubt in Mr. Salmon Hayden's mind that the lady with her hair full of knitting-needles had left the room on purpose to give him an opportunity to express his sentiments. There was no time to be lost, he thought; for she might come back again as suddenly as she had gone.

"I am a poor, bereaved man," said he, trying to get a view of the sole of his left boot, "ahem! as I suppose my friend the Doctor has told you." Mrs. Pillsbury looked up sympathetically.

"I am sorry for you, Mr. Hayden."

There was a tear in her eye, which was very encouraging to the poor stammerer.

"Yes, a poor, bereaved man," repeated he, in more assured tones; "and really, Madame, a word of condolence from you is worth a great deal to me—worth more than you can think."

Mrs. Pillsbury looked up again, and this time with innocent surprise. It was not really clear to her why her sympathy should be so especially valuable.

"You have a feeling heart, Madame."

"I hope I have, Mr. Hayden; but your lonely condition must touch any one, I am sure. I always thought a house must seem utterly desolate when a man goes home and finds motherless children in place of his wife."

Mrs. Pillsbury, as she spoke, looked up into the eyes of the bereaved with such tender pity that his heart leaped with a great bound toward his gentle sympathizer, instantly taking her into its empty corner.

"I don't know how to thank Dr. Ellsworth enough for the favor of this introduction," said he, gratefully. "I suppose you understand the object of my visit upon this occasion, and are willing, I hope, to receive my attentions with a view to marriage? I suppose, too, you must understand that I must wish to hasten matters as fast as is convenient to you. I am all ready now, and I hope you will name as early a day as possible."

So saying—the mind of Mr. Hayden reverting to the old days of his first courtship—he took Mrs. Pillsbury's pin-cushion of a hand in the most affectionate manner—the very hand which ought at that especial moment to have been frying fritters for its impatient owner, her husband. Impatient, sure enough; for before Mrs. Pillsbury, in her amazement, had time to speak, or even draw back, the opposite doors opened, and from one came the voice of Mr. Pillsbury, inquiring, with conjugal freedom, if supper was nearly ready. Then he stepped over the threshold, and stood in dumb surprise, just as Miss Priscilla appeared in the other doorway.

"Sarah Matilda! my wife!" was all the astonished husband could utter; while "Mercy on us!" fell from the pursed lips of Miss Priscilla like a quick storm of hail. Which was the most astonished one of the party it would be difficult to say; but the first to regain equipoise was Sarah Matilda.

"An apology is due to Mr. Hayden," said she, with ready tact. "He has mistaken me, an old married woman, for my cousin, Miss Danley. Priscilla, he has asked for my hand, and I refer him to you for an answer."

"Yes, yes," gasped Mr. Hayden, with as good a grace as he could command. "A natural mistake, ladies; and I hope you'll excuse it, Miss Danley, I mean Mrs.—Mrs.—"

"Pillsbury," suggested the outraged husband, severely.

"And I sincerely hope"—faltered the father of six, with an appealing glance at the spinster's top-knot of steel-colored ribbon, which protruded from each side of the tight twist like a two-edged sword—"I sincerely hope, Miss Danley, it will be so you can overlook this little blunder, and take me for—for better or worse."

"Tea is ready," said Miss Priscilla, without bending her head; "walk out and sit down with us, Mr. Hayden."

This invitation looked propitious. If the lady had been offended beyond all hope of reconciliation she would not have asked the enemy out to tea. Mr. Hayden's India rubber spirits had suffered collapse on account of his innocent mistake; but they inflated and rebounded as Miss Priscilla spoke.

He watched her, sitting upright before the little Japan tray, pouring a stream of tea as nearly as possible at right-angles with the nose of the tea-top; and thought within his own soul that this "other one" would rule his house better than the sympathetic Mrs. Pillsbury, on whom he had wasted five minutes of hopeless and unlawful adoration. Yes, he was satisfied that the happiness of his future life depended upon one short word from Miss Danley's decisive lips, which as yet had only opened to ask her guests if they would take sugar and cream in their cups.

Miss Priscilla did not for a moment forget the proprieties of the occasion; but, while she was acting her part as hostess with the strictest decorum, her mind was busy with thoughts of the future. Should she, or should she not, accept the horny hand of Salmon Hayden, and with it the six responsibilities which romped around his hearth-stone?

There was Sam—that was Priscilla's brother—he had a wife, just now gone visiting—she usually was gone visiting—and eight children. Was it Priscilla's duty to stand forever over those children with a towel, a cake of soap, a darning-needle, and a pair of scissors? She had done it thus far ever since Sam married that incapable Hannah Lovejoy, and do it she might to the end of the chapter, and who was there to thank her for it? Six was not as bad as eight. She could take these six into her own hands as no maiden aunt might dare, and there would be only an irresponsible, easy-going man to say, "Why do ye so?"

Miss Priscilla considered and considered. As for the mistake Mr. Hayden had made in addressing Mrs. Pillsbury instead of herself, it did not weigh a feather with the sensible Priscilla. It only showed what an absent-minded, flighty man was the Doctor, to risk the possibility of such a blunder. If the distracted Salmon had made love to Sarah Matilda he supposed he was making it to Priscilla; so pray what was the difference? It is not best to "split a hair from west to northwest side," and Miss Danley never wasted time in such puerile employment. She had been weighing this matter of marriage ever since the Friday before; and now that she had seen the bridegroom expectant she had no particular fault to find with him, except that he would talk with his mouth full. She considered and considered; and before the pile of fritters had quite sunk to nothingness Mr. Hayden's prospects had risen in inverse proportion. Miss Priscilla had decided that he would do to sit at the foot of the table at which she should preside as head. She would as lief pour tea for him as for any man she knew; and being a woman who did what she had to do in the shortest space of time and with the fewest possible words, she soon made the ecstatic man acquainted with the state of her heart; whereupon he smiled like the sun after a shower, and immediately called together all the scattered rays of his affections, and beamed down upon her tropically.

After supper Mrs. Pillsbury stepped into her cousin's place once more. Not, as before, in the affections of her suitor, but this time more acceptably in her work of clearing away the table and overlooking Mrs. Sam Danley's eight children, who, from oldest to youngest, inherited their mother's incapacity; "Hannah all over," as their Aunt Priscilla often said, with a discouraged sigh. And thus Miss Danley had time for a little necessary conference with her elected bridegroom in the parlor. A season not wholly lost, for Miss Danley always carried a ball of yarn and a crochet-hook in her pocket, and many was the tidy and the yard of edging that had grown out of such odd minutes.

"I hope," said Mr. Hayden, with the impatience of a householder rather than of a lover—"I hope you won't keep me waiting long."

"Nothing to wait for, as I know of; I was never one to dawdle. When there is any thing to be done, do it, say I," returned the intended bride, making a rapid calculation of the necessary time for the preparation of a state dress and bonnet, with the inevitable contingencies of washing, baking, and ironing thrown in.

"Tuesday," said she, with a reflective thrust of her hook into the heart of a tidy, already predestined to cover Mr. Hayden's best rocking-chair—"Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday—yes, well—two weeks from to-day is as early as I can arrange to leave here. There are the dresses to finish for the children, and I have promised to make some bottles of sarsaparilla and cordial for grandmother; and then there will be some little things for myself. Yes, to-day two weeks, we will say; and you can call again about next week on Wednesday; there may be something to talk over. I shall not expect you more than that once, for I shall be very much engaged, and it must be just the busy season with you."

Thus, in her practical way, Miss Priscilla took at once the family reins, which she held with a firm hand ever after. As a housekeeper, a wife, and a step-mother, she showed herself all she had been recommended, giving Mr. Hayden no reason to regret that his momentary admiration for any lady but herself proved to be only a blunder.

DRUDGERY.

THE most enthusiastic eulogist of work will in scarce case pretend that it is a blessing to those in whose case it has degenerated into drudgery. Drudgery does not produce happiness or beauty of character. On the contrary, its tendency is to mar all that is fair and lovely in the most cultivated natures. And it is astonishing how quickly, in these days of passion for exhaustive performance, labor degenerates into drudgery. There are certain laws of the proper and the becoming in respect of work, as in respect of every other condition of existence, which we can not violate without forfeiting our happiness. Our work must be suitable, or at least not strongly repugnant, to our tastes and capacities. Race-horses must not be yoked for plowing, nor should geese be set in high places. Lamb and Clough were not content in their red-tape fetters. Little men should not undertake big tasks, nor should large-minded men allow themselves to be turned into machines and propelled along a groove. Our work, too, must be moderate, not rushing into excess. Even when its object is noble it may be excessive in amount, and may so overwhelm us as to crush or stifle that fine spirit which should lurk within us, and, like certain unsuspected atoms in Sydney Smith's salad, should "animate the whole." Lastly, our work should, like our diet, be varied. Not that we ought to sacrifice excellence to that other modern idol, Many-sidedness. We ought to try to do some one thing well; and we ought to take care that that one thing is a good thing. But we ought also to avoid narrowness, and that want of sympathy which is the besetting weakness of professional men, experts, and all who have a specialty; which is the more dangerous in proportion as our work has a tendency to be mechanical, and which therefore often reaches its climax in the case of permanent Government officials. If we neglect these and other reasonable precautions, our work will soon become drudgery; and drudgery, even if it does not make us absolutely miserable, yet destroys the bloom and grace of life. We shall be deluded if we think that work under such circumstances will bring happiness. Rather we shall feel an anguish which is far greater than the misery of idleness.

ENGLISH CORRESPONDENCE.

THE worthy mayor of Norwich, at the opening meeting of the British Association, told a little anecdote which I will give you. It seems that, when crossing the Channel a week or two ago, some trifle among his belongings attracted the attention of a fellow-passenger on board the steamboat. After a few remarks came the natural inquiry, "Where did you get this from?" "Why from Norwich to be sure," was the reply. "Norwich! where's Norwich?" You'll excuse my ignorance; I only left New York some few weeks since, and I have never been in England in my life." This of course drew from his worship, the mayor, a good deal of information with regard to his native town; and as probably a few of my readers may know but little about it either, and as it certainly is a fair and fine specimen of that class of old east of England Cathedral towns, I think I must dwell upon it a little.

It is of Saxon origin, and has been more than once totally destroyed. In 1004 Sweyn, King of Denmark, razed it so completely to the ground that not one stone was left standing on another. It has, however, survived sieges and changes, fire and water, and shows more traces of its ancient origin than almost any other town. Every street is narrow; London Street is the principal one as far as shops go; and here on Saturday—market-day—all the world and his wife assemble. Farmers of course come for business; and the county people, who make it a rule to come too, get through a vast deal of shopping, and have many pleasant meetings among themselves into the bargain. Country-town life in England is a dull one—an occasional ball, a concert now and then when some of the brilliant metropolitan stars condescend to visit them, an archery meeting, and a few formal dinner-parties are the chief excitements. The lawyer, the doctor, the prosperous manufacturer are the reigning monarchs of the domain; the county folks—the land-owners, that is—keep to themselves and consider the town folks without the pale of their acquaintance. Norwich differs in no way from its neighbors in these respects. Small interests, small rivalries, and plenty of small gossip abound.

You get as good a view of the quaintness of the town from the Gentlemen's Walk, as it is called, as any where else. This Gentlemen's Walk is a kind of general promenade when the town is full. On the one side are some of the prettiest shops, where books, photographs, and French wares and the like are sold; on the other the market-place, backed by the Guildhall and a row of tall, irregular houses. Anciently this market-place was the Magna Croft of the Castle, a cross stood in the centre, erected in the reign of Edward III., containing a small chapel or oratory; this was, however, taken down in 1732. Now the scene here, especially on the evening of a market-day, is worth seeing. The poultry, eggs, vegetables, etc., are sold under covered stalls, lighted as night comes on by large stable-lanterns, which shed weird gleams on every thing; the poor people seem to prefer the evening for buying, and the scene is a busy and bustling one. If the market-women only wore a pretty, picturesque costume, as they do often on the Continent, instead of the ordinary, shabby, colorless English dress, the effect would be even prettier. The Guildhall adds a good deal to the picturesque aspect of the market-place. It occupies the site of the old Tolbooth, and was completed in 1413. In the Common Council Chamber here Queen Elizabeth was entertained at a magnificent banquet when she visited the city. The exterior is very curious, made of black flint, arranged in triangles, and here and there are square panels with the remains of shields and supporters of bluff King Harry's period; within the Council-room too there is a great deal of furniture of that reign. Treasured in one of the smaller apartments here are some curious vestiges of old times and old customs when municipal processions were more imposing spectacles than they are now. Snap or dragon, which used to be carried before the mayor on his election, is shown to the curious visitor. It is a large basket-work frame, covered with painted cloth to resemble a dragon, and big enough to contain a man, whose business it was to snap the jaws of the creature as he walked. Accompanying Snap were the whiffers, men clad in curious picturesque dresses of red and white, who flourished their whiffers or short swords as they went in front of the procession.

From the market-place, as almost every where throughout the town, you see the Castle—or rather all that remains of one of the finest old Norman castles in the country. All that exists now is what was originally the keep or donjon tower, the last resort of the besieged, on the east side of which is Bigod's Tower, a mere ruin. The keep has been refaced, and is kept in most perfect repair, as it is used now for the county jail; and several times within the last century the black flag has waved from its summit, and the shedder of his fellow-man's blood has paid the last penalty of the law on the top of the Castle Hill. Now, public executions are abolished in England, and all criminals for the future will be hung within the walls. The view from the front of this Castle, on which the dying eyes of such criminals must have often rested, is one of the prettiest the county affords; the town in the foreground, and in the distance a wide expanse of very picturesque country. In front of the confines of the jail a weekly cattle-market is held on Saturdays.

Norwich Cathedral is not one of the largest in the land, but it is certainly one of the prettiest. The interior is cruciform, consisting of a nave, side aisles, north and south transepts, choir, and chapels. The choir is exceedingly handsome, and the richly-carved oak well worth seeing. It is unhappily placed, with the grand organ, in the middle of the nave, which is much to be regretted as it contracts the building so very much. Among the most notable tombs are those of Sir William Boleyn, grandfather of Anne Boleyn, Sir Thomas Erpingham, who built one of the grand old gateways leading to the Cathedral, and Sir Thomas Windham, a Privy Councillor of King Henry VIII. I have no space now to dwell upon its many beauties and its many histories; every tomb, every stone has its own tale to tell. Here, where Chancellor Spenser finds his last resting-place, the Dean and Chapter formerly demanded payment of their rents; there, through an aperture by Rudolph Pulvertott's inscription, the ancient custom of "watching the sepulchre" was performed. Old customs have passed away, and Norwich flourishes in the present through its manufactures, shawls, crape, paramatta, and the like. I must now bid it farewell for a while and turn to my other budget of news, though this is the time of year when news is scarce even in the papers; and the Times itself permits the public now and then to ventilate their own particular grievances or hobbies through its columns. In the many and varied retreats to which the London world have betaken themselves, the tidings which come from the great metropolis are not such as to make them anxious to return thither. There is a strike among the cabmen, as inconvenient a proceeding as can well be imagined. The grievance is, that certain cabs are allowed the privilege of taking their stand at the various railway stations on condition that they submit to the regulations the railway companies impose. The cabmen's cry just now is, "No cab monopoly"—viz., that this privilege should be open to all. How it will end it is impossible to say at present. If it brought about a change or improvement in the cabs generally it would be a consummation devoutly to be wished. At present a London cab is as small, unsightly, dirty a conveyance as can well be imagined. They are licensed to hold four persons, it is true; but when so occupied, these four unlucky mortals are wedged as closely together as cattle in a railway van. The bottom of these vehicles is mostly covered with straw, which on a wet day becomes most damp and dirty. The windows open and shut with difficulty, and have no attempt at blinds, so that on a hot day, with the sun pouring in, they are almost unbearable. The velvet which covers the seats is generally faded and worn from constant wear; and the seats themselves (at all events those back to the horses) are so polished that people whose legs are not of the longest are continually slipping off. The drivers are a weather-worn race of men, clad in old, much-mended garments. If I have not succeeded in bringing before my American readers a picture of as dreary a vehicle as can well be imagined, I have failed in my description of a London cab. And for this we pay sixpence a mile, and sixpence for every extra passenger beyond two for the journey. For a better article I am sure the public would gladly pay more, especially ladies, who patronize them necessarily a great deal, even those who have carriages, though they are by no means improving or suitable for pretty toilettes.

The cause célèbre of Mrs. Borrodaile and Madame Rachel, to which I alluded in a previous letter, has just come to a satisfactory conclusion, Madame Rachel having been sentenced to five years' imprisonment with hard labor. Nothing could have been more amusing than the scene in court during the proceedings, especially when Mrs. Borrodaile gave her evidence. A vainer or more flippant witness has surely rarely ascended the witness-box. The charge against the prisoner was, that she had obtained money from the prosecutor under false pretenses. This the evidence scarcely proved in a legal way. A great deal of money had changed hands, but it was by no means shown why, or for what purpose, it was used, save that Mrs. Borrodaile applied to Madame Rachel for certain cosmetics, etc., which were to make her "beautiful forever," and that for these she was to pay some £1000. A pretty good sum, considering that these cosmetics had certainly not had the desired effect, though the prosecutor evidently possessed a quantity of golden hair; and she offered one of the barristers present to take off her bonnet, and show that it was all her own. With all this complicated story Lord Ranelagh's name was somewhat unpleasantly mixed up. Some of the money which changed hands was, it seems, intended for him. Mrs. Borrodaile being possessed with the idea that she was about to marry him, and having only seen him once, imagined that she was engaged to him, writing him a variety of letters, and in return receiving some rare specimens of amatory correspondence, which his lordship positively denies ever having written. The mystification altogether is so complete that, notwithstanding the long trial, no real light has been thrown upon the mystery. Mrs. Borrodaile has passed a good deal of her life in India, and has really lived in good society, and her daughter, who is considered an heiress, has married well. Lord Ranelagh is an unmarried nobleman, whose name has attained before some celebrity with regard to womankind, as well as Volunteers. He is tall and thin, and nearer fifty than forty, and is at present High Sheriff of Norfolk, where, at the recent assizes, as elsewhere, whenever the occasion permits, he appears in the gray and silver uniform of the Middlesex Volunteers. Some year or two ago he was bound over to keep the peace toward a certain Captain Norton, who, if the charges brought against him were true, richly deserved almost anything his lordship might inflict on him. One of the Brighton hotels was roused one night by the piteous cries of a young lady, an acknowledged daughter of Lord Ranelagh's, whom he was endeavoring to introduce into society, and when the cause of this outcry was investigated, the said Captain Norton was accused of having grossly insulted the fair damsel, for which offense his lordship naturally vowed vengeance. The scene and excitement in the hotel is better imagined than described.

The Queen is now in Scotland, safe once more in her own domains. The Prince of Wales, it is said, is to pass the winter in Egypt; whether the Princess accompanies him is not yet announced. If he carries out all the arrangements which have been talked of for him he will have enough to do. A visit to Copenhagen and to Greece is also on the tapis.

Patti is singing at Homburg, Baden, etc., as charmingly as ever. At the former place the King of Prussia threw her a bouquet the other night. Indeed, the furor in her favor is as great as ever, both with crowned heads and peasants.

ARDERN HOLT.

SEA-SICKNESS.

YOUR enemy is a bad sailor, shake hands with him when you land, for you have been revenged in watching him at sea. Of all dismal ills, the dullest is sea-sickness. Let a man break his leg, he will lie in bed with no desire to die. Let him lose his arm, or catch the small-pox, or get bloated with the dropsy, the desire to retain life is ever with him. He will live while he can. But let a man be sea-sick, and life grows an intolerable burden. He will gaze over into the depths of the blue wave with a yearning to set his stomach to rest beneath it. Can any thing be more morbid than the expression of his eye? what more suggestive of suicide than the color of his cheek? How he hates every body! The officious steward, not unmindful of some prospective fee, who bobs so untiringly about him with a mop and a basin, he loudly execrates between the gulps of his ever-recurring meal. He smells a distant cigar—there is a flavor of death in the hideous odor—ah! what would he give to be on shore again. There is something so awful in the going up of the vessel; and something so abominable in the going down. It is a rising that seems only to carry one's head with it, leaving it in the air, horribly giddy and confused. Then follows the slow sinking—a movement that seems to subvert the whole anatomy of the body—thrusting the stomach into the throat—the heart into the feet—while the head is left still up in the air, dazed, yellow, emptied. How a man envies the bow-legged steward, who seems as incapable of being upset by the jerk of the steamer as if he were one of those china figures with round bottoms which you may sometimes see in the toy-shops. How cheerily he thrusts his mop about; how gayly he answers to the choked and distant cry of "Steward!" How astonishing to watch his steady progress along the heaving deck, his arms full of basins and his complexion as unpaled by the proximity of the horrid vessels as if each cheek were an apple!

A DAY'S NUTTING.

See Illustration on page 840.

How well that day do I remember—
The fairest of a fair September!
At early morn a merry set
Around the breakfast-table met.
At each strange dress the laugh went round,
For we on nutting jaunt were bound,
And so in roughest garbs were dressed,
That suit the brambly thicket best.
Breakfast soon over, in a crack
Each of the men-folk on his back
A satchel slung, filled, as befits,
With medley picnic requisites.
A loving octave, in firm grip
Of a most close relationship,
Were we—four youths and maidens three,
With aunt as Dame Propriety;
And, every one with crook in hand,
We sallied forth, a gleesome band.

An ample space of brightest green
Gardens and river spread between,
There lay our path. Then c'er a stile,
Along the roadway for a mile,
Across a rustic bridge or two,
Our destination full in view,
And, richest meadows being passed,
Reached Farmer Skinner's woods at last.
Steep slanting to the river-side,
Facing due south their acres wide,
Rightly they were the owner's pride;
For hazel-nuts and filberts too
Here to luxuriant fullness grew.
Our bourne thus reached, with joyful cries,
Eager to clutch our long-sought prize,

We through the fringing bushes broke,
And laughter hundred echoes woke.

The woods we roved, now deep in shade,
Now bursting into sunny glade;
And ever as the treasures spread
Of the plump hazel overhead,
Around, about as every where,
How to begin was all our care;
Embarrassed by our riches, we Felt first a strange cupidity;
Craving the many fingers' use
Of hundred-handed Briareus.
But, as in life one's duty lies
In doing what's before his eyes
Promptly, and with such means as lie
Can bring to bear on it, so we Soon settled to our pleasant spoil,
Nor wished for helpers in our toil.
No milksop dainty ones were we,
But to our task stuck valiantly;
And crooks were plied with busy skill,
And satchels soon began to fill.
Some bent the loftier branches down,
Well laden with their clusters brown,
Of far-extending full-grown trees,
For gentle hands to pick at ease.
And we by this time were subdued
Into a hush of quietude.
At times a bird unloosed his throat,
And gave one sweetly-plaintive note;
Sometimes a laugh at awkward fall,
The stumbler loudest of us all,
As bough, released, with quick rebound,
Would lay one sprawling on the ground,
Rang with strange shrillness through the wood;
Then all was brooding solitude,
Except a note of glad surprise
As choicest filberts met the eyes;
And save the soft, incessant rustle
Of boughs as we with quiet bustle
Full quickly turned them to bare poles,
As their ripe treasures fell in shoals.
Ere long huge heaps of woodland spoil
Stood the proud trophies of our toil.

So, as the day was at its prime,
We thought of resting for a time,
And from our pleasant labors steal
An hour to take our noonday meal.
All hands struck work; and round we went
In widening circles, deep intent
To find some space of open ground
Where best to dine; this soon was found—
The very place—bright-green and level,
Fitted for pixies' gayest revel;
Round it half looped a crystal brook
That elsewhere headlong passage took,
But dallied round this cozy nook.
Here on white cloth were duly spread
Meat pasties, fruit, and piles of bread,
With viands delicate and light
For ladies' daintier appetite.
Round these we promptly took our place,
Hap-hazard, and fell to apace.
At length, our hunger somewhat stayed,
With choice nick-nackeries we played;
And luscious blackberries, the last,
Ripened, it seemed, for our repast,
That from close-neighboring bushes we Gathered while lolling lazily,
Blent (food for gods) with clotted cream;
Our thirst we slaked from nearest stream.
Soon fell we into easy chat,
Which swayed at will from this to that;
And, cracking jokes and nuts, one said,
"Why toil as for our daily bread?
We've nuts enough to fill a dray;
I vote we pick no more to-day."
"Agreed!" was each one's ready cry—
"Agreed!" was echo's prompt reply.
So a delicious afternoon
Was spent in talk, with many a tune
Sweet interspersed, and echo rang
A blithe refrain to all we sang.

The sun, by this time sinking, threw Long shadows eastward; so we knew
'Twas time to gather up and go;
But first we rambled to and fro
A little in our new domain,
For eye and ear new joys to gain.
Sometimes, quick-darting, squirrels whisked
Around us freely every where,
Thick as the leaves they kicked in air.
The woods their voices had renewed,
And sparrows twittered, ring-doves cooed,
The thrushes, blackbirds, linnets plied
Their throats as in the sweet spring-tide;
And faster still their song-shafts flew,
More tremulously tender grew.
Down the steep hill we quickly went,
Startling the birds in our descent,
By many a zigzag course that wound
Easily to the lower ground;
And, having gained our picnic nook,
Each youth his satchel gayly took,
Big with our spoils. The ladies too
Had all some trifling task to do.
Then echo many times repeating,
More plaintive each our farewell greeting,
Sank at the last to one low knell.
And faltered out a sad "Farewell."
So homeward we retraced our way
In the pale flush of dying day.

satin. Sash and bows with long, rounded ends, bordered with a flounce.

Fig. 6.—Dress with double skirt of light gray poplin, trimmed with lilac silk. Brussels straw hat, trimmed with lilac silk, flowers, and lace girdle. Lilac parasol.

FALL BONNETS.

COMMON-SENSE IN FASHION.

ALL theory scolds the dominion of fashion as baseless, while all practice bends to it. It is of no use to ignore it; it can hardly be worth any woman's while to resist it; but it need not be allowed to tyrannize every where, and it is mere folly for every body to attempt to keep pace with it. Its proper function seems to me to be like that of rules in a game of skill, to give scope for ingenuity in observing it. Were there no succession of fashions, dress would sink to a mere mechanical repetition of established models. Whether this would be a moral gain or not it would clearly destroy half the interest of the spectacle. That interest is equally destroyed when mere fashion is allowed to decide every thing, as it is in too many instances. You know the fashion, and can, therefore, predict such a one's dress.

The more remote any part of a woman's dress is from her own personality the more completely it may be abandoned to fashion. Thus, the shape and length of a skirt, the choice of a flat trimming which does not alter the outline of the figure, such extraneous adjuncts as muffs, parasols, fans, etc.—all these things are the mere prey of fashion, and the variations which it may work in them are mostly too remote to disturb the stamp of individuality. But when fashion creeps up to the sleeves and the cut of the body of a gown, its influence must be more jealously scrutinized—grave individual exigencies may begin to encounter it here; and when it comes to a question of hair-dressing, the whole expression of the face being at stake, fashion should be almost the last consideration to be admitted, although even here it should never be ignored. Coloring also should always be determined rather by the permanent characteristics of the wearer than by any variations of fashion. Another rule always to be borne in mind is, that personal inclinations rank above fashion. No woman of fine moral sense would wear what she herself felt to be distinctly ugly in mere deference to fashion. Personal inclinations are to fashion what the individual conscience is to public opinion—much influenced by it, but reacting upon it, and paramount while opposed to it. The eye is so much affected by habit that the sense of ugliness rarely long withstands a very strong current of fashion; and when the sense of ugliness is lost the reason for holding out is gone; but it is almost morally important that as long as it exists it should not be outraged. It can rarely even seem necessary to do so, for there are few fashions which may not be adopted in moderation, and so discreetly adapted to the taste of the wearer as to become fresh sources of beauty. And in the course of its revolutions, fashion every now and then develops really beautiful forms, which it would be well if we could in some way stamp with public approbation, so that they might be saved from the lot of oblivion.

STREET, HOME, AND CHILDREN'S DRESSES.

The last caution which I should wish to impress upon students with regard to fashion is the necessity of taking a sober measurement of the degree in which one really either can or ought to dress fashionably. To make snatches at occasional fragmentary bits of fashion when one's purse does not allow of the whole wardrobe being kept up consistently to the same degree of novelty, but would amply suffice to keep one neat and fresh in the style of a few weeks or months ago, is simply to throw away the substance for the shadow, and to make one's unavoidable deficiencies doubly glaring. Also, it must be remembered that fashionable dress is as unbecoming in a lady living in a quiet, unfashionable society as the attempt to look like a lady in her house-maid; though it is very likely that she severely condemns the latter error, while she has not strength of mind to refuse her connivance, at least, at her dress-maker's attempts to make her commit the former.

In turning to the subject of convenience, we emerge from the enchanted grounds where invisible powers exercise their mysterious authority, to the plain light of common-sense and reason. That sleeves intended to be worn at meal-times should be so constructed as not to dip into dishes; that outdoor gowns should either be short or capable of being shortened; that bodies and skirts, having different periods of existence, and needing to be occasionally packed up, should be separable; that gowns to be put on by human creatures should have their fastenings within reach of the human hand; that hats should be light and shady, parasols for a variable climate large enough to serve as a shelter both from sun and rain; that cloaks should be water-proof, and winter petticoats made of stout colored stuff instead of white cambric: all these obvious truths have recently dawned upon the minds of this generation, and it is much to be hoped that we shall be able to retain our hold of them. The hope would be more consoling if the records of past fashions did not bear testimony to the extraordinary eclipses which such truths have formerly undergone.

WHAT IT COSTS TO LIVE.

DEAR BAZAR,—I am a young married lady with but little or no experience in household matters; my husband's salary is $1600 a year.

I wish to live within his income, and to economize as much as possible. Can you give me any information as to how to begin?

Of course I have to dress as well as the majority of ladies who are said to be "comfortably off," my husband's position requiring such.

Is there any work published that would assist me in my endeavors?

Hoping to hear from you very soon, I am Yours sincerely,
"YOUNG MATRON."

The first suggestion we would make to "Young Matron" is that she should get rid of the notion that she has "of course to dress as well as the majority of ladies who are said to be 'comfortably off.'" What does such a notion imply? Simply this, that "Young Matron" thinks she is obliged to dress not according to her own income, but the expenditure of others. While she persists in clinging to this absurd idea, we can not understand what her husband's salary of $1600 has to do with the questions she asks us; unless she supposes that we have some secret of necromancy to impart to her by which her hundreds may be turned into thousands. The prevailing extravagance is so great, in this latitude at least, that if "Young Matron" must dress like "the majority of ladies who are said to be comfortably off," there will be very little of the sixteen hundred dollars of her husband's salary left after the settlement of her annual bill of dry-goods and sundries. What does "Young Matron" think of $1000 per annum as a yearly allowance for dressing the daughter just "coming out" of a family "comfortably off"? We are assured that this is considered quite a moderate sum to expend in a twelvemonth for the requisite dry-goods suitably to set off a respectable New York damsel. Indeed, there are many young girls yet in their teens to whom a thousand dollars would seem a scant allowance, for when that sum was lately proposed to an expanding belle we know of she answered, "It might do provided mamma would start her with a good outfit."

If "Young Matron," as we advise her, will be unto herself a law, and not subject herself in dress or any thing else to the will or rather the caprice of the majority, she and her husband will be able not only to clothe themselves decorously, but live comfortably on their sixteen hundred dollars a year. There are a great many things we might enumerate that she can not have for that sum; but they may all be dispensed with without damage to respect of self and friends, comfort, health, and life. It is certain that "Young Matron" can not long live with her husband on a salary of $1600 a year in a house at the rent of 500 or 600 dollars a month, keep half a dozen servants at $15 or $20, expand in paniers of rustling silk, and drape herself in lace and cashmere. She can, however, realize her youthful dream of love in a cottage, somewhere in the suburbs, at $300 a year, water and gas complete; supply her table daily with an abundance of substantial beef and pudding and sundries for two dollars a day; do her own work up stairs and down, which will cost 0 all the year round, and have $500 or so left. Out of this sum there will be enough for annual calico for the wife and broadcloth for the husband, with something to spare for the welcome of little consummations of love in a cottage—to be naturally expected by young matrons—and other small luxuries.

"Young Matron" seems to think that her "husband's position" makes it imperative upon her to dress expensively. His "position" where? we would ask. Surely not with Jones, Smith, & Brown, whose sense of the security of their greenbacks is not likely to be strengthened by seeing their clerk's wife spreading her paniers of silk across Broadway. It is her own "position" our "Young Matron" must allude to, and what is this worth? just the cost of the dry-goods she puts on her back, and no more. If she must persist in trying to hold such a position at any expense, she must make up her mind to her husband's loss of his; and the next question we shall have to answer for "Young Matron" will be: "How can I live on nothing?"

Our correspondent asks for reference to some book. We commend to her as the most impressive works on the subject, and the most likely to teach people How to live within their income, the "Records of Bankruptcy" and the "Police Register," which are filled with striking illustrations of the crime and ruin which inevitably result from living beyond one's means.

NUMBER FORTY-FIVE.

A SULTRY, listless afternoon in midsummer, and I, Susan Fenton, spinster, hot, languid, and tired of life, lying on a lounge thinking of nothing and fretting at every thing. The whites of my eyes—I am a brunette—had not been milky white, as they should be, for a fortnight, and when I had thoughts they were bilious-hued thoughts. Life had been deliciously sweet to me once or twice; and I myself had been, as all women are, enchantingly beautiful for an hour or so; but all that was long ago, and now I felt I was growing old, my hair would soon be thin, and my teeth, that were so good for cracking nuts, would come out; and—why, already chits that I had taken out to walk with me when I was shy about meeting Edwin and Jack and the rest of them alone, and yet did not wish to be interrupted, were having Edwins and Jacks of their own, and were by no means inclined to return the compliment and invite me to walk out with them—though, perhaps, but for that creamy shade in the whites of my eyes I might have found comfort in the reflection—I should lack for partners some day, no doubt, and for bouquets, and all that sort of thing. True, I was heartily sick of them all long ago, and had had the love-in-a-cottage fever desperately bad, and never got it wholly out of my system; but one must dance and smile and live when one is an "Old Maid," you know. So I lay on my lounge, blue, moist, bilious, and careless if "school kept or not."

"Where is Number Forty-Five?" demanded a rich voice, a man's voice, rolling the r's and separating the syllables in such manner that our Irish maid, of whom the question was asked, was fain to have it repeated.

"Indade an' its nowhere about here, I'm sure," was her answer, kindly spoken.

"Is not this Washington Street?" with an indescribable broadening of the a. Yes, it was Washington Street, and no more was said; and a man's light, quick step, not hurried, and perhaps not so much light as elastic, went creaking past the shuttered window through which his voice had reached to me. To me? Yes to my very innermost soul, to the very depths of my heart. The heat and languor had gone as if never to return.

Katie went back to her work wondering what language it was at all that the stranger spoke—and I put my hands over my eyes, as if so doing could shut out from my ears the ring of the accent I knew so well, that I had ached to recall, although I had heard it only from one person before, and that was—oh, ages on ages ago! This was a rich voice, certainly, and clear; and that other, though rich and clear too, was sweet and low; deep, yet ringing, like "sabbath bells a long way off," and took my heart from me before ever my eyes had seen the speaker's face; yet unlike as the voices were, they spoke with the same sweet accent, and my heart—not my everyday heart that you see upon all occasions, but that other kept saved for Sundays and high holidays—sprang like a prisoner suddenly got loose upon his jailer, and held me, trembling, quivering, without voice to cry for help, in its desperate grasp.

There is no Number Forty-Five in our Washington Street; that is to say, Number Forty-Five is a vacant lot, which fact I knew Katie's interrogator would soon discover for himself; so I went out on the porch that I might see him, when having gone to the end of the street, which is only a little beyond us, he should retrace his steps. I did not wait long for his return: a stout, middle-aged, middle-class man, in fresh broadcloth, rugged and ruddy as Americans never are—there was no doubting the man that owned the voice. Even if I had not heard him speak I should have known his country from his face, for it was the "representative face" that I had seen in a hundred paintings—rugged and ruddy, I said, but no redder blood, though of a coarser flavor, than that which glowed under the bronzed cheeks, and once, twice (never-to-be-forgotten times!), burned on the forehead, white as a blonde maiden's, that I knew. Emphatically—if any face so unmarked can be called emphatic—a common face had this passer-by, though foreign, and that other, its features would hardly have seemed too large for a girl; but how in the street, in the cars, every where, people turned, looked, and bowed down to the quiet eyes and the chiseled mouth, that told, even when smiling—and how they could smile—they would carry their owner right to the stake if need were. But both faces had taken their first look at heaven under the same far-away skies; so I stood by a pillar of the porch, and watched the stranger as he came toward me, with nothing of disappointment or irresolution in his step; speaking hopefully and kindly, as if Number Forty-Five were but a yard away, to the child whose hand he held, a girl of ten or so, whose hot dress, large hat, and most of all, whose meek, patient, un-asking, uncomplaining expression, such as all the Old-World children have, made her look even more foreign than her companion. As they came near, their eyes, hers dark and wistful, his blue and curious, met mine fully, and did not drop as long as they did not need to turn their heads in order to see me—very likely there was that in mine which did not rebuke the gaze.

Straightway I built a romance for the two, father and daughter, as they undoubtedly were. They had likely just arrived in our "sweetest land beneath the sun," and I could not rid myself of the fancy, born of I know not what, that they were seeking not home, money, liberty, or any of the usual bubbles that bring foreigners by the thousand to our shores, but some person; and my man, for all his commonplace air, was not the one to be easily discouraged. I could see that by his undaunted manner as he turned back the weary length of Washington Street after the vain search for Number Forty-Five. He wasn't the man, either, to come all the way to America for a purpose and make a mistake in a given number—don't ask me how I knew that, be satisfied that there was no question about it. Number Forty-Five he had been told, whether in ignorance or with design, and now what was he to do? What did he feel? Where would he go? I asked myself a thousand questions, I thought of a thousand things as I stood on the porch after they had passed out of my sight; but most of all, I know not why, I could not help thinking of weak, wandering women, blushing maidens, happy wives fairly wooed and won once, now blind to the old love and wild for something new, who have left home and country and their good name, mad for love or some passing fancy misnamed love—of a "brief happiness" or a wild emotion that passed for such, then desertion, remorse, misery, poverty, illness, desolation, death. Number Forty-Five would have been a tenement-house had it been a house at all, just such as that to which such a woman would finally sink; and my stranger, commonplace, well-to-do, unsentimental as he seemed, and doubtless was, was just the one to cross the dividing ocean—twenty oceans if need be—find, and save her. There would be no scene, you may be sure, should he succeed: supper for himself, a bed for the child, a doctor and some broth for her—all in the same matter-of-course way.

There are a few notes, a flat, dark photograph full of hollows and lines such as I never saw on a human face, of an officer in United States uniform, some tarnished gold-lace, a scrap of MS. poetry, and a few such trifles that I keep—to burn some day. I did not look at them that night—where would have been the good of it? and how could I? But that heart that had got out of prison, that maniac that had burst open the door of his cell, clamored for the brown eyes, the bonnie, bonnie brown eyes, dear eyes, tender eyes, smiling brown eyes that showered such delicious love on mine in the grand old days before the key was turned in the prison door. I used to feel the answering light come dancing to mine all the way from my heart, such light as I can never bring to my eyes now, however recklessly I flirt with Edwin and Jack and the rest of them. I used to feel the blushes, joyous blushes, long before they rejoiced his eyes on my happy face; they would come at a look of his, at the sound of his voice—that sweet, sweet accent, you know—and never came without a welcome from him, you may be sure; but they come no more, though I pinch my cheeks, or Jack or the others talk folly to me by the hour.

Now I am hot and impetuous, I like fiery words and blows to correspond; but his was the white kind of heat that speaks mildly and does not seem inclined to strike at all. Perhaps it does not strike, but it lays its hand ever so gently on its foe, and no blows that ever were given are half so avenging as that consuming heat; but I was younger then, and did not know this; I wanted an outburst, and when none came I became possessed of a terrible fear lest I had been deceived—had deceived myself, and that he did not love me. Perhaps he did not; no man ever gives up the girl he loves who has once shown love for him. Stung by this terror I crushed my heart into silence and spurred my pride into speech; cold, angry words, an answer kind and gentle, and all was over. I never saw his face again, I never heard his voice again, I never heard his name again; I knew of him only that he was lost to me, that all, all was over. I fancy my soul grew to look like the children you see sometimes in alms-houses—they hardly seem human, they are so lean, so pinched, so hollow-eyed, so ravenous and hungry-looking; but if so, my body showed no sign; there was still enough of it to give my soul a habitation, and that is all our bodies are made for, is it not?

I tell you all this so that you will understand why I watched the strangers, not in themselves especially attractive, with so much interest, and why I spent the long summer twilight thinking of old times forever gone, and wondering what fate or fancy had crossed my path with these foreigners. It did not occur to me they might have been an innocent couple looking for board, or come to pay a visit to some country cousin. I could not divest them of a certain romance, and over and over again I wished I could know whom they were seeking, and where that child would rest her tired head that night. We are told the world is full of romances; there was a love-story under the grim looks of the sour-faced wearer of the black bombazine, you know, and why not here? But sleep came to me at last, and tender dreams of the bonnie eyes, looking up to heaven under what skies, north, south, east, or west, who could tell me? And oh! who could tell me if looking up at any sky? But if only for those happy dreams they had not crossed my path without a purpose.

Now, my little dears, who are so kind as to read my story, listen to me and take a word of warning from me: whatever else you do, never say that there is one thing that you will never do; for, mark my words, that is the very thing that of all things you will be most sure to do. If there was one thing more than another that from babyhood up I most despised, it was indecision; decide on something and stand by it, had always been my rule; "unstable as water" my judgment upon those for whom I had the most thorough contempt, and, of course, I was to be punished for it. I was to learn that indecision in a weak mind is to indecision in a strong mind as the bubbling of a brook to a storm-tossed ocean. Spite of the one night's happy dreams, it was an ill day for me when that sturdy foreigner rolled his r's and broadened his a's so near my window. I had been nourishing a wholesome, well-behaved, perfectly commendable affection for an excellent gentleman, young, rich, handsome, brave, and good—in every way just suited to me, who had for months honored me with his exclusive attention, and what purpose could it serve that these memories should be stirred up again? The Captain had come and gone, he had had the first flowers of my garden, perhaps; but in reality we know the first flowers are only prized because they are the first, and could never hold up their heads, pale violets and shivering crocuses, if they came in the time of roses; he had gone and there was the end. I almost hated these foreigners, and the more so when I became convinced that they were boarding very near us, so that I could not go out without meeting them; and they never met me without the same look into my eyes that I had noticed in the beginning, and oh! I did so love their language! There was a struggle between the present and the past that whatever else it did, bade fair to hopelessly wreck my future. I saw well all the folly, knew well all the madness of lingering near that child, smiling on her as I passed, giving her flowers for the sake of the sweet "thanks" that would send me on my way with a tingling in my ears, and a pleasure so keen that it was pain, or else pain so thrilling that it was pleasure in my heart. I knew it was folly, but still I lingered, still I drew her to me, still I was mad to hear her speak. And evidently the child dearly loved me. Her father, when he was at home, always kept her in sight and hearing even when I spoke to her, but he never addressed me himself, the lines are so firmly drawn in those old countries. "I will give him a touch of New World independence," I said to myself one day, and taking Jessie's hand, I went toward him, as he sat on the steps of his boarding-house. He arose instantly, independent but respectful, and showing no surprise. "I should like to take Jessie home with me," I said; "the dearest friend I ever had came from your country, and has made that land very dear to me; for that alone I should love the language she speaks, had she not herself won my heart." I am afraid the last phrase was a little bit of a story, but it was the natural ending of the sentence.

"You are very kind to my lonely child," he said; I have often wished that I might thank you."

"Will you trust me? May she come to me?"

"I am proud to have her with you," he answered, courteously; and Jessie and I thanked him, each in her way, and from that time out she was daily with me. Clarence came and went, tender and thoughtful for me as ever, brought Jessie toys and candy, and little dreamed of what she was to me a symbol. She was a quiet child enough, no care to any one; not shy, but undemonstrative; if at times some word, or name, or unconscious allusion—so like—so like—let loose a flood of memories upon my heart, and I would catch her in my arms and passionately kiss the lips that blessed yet tortured me, she would take my kisses quietly, making no return, and when my hold loosened slip gravely from my side; yet I was sure she loved me. "It must be their way," I explained to myself, and the Captain's quietness, that I had lately called indifference, became more comprehensible to me. No childish sports for Jessie; even picture-books aroused but slight interest; but she would listen all day if one would tell her stories, and she was always happy in her staid, reserved way if I gave her work to do—stringing my buttons, sorting my silks, or putting my ribbon-box in order. She could talk, too, in a quaint manner, doubly odd in so young a child, of the great ocean, of the steamer in which she came out, of people who had noticed her, and now and then, not often, of some one at home; but never a word, could I have stooped to seek it, of her father's mission here. She was born with a full share of Scotch caution, in comparison with which, as we all know, a stone-wall is an irreclaimable babbling. She was once with me for a whole week, night and day, while her father was away on business, and a weary week it was to me. I was not used to children, and she often put a restraint upon my thoughts just by her presence, and prevented, for she was constantly with me, any thing definite from Clarence, to whom alone I now looked for escape from the confusion and distress of my divided heart; if he would only force me to love him! I sighed to myself, forgetting, or trying to forget, that force was not in his nature; but when most I felt little Jessie as a restraint I compelled myself to remember that she was a forlorn little stranger—motherless, brotherless, sisterless—all alone but for me; and my heart was not so hard but that at the thought I would put aside my dreaming, draw the child to me, and, however weary work it seemed, tell her the stories that were her greatest delight. But I no longer loved her gentle accent, it only irritated me, for it was ever reminding me that it was not that which I had known of old, and, honest truth to tell, I was not sorry when her father came for her at last, and, taking her hand from me, said, not entirely without emotion:

"You have been very kind to my poor, motherless child, that never felt a tender woman's touch but yours, ma'am. May you be rewarded for it!" At which I felt ashamed, as at receiving praise not my due. "All her life," he added, "the lassie will be the better and the sweeter for having known you these few days. You'll remember that when she is gone, and perhaps it will repay you."

"It will, indeed; but I hope to do more for her before she goes—in truth, I have not commenced yet. I hope it will be a long time before she goes away from here."

"I do not know," he answered, and said with hesitation, and as if surprised at his own communicativeness. "My business in this country is almost finished, I think; and if it ends as I hope it will be a good day for the people over yonder."

"I am glad to hear that," I answered, not knowing what else to say.

"I do not know yet, it may be all a mistake, but I have hope," he said, and, taking Jessie's hand more decidedly, raised his hat and was about leaving, when once again he grew communicative: "I may know to-morrow, if so we shall leave at once; if ever Jessie seems likely to forget to pray for her benefactress she shall be reminded."

The next morning Jessie came to tell me all was happily settled, and they should leave that evening or the next morning; and then I began to realize how much I had grown to love the little thing, who now, excited by the thought of going home, became for the first time since I had known her a real child. She laughed, she almost danced, and talked almost by the hour, a thoroughly childish babble, new names, new delights springing up from every part of her talk until my head ached at the meaningless, monotonous flow, and the shrill, childish treble.

I sat a long time putting up some presents for her, and for those whose names had been oftenest on her lips, not forgetting a cake for "Jamie," a new name; some one who was to return with them, and for whom I judged the fatted calf was to be killed; for now I divined that "Jamie"—adventurous laddie, and no worn consumptive!—had been the object of the sturdy foreigner's resolute search. I sat a long time putting up little trinkets for her to give her friends, for I was trying to understand for what purpose these people had crossed my pathway, or I theirs, for it could not have been without a purpose, surely; but I could make nothing of it. "It must be that I am to be rich some day, and when I die I am to leave my money to Jessie; so she will be able to marry the one she loves, and enjoy the happiness I have missed. It is for this she has been sent across the ocean to win the old maid's heart, or whatever there is left of it," I said at last.

And, truth to tell, this was not all: Clarence, who was swinging her on the lawn now, was bewitched by her as much as ever a grown man was by a child—not in love, of course; she was too young for that; and I do not think his heart was at all free, but bewitched by her as by some little pet sister. "Good-by, dear, sweet accent!" I said, as the time grew near for her father to come for her. "Good-by! shall I ever, ever hear it again? Yes, perhaps; but when it comes again I shall be a hopeless old maid, or somebody's dutiful wife. If I die soon enough Clarence may make Jessie his second wife, and so—good-by!" And if the tears worked themselves up to my eyes was it strange? I was saying farewell to the last link that bound me to the golden past—the farewell I was not permitted to say to it. "I will marry Clarence, and be a good wife to him, and never again shall the old romance leave its prison; nay, I will destroy it altogether to-night." And so resolving—and I knew I had strength for the resolve, and would be happier keeping it—I rose to meet the foreigner, as I still must call him, whose step I already heard on the gravel-walk, coming to take Jessie home for good and all.

Poor Jessie! how I should miss her! How I hate partings! I could hardly turn to greet her father, who was just raising the curtain of the low, open window which we used as a door, saying: "I beg your pardon; is Jessie here?"

How I ever did turn I do not know, for it was not the voice that had asked for Number Forty-Five, but, unless I had passed into another world, the voice that I had given my heart to ages on ages before. Then slowly, like people walking in their sleep, our eyes never moving nor changing their fixed gaze, we approached each other and took up the silver cord just where it had been hacked at years ago, and the first words that were spoken were the three that should have been said then; the music of the sweetest accent on earth filled my aching ears with joy unutterable; the red color and the loving light came back again as gayly as of old; and never, I think, while life shall last, can they fail to come at his bidding.

When, long afterward, a light step and a child's shrill voice were heard, and I drew my hand from his, I was hardly surprised to hear Jessie say, smiling up to Clarence who looked sadly and tenderly down at her: "This is Jamie come for me, and he is going home with us to-morrow."

"No, not to-morrow, nor to-morrow, nor for any to-morrow until you, my darling, go with me," he whispered.

There is a stout, middle-aged, middle-class man who has a right to feel greatly aggrieved; at the supplication of anxious friends he came to this country, and sought day and night for a young gentleman who had contrived to make nearly every one fear, if they could not believe, he was dead, and when at last he found the long-looked-for youth, was forced to travel back without him! It was hard, I own, and, if any thing could happen without a reason, would make it seem certain that his had been a useless chase; but he does not seem to think it such, and I have never wondered, since that night, why Jessie and her father came across the ocean to find NUMBER FORTY-FIVE.

THE BIRTH-PLACE OF NAPOLEON I.

IT will always be the chief pride of Ajaccio that she gave birth to the great Emperor. Close to the harbor, in a public square by the sea-beach, stands an equestrian statue of the conqueror surrounded by his four brothers on foot. They are all attired in Roman fashion, and are turned to the west, as if to symbolize the emigration of this family to conquer Europe. There is something ludicrous and forlorn in the stiffness of the group—something even pathetic, when we think how Napoleon gazed seaward, westward, from another island, no longer on horseback, no longer laurel-crowned, an unthroned, unseated conqueror, on St. Helena. His father's house stands close by. An old Italian waiting-woman, who had been long in the service of the Murats, keeps it and shows it. She has the manners of a lady, and can tell many stories of the various members of the Bonaparte family. Those who fancy that Napoleon was born in a mean dwelling of poor parents will be surprised to find so much space and elegance in these apartments. Of course his family was not rich by comparison with the riches of French or English nobles. But for Corsicans they were well-to-do, and their house has an air of antique dignity. The chairs of the entrance-saloon have been literally stripped of their coverings by enthusiastic visitors: the horse-hair stuffing underneath protrudes itself with a sort of comic pride, as if protesting that it came to be so tattered in an honorable service. Some of the furniture seems new; but many old presses inlaid with marbles, agates, and lapis lazuli, such as Italian families preserve for generations, have an air of respectable antiquity about them. Nor is there any doubt that the young Napoleon led his minutes beneath the stiff girandoles of the formal dancing-room. There, too, in a dark back-chamber, is the bed in which he was born. At its foot is a photograph of the present Prince Imperial sent by the Empress Eugénie, who, when she visited the room, wept much at seeing the place where such lofty destinies began. On the wall of the same room is a portrait of Napoleon himself as the young general of the Republic—with the citizen's unkempt hair, the fierce fire of the Revolution in his eyes, a frown upon his forehead, lips compressed, and quivering nostrils; also one of his mother, the pastille of a handsome woman, with Napoleonic eyes and brows and nose, but with a vacant, smirking mouth. Perhaps the provincial artist knew not how to seize the expression of this feature, the most difficult to draw. For we can not fancy that Letizia had lips without the firmness or the fullness of a majestic nature.

The whole first story of this house belonged to the Bonaparte family. The windows look out partly on a little court and partly on narrow streets. It was, no doubt, the memory of this home that made Napoleon, when Emperor, design schemes for the good of Corsica—schemes that might have brought him more honor than many conquests, but which he had no time or leisure to carry out. On St. Helena his mind often reverted to them, and he would speak of the gummy odors of the macchi wafted from the hill-sides to the sea-shore.

SWITZERLAND IN WINTER.

WINTER is always present with the traveler in Switzerland, even under the glowing August sun. The ice crowns of the Bernese Oberlands never melt; and their silver beauty under the red shimmer of the rising and setting sun, or their fairy forms under the full moonlight, is one of the most glorious of the changing scenes offered by Nature among the Alps. Often during the hot afternoons, when an almost drunken lassitude exhales from the meadows, heavy with flowers, and the more distant fir forests, a refreshing coolness wafts down from these ice regions, whose everlasting winter has been consoled by the sun-rays of centuries, whose aspect in the midst of the summer world possesses something so contained, so rejoicing, and pure, and whose liquefying snow-springs feed the waterfalls rushing among the ravines, often so hidden with underbrush as to be invisible, but still always heard like the hollow resounding of Time.

But winter has also a frightful aspect in Switzerland, up among the glaciers, the ascent of which has already demanded so many offerings—so many human lives—drawn on by their secret grandeur, and now lying thousands of feet below, launched over the cliffs into the abysses, as the Sphinx hurled the wretched man who could not unravel its riddle. On approaching this grand solitude, having left behind the smiling valleys below, one asks himself how it is possible that the winter—the real winter, from October to April—could add any thing to the desolation where the whole year was such a winter as this.

But it is nevertheless possible. In winter the tinkling bells of the flocks are no longer heard sounding merrily from summit to valley; the cows are no longer seen feeding on the patches of green-sward that glitter like emeralds among the silver glaciers; and no herdsmen or peasant women, with bouquets of Alpine roses in their hand, break the monotony of the solitude that reigns every where around. Then even these last signs of life disappear from the higher Alpine world; then it is still and noiseless here; even the trickling of the water is no longer heard; for the Frost catches the waterfalls, and rivets them to the rocks as they fall. Then it is lifeless—not even a bird ventures into the snowy atmosphere, and only here and there, in two or three hospitals, man and his faithful companion the dog still remain, sheltered behind a rampart of stakes and straw, in order to rescue a wanderer or to bury the dead.

But winter is the time of rest for the Swiss villages which nestle at the foot of the cliffs. In summer half the village is empty; for the herdsmen and flocks are above on the declivities, where are produced the milk and cheese, the chief produce of these regions.

Our illustration gives a picture of winter on the Rosenlaui. The pines are covered with snow, and the ground glitters with ice. In summer it is a beautiful spot—a charming resting-place for the traveler on his way from Meyringen to Lauterbach or the Wengern Alps: but now no one would willingly seek this pass, through which the freezing blast whistles and moans so drearily. But what matters this to the villagers? In the earthen stove in the cottage a comfortable fire is burning, and in the stalls is abundance of straw and hay for the cherished cow. Life is happy enough here for them, even if they are far from the world without. How much these men and women have to love!—their children, their servants, their cows, and the mountains—and these are all with them; and in the mean time the winter passes, the ice melts, the meadows grow green, and the pines send out new shoots, while the Alps again resound with the merry sounds of life.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE new oxygen gas-light, about which so much interest was manifested a few months ago, is to be introduced into some parts of New York as a matter of experiment. A laboratory is to be erected, and by the middle of November consumers may be supplied, unless some unexpected obstacle arises. In brilliancy and cheapness this light is said to be altogether superior to any which has hitherto been in ordinary use. It is stated that a double set of pipes are placed throughout Booth's new theatre on Sixth Avenue, so that advantage may be taken of this oxygen light when it is fairly introduced into the city.

Subscription books for the relief of the sufferers by the recent earthquakes in South America have been opened by a number of prominent persons in this city. Whatever is received will be forwarded to the Peruvian Minister at Washington, and be sent to Peru and Ecuador according to the directions of subscribers.

A "Matrimonial Office" has been established in San Francisco, under the control—according to the advertisement—of a lady of "discretion, mature years, and conscientious principles." A California paper remarks in regard to the "concern": "It is our candid opinion that a fellow who hasn't got nerve enough to do his own 'courting' would make a poor apology for a husband; and a woman who can't get married without resorting to a 'Matrimonial Agency' for aid had better be allowed to 'paddle her own canoe.'"

The scandal-monger does not require much capital to start business. A rumor was recently spread abroad that a highly respectable citizen of San Francisco had left town in company with a young lady twenty-two years of age. The gossip was only silenced by an authentic statement that the respectable citizen was an undertaker, and that the young lady was dead. Akin to this is a story circulated in the papers not long ago, that a wealthy elderly gentleman of Portland, Maine, had "gone off" with a young lady about eighteen, leaving a wife and several children at home. It was very true. The old gentleman had taken his eldest daughter with him to visit friends in Boston.

Some enterprising young people in the vicinity of the city of Boston have announced their approaching marriage by sending to their friends envelopes containing eight cards each. First the individual names of bride and bridegroom, two cards; then their joint title after marriage, three; the reception, four; ceremony at church, five; name of clergyman, six; ushers, etc., seven; times of special trains to and from Boston to accommodate guests, eight. Is this a reaction from the custom of "no cards?"

In the old Roman times fancy and poetry entered even the kitchen. It was not thought out of place to have the kitchen-walls covered with pictures in fresco, to have a marble floor, and utensils of the finest bronze lined with gold and silver. "It might be a pleasant pastime," remarks a facetious writer on the subject, "to broil on a gridiron whose silver bars represented the ribs of a skeleton fish, or to fry in a silver tortoise or in a huge, terrible spider. To boil water in an elephant's head, and to pour it through the trunk for a spout, might be rather entertaining." Perhaps modern ladies would enjoy domestic avocations more if some of the expense of the parlor was transferred to the kitchen furniture.

Are our sidewalks designed to be mere store-houses for goods belonging to private individuals? Such seems to be the case in certain parts of our city. There are not a few streets where no regard is paid to the convenience of pedestrians; they may go into the middle of the street, or clamber over the boxes, barrels, trucks, and impediments of all kinds, which block up the sidewalk, just as they please. Those who are at work, filling up the public thoroughfares with bales of goods, seem to regard it as too great an act of courtesy to give a thought or look to the convenience of passers-by. If they can crowd through, at the risk of life and limb, very well. If the ordinary sidewalks must be used exclusively for bales and boxes of goods, let us have an extra plank of two for people to walk upon.

In connection with this topic we are reminded of an incident. The other day a lady was walking along the sidewalk of a certain street where some building had been recently erected; and there are several similar streets in our city just at present. She happened to have on a new silk walking suit, though that fact does not affect the real character of the act we are about to speak of—it is only an incidental circumstance which will awaken the sympathies of our lady readers. Suddenly the lady felt a shower of clammy drops which besprinkled her from head to foot. In amazement she looked up. A careless painter, perched upon a railing attached to a building, had shaken his paint-brush over the sidewalk. That was all! And so little did he think or care about it, that when some observer called out, "You've spoiled the lady's dress!" he never stopped his work an instant. As to the lady—bottles of benzine, ether, and turpentine, procured from the nearest druggist, failed to restore the dress to a respectable condition. The new suit was ruined.

An English antiquarian, who really must have been in pressing want of occupation, has found that between the years 1276 and 1419 the most fashionable name for girls was Joanna, or Joan, and that after that the following names, in their respective order, were considered most desirable: Cristina, Isabel, Matilda, Juliana, Aleson (now Alice), Lucy, Fernel, Agnes, Idonia, and Avica.

Dr. Holland, writing from Scotland to the Springfield Republican, remarks: "Loch Katrine is a beautiful lake, but no more beautiful than a thousand lakes to be found in the length and breadth of America. The Highlands are picturesque and fine eminences; but there is nothing about them more beautiful than about those one sees from the steamer's deck, as he sails up Lake George."

A young couple were recently married in the Gothic chapel of the Mammoth Cave in Kentucky. It is reported that during the ceremony, attracted by the Bengal lights, all the bugs and insects in the cave congregated about the bridal party to witness the marriage.

It is dangerous nowadays to be the possessor of beautiful hair—real hair, growing on one's own head, we mean. A story comes from abroad of two young Parisians who went to spend Sunday in the country with their lovers, and having enjoyed themselves through the day, were seen safely home. But they both had beautiful hair, and the next morning they found it had been cut off. Another young woman, possessing a like treasure, was assaulted at night in her own room by a false lover, who announced that he had come to "shear" her. While he was cutting her tresses the police, attracted by her cries, arrived, and rescued her.

Professor Augustus Matthiessen, F.R.S., in his lecture on "Alloys" and their uses, before the Royal Institution of Great Britain, declares that no two metals are known which do not dissolve when in combination and acted on by water.

A wealthy lady, living in the country, went to consult a celebrated oculist, complaining that her power of vision was diminishing. The doctor perceived she was a lady of wealth, so he looked at the eyes, shook his head, said there was reason to fear amaurosis, and advised her to move to the city, where he could see her daily. She followed his advice, and days ran into weeks and months, but the cure had not been effected. The patient devised a scheme. She disguised herself, and, in poor clothing, visited her physician, waiting, as other poor people did, in the ante-room. "Very bad eyes, doctor," she said, when at length admitted. The doctor took her to the light, looked into her eyes, but failed to recognize his patient. Shrugging his shoulders, he said:

"Your eyes are well enough."
"Well?" she said.
"Yes, yes; and I know what I am saying."
"But I have been told that I was getting the a—a—forgot how it is called."
"Amaurosis?"
"Yes, that is it, doctor."
"Don't you let them make you believe any such nonsense. Your eyes are a little weak, but that is all. Gracious, Madam!" stammered the physician, as the lady suddenly revealed her identity by changing her voice and removing her uncouth bonnet. No apologies, however, were accepted—the patient left indignantly.

To be able to speak one's own language with correctness, propriety, and elegance, is really a matter of the highest importance. "Does she speak English well?" was an inquiry made, abroad, respecting a lady whose position at home it was desired to ascertain. For vulgar speech betrays, if not a vulgar origin, at least vulgar associates; whereas a correct pronunciation, a proper choice of words, and a gentle tone of voice and inflection, universally produce a favorable impression. Still, people who are not gifted with those acquisitions must be very cautious about what they do. A person's natural phraseology, even if incorrect, is better far than affectation. Unusual turns of phrase and fine words unnecessarily dragged into a commonplace conversation are simply ridiculous, especially as they are very likely to be misapplied.

London is becoming alarmed about its water supply. It is both inadequate in quantity and impure in quality. Every gallon of water delivered in London has to be pumped up from nearly the sea level to an average height of two hundred and fifty feet, and then the supply is unreliable. Immense engines consuming two hundred tons of coal per diem are necessary to raise the present daily supply of one hundred million gallons to the required level. Several schemes are being agitated for supplying this great city thoroughly and permanently with water. One scheme promises a daily supply of 220,000,000 gallons at a cost of about $55,000,000; another will furnish 250,000,000 a day for about $68,000,000. Whatever plan is adopted will involve an immense expense.

Victor Hugo and Lamartine were long ago firm friends. Madame Hugo was a French woman; Madame Lamartine was born in England; but both were deeply devoted to their husbands. When Madame Lamartine died, Victor Hugo wrote to Lamartine the following note:

"Hautville House, May 23, 1863.
"DEAR LAMARTINE.—A great misfortune has befallen you. I am anxious to place my heart side by side with yours. I generated the one you loved. Your high mind sees above the horizon; you distinctly perceive the future life. It is useless to say to you 'Hope.' You are one of those who know and wait. She is still your companion, invisible though present. You have lost the woman, but not her soul. Dear friend, let us live with the dead.
"Yours, VICTOR HUGO."

Adventures and Misadventures of

CHAPTER XIII.

I BEGIN MY APPRENTICESHIP.

"WHAT devil's work is this?" I cried, drawing my sword, and looking toward Everard Lestrangle, who stood at some distance from me, and very close to the door, as if anxious to secure a convenient retreat.

"Oh, Robin, they told me 'twas your wish to marry me!"

"And the desperado draws his sword on the prettiest girl in Bucks!" exclaimed Everard Lestrangle; "was there ever such a savage?"

"It is upon you that I draw my sword, liar and traitor!" I gasped. "Your life or mine shall answer for this night's work."

"I decline to cross swords with a—"

Before the foul word could pass his lips I sprang toward him with uplifted hand, and should have struck him across the face with my open palm but for Philip Hay and the parson, who clutched at my arm, and held me off by their united strength.

"What a fire-eater this foundling of my lady's is!" cried Mr. Lestrangle, with his languid sneer. "But why all this outcry? The wife we have given you is young and pretty, and 'twould only have served you right if we had tied you to some wrinkled harridan of the town. True, 'tis not the lady to whose hand and fortune your insolence aspired; but it is scarce six months since you swore you were ready to marry this one at a moment's notice, if her father could find her for you."

"I offered to marry an honest woman," I answered, "not your cast-off mistress."

My foster-sister sank to my feet with a stifled groan. God help us both! I had but hit the mark too well.

"No; 'twas my other mistress you wanted, with twenty-five thousand pounds for her fortune. You were welcome to my mistress—when I had done with her."

"Devil! Will you fight me in this room—this moment?" I cried, huskily.

"No; I will fight you neither here nor elsewhere, neither now nor at any future time, for a reason which I hinted just now, and which you need not force me to state more broadly. You are no mark for a gentleman's weapon.—Hold the fellow tight, Phil Hay; I have but a few words to say, and am gone."

"Let me go, Hay!" cried I; "why do you obey that scoundrel?"

"Because he is paid to obey me, as ma'am-selle yonder has been paid for her part in the comedy. Do you suppose a man of the world like myself was to be ousted and cheated by your bumpkinship, without trying to turn the tables on you? I saw how you were playing your cards from the day we came to Hauteville. Your father was my father's rival, and it was natural to me to hate you. And you, my lady step-mother's beggarly foundling, must needs come between me and the girl that was betrothed to me. A pretty gentleman indeed to steal my mistress! I saw through your artifices, and when you came to London took care to place my spy upon your track."

"What!" I roared, shaking myself free from Philip's grasp.

"Yes, Mr. Simplicity; your chosen friend and boon companion is my led-captain, Mr. Hay, a gentleman who has been in my service for the last five years."

"Oh God, what a dastardly world!"

"Forgive me, Bob; thou'rt the best fellow I ever knew, and I love thee with all my heart," said Hay, with a strange softness in his tone; "but I am a scoundrel by profession. 'Tis one of the trades poor men live by, you see, and men must live."

"Yes, and vipers too; they plead their privilege to crawl and sting. Great God, this is hard!"

I sank into a chair, touched to the very heart by this hideous treachery. I had grown fonder of the man than I thought. As I sat for some moments, confounded, forgetful of Everard Lestrangle, I felt a little hand thrust gently into mine. It was Margery's. The wretched girl had not yet risen from the spot where she had sunk down at my feet.

"Forgive me, Robin," she pleaded; "indeed I did not know it was a trick that was to be played on thee, or I would have died before I had taken part in it. He—Everard—told me it was your wish to marry me; and oh, Robin, I have been cruelly deceived, and am not so guilty as I seem. I will never trouble you, dear; you shall see me no more; and the marriage can be undone."

"Yes," cried Everard Lestrangle; "by grim death! Pallida mors is the only parson who can cut the knot which my friend yonder has just tied."

"The bride was married under a false name," I said.

"Yes; but the true one is in the register."

I turned eagerly to the greasy volume that lay open upon the table. Yes, there, below my own signature, appeared that of Margaret Hawker. I remembered how my attention had been distracted while the bride was writing.

"The ceremony could not be more binding if it had been performed in Westminster Abbey. Mrs. Margery is as honest a wife as Lady Caroline Fox. Ma'am-selle Adolphine will go back to her service the richer for a fifty-pound note, and will carry her young mistress the pleasing intelligence of your marriage."

"And do you think I will not carry the truth to Miss Hemslay?"

"That will depend on your opportunities. You made an engagement this evening which you may find somewhat inconvenient to you in your character of bridegroom, and which will certainly put a stop to any stolen visits to the ladies in St. James's Square."

"I made an engagement! What engagement?"

"Sure, 'twas an engagement to serve the honorable East India Company over in Bengal, and a glorious career it is for a courageous young man!" cried a familiar voice close at hand, and Sergeant O'Blagg came into the room, closely followed by a couple of ruffian-looking fellows in military trowsers and dingy ragged shirts, while three or four others looked in from the doorway.

Before I could utter so much as one cry of anger or surprise, these two scoundrels had gripped me on either side. What followed was the work of a few moments—a sharp, brief struggle for liberty, in which I fought as a man only fights for something dearer than life, striking out right and left, while the hot blood poured over my face from a wound on my head.

I had but just time to see Everard Lestrangle and the Frenchwoman rush from the room, dragging Margery with them, while a long, piercing shriek from that wretched girl rang out, shrill above the clamor of the rest; the floor presently by a faint odor of vinegar and a hand pressing a mug of water to my lips with almost womanly softness.

"Who's that?" I asked, opening my eyes.

"One who has deserved your scorn and hatred, but will do his best to merit your forgiveness," answered a familiar voice; and I saw that the face bent over me was Philip Hay's.

"You here!" I cried; "I don't want your services. I would rather perish of thirst than take a drop of water from the hand of such a traitor. Go to your worthy employer, Sir, and claim your reward."

"I have got it, Bob. When a wise man has done with the tool he has used for his dirty work he takes care to put it out of the way. Everard Lestrangle promised me a hundred pounds—I have his written bond for the sum—for the safe carrying through of last night's work; but, you see, he finds it cheaper to hand me over to the Honorable East India Company. Dead men tell no tales, you know, Bob; and a man shipped for Bengal is as good as dead; for what with war, and fever, and famine, and hardship, 'tis long odds if he ever sees Europe again. Drink the water, Robert, in token of forgiveness. You and I are in the same boat, and it is best we should be friends. I was never your enemy but in the way of business, and plotted against you for hire just as better men will plot against a seemed to reel beneath my feet, a roaring thunderous noise sounded in my ears, and I knew no more.

"IT IS UPON YOU THAT I DRAW MY SWORD, LIAR AND TRAITOR!"

I opened my eyes upon the semi-darkness of a dilapidated garret, where I found myself lying on a dirty mattress of hay or flock. The atmosphere was thickened with tobacco-smoke, and what feeble light there was came from two small windows in the slooping roof, closely barred, and festooned with cobwebs. It was the most wretched place I had ever seen, and for some time after waking from sleep or stupor I knew not whether it was not an underground dungeon in which I found myself prisoner.

I lay for some time but half awake, staring at the bare walls of my prison with a kind of stupid wonder, as if it had been a strange picture in a book which I contemplated half asleep, and no-wise concerned in the matter. Then, by slow degrees, came a little more consciousness, and I felt that I was in some remote degree interested in this dreary place, and in this aching mass of flesh and bone lying on a mattress but a little softer than the ground.

I tried to lift my right arm, but found it powerless and smarting with some recent wound. On this I raised my left, which moved freely enough, but not without some pain, and felt my head, which was bound with wet rags. After this effort I closed my eyes, and was awakened king. Say you forgive me, child. We are too miserable to afford ourselves the luxury of resentment. But for my care it is ten to one if your eyes had ever opened on this wretched place, and if you had not been thrust into a nameless grave by night with scarce a prayer said over your poor clay."

"I do not thank you for that," I answered, bitterly; "death would be better than to waken in such a place as this."

"Alas, I claim no thanks, Bob; I only ask you to believe that I love thee."

"Is it possible for me to think that after the way you have used me?"

"It was in my bond, Bob. You have heard of the honor that obtains among thieves. I had pledged myself to carry through this business; and then there was another inducement—I desperately wanted that hundred pounds. Egad, Bob, I could have sold my own brother for less money. Joseph's brethren did it, you know, and he treated them uncommonly handsomely afterward. Besides, I was in that reptile's pay."

"And your liberal Mr. Cave, and your history of the Amazons?"

"All purely mythological as those ladies themselves, Robert. I have done an occasional article for Cave; and I know his scrub and hackney writer Samuel Johnson—a man that talks better than Socrates, and is content to toil in a garret for the wages of a hackney-coachman.

But the money I spent while I was with thee came from Everard Lestrangle."

"And that account of your life and adventures with which you entertained me was as mythical as the rest, I conclude?"

"No, fore Gad, Bob. I gave you a tolerably true account of myself. My sins there were but of omission. I did not tell you that after leaving Mallandaine's service I became henchman and hanger-on of your kinswoman's amiable step-son, Mr. Lestrangle, curse him!"

Here a thought flashed across me.

"And you have pandered to his vices, no doubt, as you did to those of your first patron. You can tell me how my poor little foster-sister was robbed of innocence and friends and home."

"In the usual fashion, Bob," my companion answered, with a sigh. "It is as common as an old street-ballad. The very staleness of the thing makes it hateful to a man of genius. But your man of genius must keep body and soul together somehow. There were all the old hackneyed promises—intentions honorable, family reasons why secrecy must be preserved—the old worn-out pleas; and the poor child was but too easily deluded. Your modern fine gentleman will swear to a lie with the easiest air in the world. Men have always done these things, you know; but there was a time when they did them with a bad grace, and were liable to be sorry afterward. Shame and remorse are out of fashion now. Mr. Lestrangle carried his prize over to Paris, where he introduced her to seven other spirits worse than himself, if that's possible, and was angry with the poor little thing because she sickened at such company. In short, our Don Juan soon grew tired of your little rustic beauty."

"He would have planted her on an elderly scion of the haute noblesse, who wanted something young and fresh and pretty to complete the furniture of his summer pavilion near Choisy le Roi. But against this arrangement the girl rebelled sturdily; and by this time Sir Marcus had begun to urge upon his son the necessity of an immediate marriage with the heiress, who might slip through their fingers at any moment. So Mr. Lestrangle hurries back to London, bringing his mistress with him, whom he hides in a shabby lodging hard by Covent Garden; and being well-informed of your movements by my agency, he sees that his case is somewhat desperate, and that only violent measures can serve him. Whereupon he buys over the French maid—a deceitful, abandoned creature, always ripe for treachery—and plans the agreeable plot to which you—and I, worse luck!—have fallen victims."

"And that forged letter, on the strength of which Sir Marcus was so quick to condemn me? I make no doubt you could give me some enlightenment on that subject."

"Well, yes, I have heard of the forged letter. Sir Marcus Lestrangle is a diplomatist; and it is just possible he played into his son's hand. Be sure he never relished the notion of your inheriting the bulk of Lady Barbara's fortune, which it is likely you would have done had father and son not succeeded in blasting your character. They have done their work pretty well this time, and may congratulate themselves on a rare success."

"But do you think I shall not tell my own story, and denounce their hellish stratagems, when I escape from this place?"

"Yes, friend Bob, when you escape from durance. God grant you and I may live to see the day that sets us at liberty; but I fear me my hair and yours too will be white as silver when that day comes."

"What!" I roared, "do you mean to say that in a Christian land, in this free country, of whose liberty Englishmen boast so loudly, they can make us as close prisoners as if we were clapped in some underground cell of the French Bastille, by virtue of Madame Pompadour's lettre de cachet?"

"I mean to say that the crimping sergeant into whose jaws I introduced you—more shame to me for a treacherous scoundrel!—will swear to an engagement between both of us, which latter turn of fortune but serves me fairly for my wickedness. He will hold us to an engagement never made, Bob—for the difference between crimping and kidnapping is only a distinction of words—and we shall be kept in this loathsome hole with the rest of those unlucky wretches whom you see sprawling yonder, until the Honorable East India Company are ready to draft us on board ship secretly somewhere down the river, and keep us close under hatches till we are out at open sea; and then they will land us among the cobras and tigers, to defend John Company's factories, and fight the yellow-faced Hindoos."

"But is there no such thing as escape, Phil?" I asked, in a whisper, and with a glance toward one of the small close-barred windows.

"Alas, no, Bob! We are a valuable commodity; and rely on it they keep us in a strong box."

"What! and we are held in durance within a hundred yards of the Mansion House, and can find no means of communicating with the authorities?"

"Nay, Bob, our jailers will take care to prevent us. We are here in the very heart of savage London; and not that jungle to which we shall by-and-by be drafted is better stocked with foul creeping reptiles and beasts of prey. Alas, my simple Templar, thou hast heard men talk of Alsatia, but didst not know that in this civilized city there lies a wilderness more dangerous than burning Africa's sands or Agra's pathless mountains, peopled by creatures as deadly, and even more treacherous than tiger or serpent. Thou hast not heard of the ruined houses of Shoe Lane and Stonecutter Street, and the deeds that are done in the darkness behind those blind-shuttered windows. To thee Black Mary's Hole and Copenhagen House are empty sounds, signifying nothing; but to the citizen of London those names have a sinister meaning. All this part of London is dedicated to infamy and crime; and I know not when the reforming power shall arise to sweep away these dens of iniquity. Sure 'twould take another great fire to purify them, and another plague would be scarce a calamity if it decimated their inhabitants."

"But where are we, Phil?" I asked, addressing him with my accustomed friendliness, and for the moment forgetting what reason I had to hate him. I was indeed, as he had said, too wretched to be very angry. Every other feeling was swallowed up in the overwhelming thought of my misery.

"In the next house to that where you were married. It was Mr. Lestrangle made his bargain with the parson, not I. They were lies I told you about the business. My noble patron made his plans, and found the cringing sergeant, and you and I went meek as sheep to the slaughter. We fought lustily for our lives though, Bob, both of us. Half a dozen hulking wretches, armed to the teeth, surrounded us, and when you went down I had my battle for liberty. But the odds were too many against me; and when I felt my arms pinioned, and the iron rim of a pistol's muzzle unpleasantly cold against my forehead, I threw up the sponge. 'Tis little good wounding a hydra; and I saw more hulking scoundrels lurking in the doorway. I knocked under, luckily without much hurt, and with all my senses about me, while you, poor wretch, lay like a dog at my feet. They picked you up, and carried you through a passage and doorway leading from that house into this—I following. I got a glimpse of other rooms as we were led up to this, which is at the top of a somewhat lofty house; and I saw they were full of poor wretches playing cards, and sprawling on mattresses, and drinking and brawling by the light of foul-smelling tallow-candles, prisoners like ourselves. Whereby I conclude there is a house full of recruits for the Honorable East India Company's service, waiting till there is a vessel ready on which to draft them. The Company charter ships nowadays; but not long ago they did all their trading on their own bottoms."

It was quite dark by this time; and I asked my companion how long we had been in this dismal place.

"Something less than twenty hours. It was last night, or this morning at two o'clock, that we were taken prisoners. There has been an old hag in and out half a dozen times to see you. They want you to live, you see, for you are of some value alive, and dead there is the trouble of your burial. Folks have a knack of dying under this kind of duress. It is not three months since the good citizens about St. Bride's Church-yard were scandalized by frequent funerals that were performed under the cover of night, with maimed rites, and no entry made in the register. 'Twas found on inquiry that the corpses came from a receiving-house for East India recruits hard by, where a fever had broken out among the unhappy creatures. But this is no cheering talk, Bob, for a sick man."

"Death is the only cheerful thought you can give me," I answered, bitterly. "Death! Sure, I am dead. What can death do more than treachery has done for me?—to cut me off from all I hold dear; and, alas, I die dishonored, and my darling will be told I was a liar and hypocrite, who never loved her, and married another woman, scorning that sweet girl's affection. Death! 'Tis a thousand times worse than death. It is purgatory, a state of torment dreadful as the inextinguishable fires of hell. Get from the side of my bed, Philip Hay; for the first time I can lift my right arm I shall surely raise it to slay you. 'Tis by your help I lie perishing here."

"I deserve no better at your hands," he answered, moodily; "but you will scarcely care to murder a wretch so ready to die. It would be like slaughtering a rotten sheep. What have I to live for more than you, Master Robert? Toil and danger and scanty food, and death from the hand of some tawny heathen. Faith, we are in the same boat; and to fight and throw each other overboard would but be mutual charity!"

I heard a key turn, and the hag of whom Phil Hay had spoken came into the room with a candle and our suppers—a tempting banquet of mouldy cheese and coarse bread.

"If you want beer you must pay for it," she said, with an imbecile grin; and Philip threw her a shilling, for which she brought by-and-by a quart of liquor which my companion declared to be the vilest twopenny he had ever tasted.

"These places are on the model of sponging-houses," he said; "and if a prisoner has money he is made to bleed pretty freely. The penniless they must feed somehow, to keep life in the bodies which are wanted as food for gunpowder."

"I have a pocket-book full of notes," said I; "would it not be wise to spend them in bribing yonder hag?"

"Be sure you have the money before you talk of spending it. In such dens as these they are apt to be handy at picking a pocket. Your coat and waistcoat lie under your head for a pillow. The money was in your coat-pocket, I suppose?"

Yes, the pocket-book had been there, and it was gone—stolen in the scuffle, no doubt. I bitterly regretted this money, for I could not but believe it might have enabled me to buy over my jailers to my own interest; but I think I still more regretted the book, which contained those comforting sentences of Scripture and philosophy hastily scribbled by the hand of my benefactress.

"Is it my fate through life to lose every thing?" I asked. "Parents, before I had ever known them; friends and good name, and money and liberty. Did I enter this world doomed to loss and slavery; predestined because of my father's folly? Are my teeth to be forever set on edge by the sour grapes he ate?"

Happily—and this amidst such utter misery was the solitary consoling circumstance—I had yet the locket with my lady's portrait and hair.

which I had long ago hung round my neck by a stout black ribbon, and had worn faithfully every day of my life.

"Even if you had the money I doubt if it would serve you," said Phil Hay, seeing me lost in a gloomy despair. "The crone who waits on us is half an idiot, and too silly to aid you if she had the will. Our jailers are surly ruffians who would take your money and laugh at you afterward. 'Tis as well to be spared the anguish of a delusive hope. No, Bob, there is no chance for us but to serve our time out yonder, with the chance of coming back some day, if it is our destiny to escape fever and sword, and famine and shipwreck."

"What is the period? or is there any fixed period for our slavery?"

"Alack, I know not, friend. Were it the regular service to which we were bound, there are rules I could tell you; but of this irregular trader's company I can tell you nothing. It is an accursed monopoly, opposed to all laws of justice and common-sense; and its members make their own regulations. There was a sturdy endeavor some ten years since to throw open our commerce with the East to all adventurous merchants; but by specious argument and solid bribery, in the shape of a loan to government, the Company got their charter renewed, and have now a pretty sure footing in that distant world for which you and I have our places booked."

After this I sought no further knowledge. I was weakened by the pain of my wounds, and lay languid, almost apathetic, while Philip Hay watched and nursed me with a tenderness that could not but touch my heart, despite my sense of his late infernal treachery. 'Twas strange to be thus cared for by the man who had destroyed me.

I remained in this half-torpid condition for some days, eating scarce any thing, and only nourished by some very vile broth which Phil induced the hag to procure for me on his assertion that I was at death's-door, and a little brandy, obtained from the same source, and paid for almost as dear as if it had been melted gold.

Under my companion's care my strength slowly came back, and I was able to rise from my wretched pallet, wash and dress myself, and pace slowly to and fro our dreary dungeon—than which I little thought ever to inhabit a more dismal abode. Then came upon me in all its intensity the agony of despair; and never in all my after career did I suffer pangs so keen as those that rent my heart during my habitation of this loathsome garret. Cut off alive from all I loved, tortured by the certainty that the woman for whom I would have given my life must needs believe me the basest of men, there was no source, save One to which I had not yet learned to apply myself, whence I could hope for comfort.

"Dora will believe me a hypocrite and a liar," I repeated to myself perpetually; and this one idea seemed to be the beginning and end of all my misery. My noble benefactress's ill opinion, her bitter disappointment in one she had trusted, I could not yet bring myself to consider. My dear love, my plighted wife, forsaken by me without a word, abandoned to the slow tortures of domestic persecution; it was of her I thought, and for a long while of her alone. No, not alone; one lurid image glared red across the sad picture of my love's despair, and wore the shape of Everard Lestrangle. I had not yet learned to entertain compassion from the Divine Judge of all mankind, but daily and nightly did I implore the vengeance of Heaven on the head of this consummate villain, and that I might be permitted to become the instrument of that almighty wrath. For a meeting with this man, foot to foot and hand to hand, I thirsted with even a more passionate desire than that with which I languished to fling myself at Dora Hemsley's feet and assure her of my fidelity. Alas, not for years were either of these meetings to take place; and here was I, at twenty years of age, prisoner in a garret, with no hope of change except that which would send me forth to eternal exile; yes, eternal; for what were the chances of future distant years to a wretch who hungered for present relief to his immeasurable woes? It was just possible that some day in the remote future would restore me to liberty and England; but could I live upon the sorry comfort of such a possibility? And I might come back to find Dora's grave, or to know that she was married and happy, and had long forgotten me. It would be the return of a ghost, not a living man, a miserable shadow of past hope and joy restored from the grave to trouble the peace of the living. Great Heaven, what an ingenious torment had Everard Lestrangle imagined for the gratification of his malice! To have murdered me would have been a poor revenge compared to this hellish conspiracy, which cut me off from all that constitutes life, and yet left me to exist and suffer.

The injuries I had received in the brief skirmish that followed my wretched wedding were severe, and in spite of Philip Hay's care of me I suffered a relapse, and lay prostrate with a low fever, while the garret we inhabited received several new inmates in the person of recruits voluntary and recruits involuntary, like Hay and myself. The former smoked, drank, and played cards, with much contentment and jollity, the latter alternately bewailed their fate, cursed their captors, and joined in the amusements of their happier companions. Of the land to which we were destined to travel, most of these had but a vague and foolish notion. Some confounded the East Indies with the two Americas, others believed the great Mogul still powerful as in the days of Aurungzebe, and ruler over millions of African negroes. All had a confused idea that the Indians of Asia scalped their enemies like the copper-colored natives of Canada, that an Englishman single-handed was a match for about fifty of these Hindoo pagans, that diamond-mines and temples amply furnished with jeweled idols accessible to the greed of any European adventurer abounded throughout the Oriental continent, and that gold dust was the staple of the soil. Ignorance so complete, or half knowledge so bewildering, as obtained among these men it would have been almost impossible to conceive, had one not overheard their conversation; and I was amazed to find that a couple of fine gentlemen who had been surprised into an engagement under the influence of a tavern punch-bowl were no better informed than the tag-rag and bobtail that formed the rest of the company.

Utterly helpless though I was I could not shut from my mind all idea of escape. I questioned Philip Hay upon this subject; but he bade me at once dismiss so futile a hope from my mind.

"You can't suppose I should omit to reconnoitre our quarters," he said. "I took my survey before those fellows came in, and discovered the hopelessness of our case. If you were strong enough to climb like a cat—instead of which you can but just crawl across the room—there would be no chance for us. We are here at the top of a lofty house; below us a stone-paved yard amply furnished with spikes, and in which half a dozen soldier-fellows, with a stout bull-dog for their companion, seem to make their perpetual abode. Nor is this all; for, as your own eyes will inform you, our windows are stoutly barred; and our friends, the recruits who have joined of their own accord, would no doubt be prompt to curry favor by giving the alarm and joining against us in any shindy that might follow. No, Bob; so long as we remain here there is nothing for us but patience and fortitude. They must convey us somehow from here to shipboard, and on that passage rests our sole hope. If you see any chance of escape then snatch it without wasting a moment on consideration; you can't easily be worse off than you are, for once safely shipped our doom is sealed. And now keep yourself quiet, Bob, so that you may the sooner get the better of this foolish fever, which unfits you for seizing any opportunity that may offer."

I did not recover from the fever in time to avail myself of any chance that might have arisen between our removal and our shipment, for, within a few days of this conversation, we were suddenly aroused in the dead of the night with a summons to prepare for our journey. Our preparations were of the briefest, the wealthiest among us possessing no more than a bundle; and then, amidst hurry and clamor unutterable, we descended the steep dilapidated stair, dimly lighted by a single oil-lamp, and guarded by Sergeant O'Blagg and half a dozen private soldiers. I was hardly able to limp down stairs, leaning heavily on Philip's shoulder.

"Oh, Phil," I cried, as we went down, "I hope they won't part us!"

Yes, strange as this may seem, in the utter abandonment of my state I now clung to him who had betrayed me into this misery. In the living grave to which we had both descended he was the sole familiar face that linked me with the past and assured me of my own identity; and even the sense of this I might well have lost amidst surroundings so strange, and under circumstances so far beyond the limits of everyday experience.

Myself and two other invalids, whom I had not encountered until this moment, were thrust into a wagon, where we lay helpless upon the straw at the bottom. The wagon was then filled as closely as it could be packed with other recruits, among whom I was glad to perceive my betrayer, Philip Hay. Half a dozen sturdy fellows, in military dress, and armed to the teeth, sat at the entrance of the wagon, and kept guard over those within. My late acquaintance, the Irish sergeant, took his post beside the driver, whom he directed; and in this order (the wagon holding in all about twenty people) we rumbled along the deserted streets by many windings and turnings, which led I knew not where. I did, indeed, contrive to lift a corner of the covering of the wagon and peer out into the night, but could distinguish nothing except that the streets were dark and narrow. Chance of escape there was none, had my condition been ever so favorable to the attempt.

After a journey which seemed to me interminable, the wagon came to a stop, and we were taken out in a dreary spot down the river, on the Middlesex shore, and as I believe, somewhere opposite Greenwich, for I perceived a steeple and houses backed by rising ground, which I supposed to belong to that place. Here we had little time for looking around us, but were at once huddled into a boat, like a flock of animals destined for slaughter; and as the rowers' oars dipped slowly into the river, I could but think of that other boat in which we were all of us destined to journey, and that it might be better for most of us were we but shadows hastening to the lower world under the grim convoy of Charon. A little way ahead of us we saw the stern of a large vessel, with lights burning dimly in the faint glimmer of early morning. This ship was our destination. We were handed up the ladder, and conducted to a dismal region between decks, where we were ordered to shake down as best we might, and where an allowance of hot coffee and ship-biscuit was served out to such as had the capacity to eat. I had none, nor any inclination to stir from the spot where I had placed myself. I sat in my wretched berth staring blankly before me, with such a sense of anguish as was even yet new to me. Until this period I must have hoped, or the despair of this period could not have been so bitter to me. I listened idly to the perpetual tramp of hurrying feet, the roar and clamor of preparation above my head; and yet not quite idly, for I knew that every movement of those eager sailors speeded the ship that was to carry me from all I loved.

The sun rose as the vessel weighed anchor; and the scene between decks, as the glorious eastern light streamed in upon us through every cabin-window and open hatchway, would need the pencil of Mr. Hogarth to depict. Women and children huddled in corners, inviolated wretches groaning on their narrow mattresses and cursed by the hurrying seamen whom their presence incommoded, soldiers and recruits for the most part half drunk and already bawling for more liquor, while some determined gamblers had contrived to settle to a game of cards, with the top of an empty cask for their table. On every side riot, confusion, squalor, and debauchery; while above us rose the mellow sound of the sailors' voices singing as they heaved the anchor.

"We're off, Bob," cried Philip Hay, as a loud cheer rang out from every quarter of the ship. "Good-by, mother country, and bad luck to you! No cruel step-dame ever treated her brats worse than you've served me; and I wish you no good at parting, except that you may be rich enough to provide a gallows for one gentleman of my acquaintance. Nay, Bob, cheer up; things mayn't be quite as bad as they seem. There are fortunes to be picked up out yonder by clever fellows, and who knows but you and I may have our chance? We're beginning the world like new-born babes, and it may fall out we have silver spoons in our mouths."

I turned from him, sick at heart, and flung myself, face downward, on my mattress, sobbing aloud. Yes, I had hoped until now. I had believed that some event—nay, even a miracle from Heaven itself—must befall to save me from this hapless fate; and now I knew that hope was gone, and Dora, reputation, friends, and country were alike lost to me!

And thus, for the second time, I began the world.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

CORA.—Get a blue and white striped silk. Gore the skirt in front and at the sides, make a panier puff behind, and cut the edge of the skirt in sharp vandykes and bind with satin. Low corsage, laced behind. Short puffs for sleeves. Over this a Watteau overdress of white Chambéry gauze, falling in loose drapery from the neck. Large bow and short sash ends. White boots of silk or satin.

MRS. J. E. S.—The polonaise is more suitable for winter than a fichu. The baschlik is newer than either. Make two skirts to your dress trimmed with quilled satin of the same color. You will soon tire of garnet or blue, and they will look tawdry in the street. Blue lace is decidedly objectionable. Put fringe on the upper skirt and baschlik. Short broad sashes are still worn. For your boy of three years make cloth blouses lapped diagonally and belted. Let them reach to the knee, and be worn over a gored skirt. Plaid stockings and high buttoned boots. The Highland suit mentioned in Bazar No. 52 is a good style. Black velvet skirt with white shirt and jacket are worn by boys under five years.

SACRISTAN.—You will find the information you want in the New York Fashions of this Number.

STELLIE.—Six or seven yards of alpaca will make your skirt. Trim with a flounce put on in pleats reversed at the top to form a puff. For a handsome and serviceable suit get a black silk or poplin polonaise with panier puffs or a Watteau fold. Line with flannel or quilted wadding. Any kind of petticoat, plaid, striped, or a plain color, may be worn beneath. Hat, gloves, and bow at the throat the color of the petticoat. A black straw hat, bound with black velvet or satin, with a ruche of the same around the crown may be adapted to any dress by adding a feather the color of the skirt.

MISS ALICE M.—Patterns of cloaks will be given in the next Supplement of the Bazar.—Coffee is generally supposed to be more injurious to the complexion than tea.—Put your velvet on the frame in reversed pleats. To subdue the high color make a quilling of black lace over the velvet diadem, and a fall of lace behind, forming strings in front. A jet marguerite on the diadem, and Renaissance bows of satin folded without ends.

BESSIE H.—You can use either, but double zephyr is preferable. If the skirt is lined with thin crinoline it will suffice.

J. E. H.—Get gray or snuff-brown cloth for your traveling dress. Steel-gray poplin is the prescribed material for bridal traveling costumes, but as you are to take a long journey the light ladies' cloth will be more serviceable. Six and a half yards double width is the quantity. Make a short dress with polonaise and cape, trimmed with bands of silk and fringe. A hat is most convenient for traveling. We do not make purchases for our readers. Your bridal bonnet should be of white or lavender velvet. The Boulevard skirts have taken the place of Balmorals. Any thick striped material, closely gored, with a pleated flounce eight inches wide, will serve for a petticoat. Gore the front and side breadths of your dress. You forgot to inclose the sample you mention. Fichu is pronounced as if spelled fe-shu. The embroidery patterns you speak of can be bought singly.

MRS. C. H. C., IOWA.—You will find full instructions for working point ruse in Harper's Bazar, No. 24, to which we have already repeatedly referred correspondents.

MRS. K. G., TENNESSEE.—The rates of European postage differ with the countries; you can obtain the list from the Post-Office Department. We can not give you the address you desire.

DENVER.—Warm fomentations applied with cloths wrung out of hot water are the best applications in the first instance to sprains. Subsequently, when inflammation is past, cold water may be useful, and the common practice of holding the limb under a spout of water is not a bad one.

ADA.—It is better to answer all notes and letters immediately, and there is no reason why an invitation to a party should be an exception to the rule.

YOUNGSTER.—The first thing to do is, as you presume, to speak to the hostess on entering the ball-room. As for "what to say," bow and be silent if you can't think of a suitable word to utter; but surely you need be at no loss to ask at least the usual conventional question, "How d'ye do?"

COUNTRY CLERK.—We should say three hundred dollars a year where you are would go further than five hundred in New York. It is true that success here will bring with it a larger result than in the country, but you must not forget that with the greater competition in this immense metropolis success is more uncertain.

GOURET.—If the oyster is without spawn it is good and wholesome. The Shrewsbury is the first in market, because it lies in shallow water. As it is the first, for that reason, to spawn, therefore it is the first to fatten. Before it is fully in condition for market, and while filling its shell, it has a higher flavor. To breed oysters properly you must have a gravel bed or bruak wood to which the spawn can attach. This was very early known to one Sergius Orata, mentioned by Pliny.

"MR. EDITOR.—I have often read in the newspapers that some person in England sold his wife, with a halter around her neck, for a few shillings. Can you tell me whether this is English law, or the origin and meaning of the practice, and oblige your constant reader, SARAH."

Answer.—By the old law a husband had a right to administer moderate correction to his wife. This is also the old Roman civil law, which yet prevails in many countries. But modern England countenances no such custom; yet in some provinces the lower classes claim and exercise their ancient privileges, uphold the ducking-stool for scolding spouses, and sell them, thereby surrendering any claim against the purchaser for damages under pretense of harboring them.

INQUIRER.—The phrase is to be found in one of the epistles of the poet Young. We give two stanzas from memory:

"Few to good-breeding make a just pretense;
Good-breeding is the blossom of good sense."

FRENCHMAN.—The original name of the Bonaparte family was Calomeros, the Greek for the Italian buona parte, or beautiful part. Corsica, the birth-place of Napoleon, in the seventeenth century received a Greek colony, and the original name was subsequently Italianized.

LEARNER, HUDSON, AND OTHERS.—In Tunisian, as also in some other stitches in crochet and knitting, it requires more than one round to complete the pattern. The rounds forming the pattern, whether two or more, are called the "pattern row."

ANNA S.—Throwing the thread around the needle makes a stitch. To make one stitch, bring the thread in front merely, if the next stitch be knitted; or bring it forward and put it round the needle, if followed by a purl stitch. You will have to use your own judgment with regard to the size of the needle.

A SUBSCRIBER.—When a * is used in knitting or crocheting it signifies that the work is repeated from the point so designated.

R. J. A.—In Harper's Bazar, No. 42, in the article on "Netting Work," and also in the description of "Mouchoir, or Glove Case," will be found ample illustrations of the stitches, point de toile and point de reprise.

MRS. J. W. B. AND W. D. R.—You will find a full description of the Tunisian crochet stitch in the last Number of Harper's Bazar.

MOTHER.—Surgical operations for stammering are no longer in vogue. Much, however, can be done toward curing this defect of utterance by a careful discipline. The child should be made to pronounce each word very slowly, and his nervousness, which is often the cause of stammering, be relieved by the gentlest and most encouraging treatment. Any thing likely to startle or depress the mind of the child will be sure to increase the evil.

ETIQUETTE.—There is no more necessity for drinking wine if you don't like it than for eating onions if you have an aversion to them. The wine is now ordinarily served at dinner as a beverage, and social courtesy has got rid of the absurdity of insisting upon its being drunk. No one hardly ever asks you at table to take wine except the waiter, who serves it to you as he would a potato, leaving it entirely to your own taste or discretion to take it. No one in these days can hold fashion or social rules responsible for wine-drinking. It is left entirely to the individual to decide as to its propriety.

FROM A LONG-ESTABLISHED AND WELL-KNOWN HOUSE.—"We have sold BURNETT'S EXTRACTS (for cooking purposes) for several years, and believe them equal to any we have had hitherto, and find them gradually growing in the public favor." ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, Grocers, NEW YORK, September 8, 1868.

DEAR SIR,—It is with much pleasure that I say to you that I consider the PLANTATION BITTERS of untold value. In the fall of 1867 I was taken with Chills and Fever, with the most severe pains in my chest and head. It was with great difficulty that I could breathe. My lungs were greatly distressed, and there was severe pain in my right side, by spells. I could hardly get up from my bed. I called a doctor, who attended me all winter without the least benefit. About the first of August I commenced using your PLANTATION BITTERS—a wine-glass full three times a day—and have used it most of the time since, and I am now well and strong, able to do all my own work and the care of a large family.

Yours, &c., SUSAN WILSON.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the custom-house stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

N. B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the express charges) by sending directly to the

"GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

This machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner. Price only $18. Fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut, and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay Agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, Pa., or BOSTON, Mass.

CAUTION.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical cheap machine manufactured.

FACETIÆ.

SAFE OFFER.—An eminent journalist has offered a reward of 1000 dollars for a tale that will make his hair stand on end. Before ambitious authors enter the field of competition it may be well for them to understand that the generous journalist is perfectly bald.

Some time since a bright little fellow was shipped on board a hermaphrodite brig, and his opposition to the step was very decided. He remonstrated, and begged, and entreated, but all in vain. At last, when all other means had failed, he came to the chief director with a long face to urge his objections.

"So you don't want to go in the brig?" said the director.

"No, Sir."

"Why not?"

"I want to go in a big ship."

"But every thing will be done for you on the brig, and you will be perfectly happy there."

"Well, there's something in the Testament against my going in a brig," said the boy, brightening up with a new idea.

"What is it?" asked the director, somewhat surprised.

"Why, it says," continued the youngster, with a broad grin, "that nobody can serve two masters, and I don't want to go in a two-master either."

The boy was allowed to stand his chance for a ship.

NOT SEW!—A young lady writes to inform us of a curious phenomenon. She has a sewing-machine which is an accomplished vocalist. It begins with a little "emmming" to clear its throat, and then "runs up" the seam or scate with "Should he up-braid." We presume it is a "Singer Sewing-Machine."

A BRIDAL ROAD.—Courtship.

LOST.—The buttons from a coat of paint.

What is that which, by losing an eye, has nothing but a nose left?—A noise.

When is the book of nature studied?—When autumn turns the leaves, and they are red.

A FACETIOUS PHYSICIAN.—A gentleman went to a physician last week and said, "Doctor, I want to see you touching my little boy." "All right," replied the modern Galen, "where is he?" "At home." "At home! Then how can you expect to see me touching him! The arm of the law reaches all over the land, but that of medicine is of limited dimensions."

When the clergyman makes man and woman one, the dispute generally arises as to which is the one. The question is sometimes difficult to settle.

JUST LIKE.—A Yankee, traveling in Europe, being asked if he had seen Mount Vesuvius, replied, "Yes, I saw her spouting away, and made up my mind we must have a mount just like her near Chicago."

"Is your house a warm one, landlord?" asked a man in search of a tenement. "It ought to be; the painter gave it two coats recently," was the reply.

A LINGUIST.—A Hartford paper says that a member elect of the Connecticut Legislature is "short, fat, red-headed, and speaks several languages, among which is profane, with great fluency."

WELL "POSTED."—The telegraph.

LITTLE ACCIDENT IN A HIGH WIND.

GIRL. "My goodness! If that Lady's 'cad ain't Blowed clean Hoff!"

The editor of a newspaper thus introduces some verses: "The poem published this week was composed by an esteemed friend who has lain in his grave many years for his own amusement."

The gentleman who, a few weeks ago, directed his steps to his native village, has written to the postmaster-general, complaining that the local postman has never delivered them!

fortunate enough to awaken the charitable sympathies of a gentleman, who every morning when he passed the mendicant dropped a penny into his hat. One day the usual donation was omitted, and the supposed blind man ran after his benefactor as fast as his crutches would permit, and boldly asked why the usual penny had not been forthcoming. "Why, I thought you were blind!" exclaimed the man of charity, amazed. "No, Sir, it is not I," replied the beggar; "it is the dog."

CAPER SAUCE AND CANTALOUPE.—There is a man in Boston, the father of two romping daughters, who attributes their wildness to feeding on caper sauce, of which they are excessively fond. He is a second cousin to the man who, to prevent his girls from running off with the young men, fed them on can't-elopes (cantaloupes).

"Are you a Christian Indian?" asked a gentleman of one of the Cattaraugus tribe.

"No," was the answer. "I whisky Indian."

Farmers are like fowls; neither will get full crops without industry.

A TELL TALE.—What did William Tell's son say to his parent after the apple was shot off his head?—"Father," said he (probably), "I've had an arrow escape." This, however, is only a supposition, because what Tell junior really said to Tell senior on that occasion can never be told. Mrs. Partington is of the opinion that when old Tell asked the brave Swiss boy whether he should shoot, the youthful hero emphatically replied, "Du, Tell!"

THE GAME MARKET.

Partridges have been rising and falling.
Hares have been very unsteady, although a good deal has been done at a long shot.
Grouse still keep high, and don't keep afterward.

Why is a watch like a river?—Because it won't run long without winding.

COULDN'T SPARE THE BLACKSMITH.—A blacksmith of a village in Spain murdered a man, and was condemned to be hanged. The chief peasants of the place joined together, and begged the alcalde that the blacksmith might not suffer, because he was necessary to the place, which could not do without a blacksmith to shoe horses, mend wheels, etc. "But," the alcalde said, "how, then, can I fulfill justice?" A laborer answered, "Sir, there are two weavers in the village, and for so small a place one is enough; hang the other!"

LAZY.—One of Marshal M'Mahon's aids is an excellent officer, but lazy beyond expression. Some mornings ago his servant entered his tent at the Chalons camp, and said, "Colonel, the general is up and dressed." "Really! The general is up and dressed, and I am still abed! I'm a wretch—unworthy to see the light—so draw the curtain, boy."

COLONIAL LEGISLATORS.—An unfortunate member, whose education has been sadly neglected, was reading out a document to the Parliament House, and vainly endeavoring to decipher an obscure letter; turning to his next friend, he asked, anxiously, "Is that a hem or a hen?" "Oh," replied his friend, "call it a hen, and move that it lay on the table."

ALL THE DIFFERENCE.—Two boys, one of them blind of an eye, were discoursing on the merits of their respective masters. "How many hours do you get for sleep?" said one. "Eight," replied the other. "Eight! Why, I only get four." "Ah!" said the first, "but recollect you have only one eye to close, and I have two."

An old carpenter, who had been employed at job-work by an old lady, was asked why people of his trade always charged more in proportion for coffins than they did for chairs and tables. "Well, you see, ma'am, it's just because people won't bring coffins back to us to be repaired."

A preacher being sent to officiate one Sunday in a country parish in Scotland was accommodated at night in a manse, in a very diminutive closet instead of the usual best bedroom appropriated to strangers. "Is this the bedroom?" he said, starting back in amazement. "Deed, ay, Sir; this is the prophet's chamber." "It maun be for the minor prophets, then," was the reply.

Adam and Eve escaped two serious annoyances of modern lovers. In the first place, Eve had no mamma to make judicious inquiries as to Adam's social position, prospects of patrimony; and Adam had no "governor" to see that he did not throw himself away on a portionless girl.

It is the fashion now to say that a man a little the worse for liquor is on a "Grecian Bend."

Reception and Visiting Toilettes.

See illustration on first page.

Fig. 1.—RECEPTION DRESS. Dress of pink taffeta, with low corsage and short sleeves, trimmed with three flounces, occupying a space of about twelve inches. Over-skirt of black gauze, bordered with deep lace, which is surmounted by three rows of black velvet ribbon, the upper and under row being edged with narrow fringe. The over-skirt is slashed on each side, with the lace extending upward on each side of the opening. Princesse tunic of the same gauze, trimmed like the over-skirt, with the exception of the lace, and slashed at the sides, with a large black satin bow at the top of the opening. The high corsage is cut on the tunic. Long gauze sleeves. Pink coral comb.

Fig. 2.—VISITING DRESS. Dress of Alexandra blue taffeta, trimmed with a flounce surmounted by three narrow bouillonnés and a ruche made of a double strip of silk, and set on upright. Mantelet of the same material as the dress, and trimmed with a flounce and wide lace. The ends of the mantelet are crossed in front, then carried back and fastened behind; these ends are not trimmed with lace. The mantelet is looped up in the middle of the back by a large bow. Bonnet of black tulle and lace with long bars; with a large rose at the side.

TO-MORROW.

SAY, oh, swallow! say;
The year is on the wane,
The golden sheaves are gathered, and the day
Comes drooping to its end in the even's chilly rain.
The autumn mists arise
To hide the ruddy sun;
The dew all heavy lies
On dead leaves, crisp and dun—
To soothe our wintry sorrow,
Wilt thou come again to-morrow?

Fly, oh, swallow, fly!
The morrow of the year
Can never come to us while thou art nigh;
With thee the tender gleamings of the golden time appear.
The roving stream must bear
The ice-grip in its flow;
The widowed earth must wear
Her flower wreath in snow,
Ere thou canst soothe our sorrow,
And the spring-time be "to-morrow."

FEMALE EXTRAVAGANCE.

IT is the fashion just now to attribute all the evils of the day to the manifold extravagances of women. Since the clever Mr. Anonymous drew the picture of the "Girl of the Period," his conception has been taken as the type of modern women, and changes have been rung on the text till our dinning ears can scarcely distinguish fact from fiction. One or two of the errors which have come to be accepted amidst this confusion may as well be pointed out.

First, it is safe to say that wives very seldom ruin their husbands. In these days of colossal fortunes, made and lost in an hour, gigantic speculations, and visionary projects of all sorts, to say nothing of clubs, fast horses, racing, gambling, and kindred amusements, the money that the most extravagant woman can squander on her personal adornment, after all, counts for little compared with that of the masculine extravagance which she sees around her. Set a spendthrift man and woman side by side, and the prodigality of the latter is but a drop in the bucket as compared with that of the former. The brother of the young girl who finds an allowance of a thousand a year insufficient for dress, will probably grumble at five thousand for pocket-money. The woman who sees her husband, brothers, or sons scattering money by handfuls, in business or pleasure, soon accustoms herself to think that so small a leak as her own expenditures can not matter much, and that if the ship finally goes down, she will at least have saved something from the wreck. When a merchant prince fails—and it is this small class alone whose wives and daughters have it in their power to indulge in the marvelous prodigality so often quoted—it will generally be found that this prodigality has not been the real cause of their downfall, however plausible it may be to make the assertion.

This is not said to encourage foolish girls and frivolous women in wasting their substance on jewels and laces, or in making themselves ridiculous by Grecian bends, stilted shoulders, and grotesque chignons, but only to defend justice, and put the blame where it belongs. The idea that this class is to be taken as an exponent of modern women is equally unjust. It may represent what is called "society"—that is, certain close corporations in large cities who call themselves the world, and all outside their circles nobodies, sneer at intellect as prosy, and labor as degrading, especially in women, and estimate persons by their wealth, dress, equipage, fashion, and capacity for small talk. But by what right are these cliques regarded as representative types? No one is found therein who has a capacity for aught above fashionable gossip and the intricacies of the German. What man or woman of any intellect whatever could be content to feed on the husks found in fashionable drawing-rooms? The truth is, the real leaders of the world, both men and women, turn their backs with scorn on the so-called "society" as a pestilence which devours time, energy, and money, without rendering any equivalent beyond mere ceremony, and in which there is so little of real acquaintance that cards often continue to be sent to persons for years after their death, their names not happening to have been erased from the visiting-book of their so-called friends.

Back of these few hundred fashionable Parisians lie millions of earnest, thoughtful, provident women, who are pained and scandalized by the diatribes indiscriminately launched against their sex. These are the true modern women, whose families form the bone and sinew of the land. Life to them is something more than a pastime. They have nothing in common with the fast women who make such fine targets for would-be wits. They inform themselves about their husbands' affairs—when they will let them, worse luck for them if they do not. Having learned their exact income they adjust their needs to it with wonderful accuracy. They manage their household with economy. Their tasteful but inexpensive wardrobe they fashion as far as may be with their hands or under their eye, perforce by the aid of our own Bazar, for it is this class that chiefly benefits by our efforts. And we will say here that if a comparison is instituted between their dress and that of their husbands, the result will not be very unequal. They train up their children to a life of honor and usefulness, and have time enough left to read the current literature, and form intelligent opinions on the questions of the day. Or if unmarried, instead of leading a purposeless life, they seek some fitting avocation by which to secure an independence, ennobled existence, and raise themselves above the rank of drones. Such are the average modern women as we have found them, and we counsel our friends the reviewers to seek their acquaintance.

POPULAR PHYSIOLOGY.

IT is not necessary to urge the importance of a general knowledge of physiology. No one can hesitate to recognize the value of a science which explains the mode in which the various organs of the living body perform those functions essential to health and life. We have all a complicated machine to take charge of, which, if we do not study physiology so as to understand the vital mechanism and its operations, is sure to become deranged, with the certain result of disease and premature death. We have always, as the readers of the Bazar will bear witness, done our utmost to commend this science to popular acceptance, and shall continue to do so, being thoroughly persuaded of its importance as a branch of general education. We also naturally sympathize with the efforts of others in the same direction, and accordingly welcome the little work of Professor Dalton. His "Treatise on Physiology and Hygiene for Schools, Families, and Colleges" is excellently adapted to its purpose of instructing pupils and general readers who have no previous knowledge of medical subjects. The book, though containing but a few short pages, is so comprehensive as to embrace the whole outline of the science, and to give all the information necessary to any one but the professional student. The style is remarkably condensed, but precise and clear, and leaves nothing vague to puzzle the unscientific reader. The questions annexed to each chapter and the glossary at the end of the book will facilitate its use in schools and colleges. The well-drawn figures and diagrams by the accurate hand of Professor Dalton himself, which are liberally scattered over the pages, attract the eye at once by their appropriateness of illustration, and will be found of essential service to every reader and student.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

ON "Fast" Women.

MY DEAR MRS. TRINKARD,—When you stepped into the cars at Peanut station on Thursday morning last I watched you with a great deal of interest; for—excuse me—you were young and pretty, and I am too old a traveler not to be grateful for such favors. Probably you remember me as the elderly gentleman next the window who was reading the newspaper. It was but a deception—or, let me say, it was an illusion of yours; for, as usual, I was merely intrenched behind the sheet, and was pursuing my study of man and woman. I am very far from saying that that is always and necessarily a superior study to that of the newspapers. I much prefer to read what a thoughtful and accomplished man writes upon the Spanish question, or upon the chalk cliffs, or upon the last good book, than to hear Mr. Smith tell Mr. Jones that he has sold two hundred dollars' worth more in Peanut this year than he did last, or Mr. Jones tell Mr. Smith that he can never eat boiled pork, because it is sure to disstress him at night. I have heard a great deal of that kind of valuable information during my many journeys, but there is information in the newspaper which I find more edifying.

But on Thursday morning when I saw you come into the car the newspaper ceased to be interesting. Will you forgive me, dear Mrs. Trinkard—for such I learned from the conductor or is your name—that as I observed you I had all kinds of pleasant fancies about you; that I wondered who Trinkard was, and how he came to be so lucky; and whether he deserved such a charming fortune as you; and how gladly the good fellow, if he were at all worthy of you, surrendered himself to the sweet influences which you diffused about his life. Indeed, you had hardly seated yourself before I was contemplating as pretty a romance as you have read for a long time, and it was all made out of your pretty face and your pleasant ways. But it did not immediately occur to me that the youth who accompanied you was Trinkard. Indeed, I scarcely thought of him. But immediately upon the happy opening and rapid progress of my romance he said something, or did something—I am sure I don't know what—and then the astounding truth dawned upon me that this was the hero of my romance, and I began to tremble for the effect of the sweet influences of which I had been dreaming.

There is a very impertinent line in Tennyson's Locksley Hall which began to jingle in my memory as I looked at Trinkard—"as the husband is the wife is." And I began in turn to peer at you more curiously than you would have permitted could you have seen me as I saw you, to try to discover some sign of the truth of the poet's semi-cynical sentiment. But I defy any body to see any thing more in Trinkard, at least upon so sudden an inspection, than a self-indulgent man; a lover of good eating and drinking and fast horses; a man whose mind lies utterly fallow—for even the smallest farms are sometimes left uncultivated. I suppose Trinkard to be a broker in Wall Street, a gambler in stocks, a waiter upon the Providence of Broad Street, a sensual man, or a man of the senses entirely; and as I observed him more closely the lines of Locksley Hall jingled at a tremendous rate through my memory. Just at their loudest ring Bob Guano, whom we all know in town, came through the car in his peculiar way, which is an insult to every body, and spoke to you as if you had been rather a fine pointer or setter. Why does the society of to-day tolerate such manners as Bob Guano's? For my part, although I hope that I am a tolerant and catholic traveler through the world, I have an immense sympathy with old Mr. Hotspur, who told Bob Guano that if he dared to speak to one of his daughters he would horsewhip him.

But, my dear Mrs. Trinkard, imagine my amazement when, before he had had a chance to do more than nod and wink, you—you, of whom I had been cherishing such pretty fancies, said to him:

"Good-morning, Mr. Guano; why didn't you come up last evening? I had the terrapin ready, and all the liquors in the house. Jim has some of the best brandy and whisky you ever tasted, and I could have made you such a rum-punch or gin-sling!"

Jim, by which name I understood Trinkard to be designated, smiled proudly, as if there was a wife worth having. But how shall I describe the voice in which you said this—so coarse and loud—and the impression of yourself which you made upon my mind? Perhaps you think I am a teetotaler, or an emissary of Father Mathew or Neal Dow. But I am not. I am merely an elderly personage who does not disdain his glass of sherry, and who am by no means classed as an ascetic.

It was not so much the words you used as the tone of your voice and the vision which that tone and the appearance of Trinkard and my knowledge of Bob Guano instantly evoked. It was a vision of what is called a "fast" household. My fancies of you and yours curiously changed. I saw you and a company of Bob Guanos of both sexes loudly joking and going off to see the Grande Duchesse. I saw you returning toward midnight and sitting down to supper, humming snatches of the opera, you and the other ladies making slings and punches for the male Guanos, drinking yourselves also, and presently not refusing to light a cigar and to smoke, while the men sang a little louder, and the jests became a little broader—indeed, until the men, or some of them, were more or less tipsy; and the ladies, or some of them, in the same condition. I saw extravagance, recklessness, folly. "As the husband is the wife is." As he becomes more boorish and sensual and self-indulgent, so does she.

And you think that this is a fine thing, that it is sucking the orange, squeezing the honey-drop out of life, and enjoying yourself with a hey slap-bang. My dear young woman, you were never so cruelly mistaken in your life. This is merely the stale old attempt to reproduce the demi-monde in what is called reputable society. It is the ridiculous old effort to square the circle, to eat the cake of sensual pleasure and have the cake of virtue. You can't do it. Nobody ever did it. The Rue Breda you have heard is a very, very something—what shall I say?—improper street in Paris. My dear young woman, the Rue Breda is a street in which you may see done with spirit and sparkle what is done in a very clumsy and dull way in the Rue Trinkard. The idea of life is quite as lofty over the sea as in the spot named nearer home. I say if young married or single women among us want to imitate lorettes, let them expect the consideration due to lorettes. I say again, that I don't wonder old Hotspur threatened Bob Guano with a horsewhip. Old Ned Hotspur is not a fool, and he knows that he needn't go to Paris to see the Rue Breda and its inhabitants. Don't misunderstand my warmth, dear Mrs. Trinkard. I do not say that you are a lorette—Heaven forbid! But I do distinctly say that the tone of your life is not essentially superior to that of the Parisian rue. I say distinctly that the kind of respect for your sex which Bob Guano learned in the Rue Breda is not heightened or purified in the Rue Trinkard.

Last year my most excellent friend the rector of—well, why should I mention it?—preached a sermon from one of the Commandments. It was a tremendous sermon. There were people in his parish who said that they were shocked and grieved, that they had not supposed the Doctor would ever do such a thing, and so on, in an endless drip of that weary twaddle which usually follows a good, honest purification of the moral atmosphere. The Doctor preached from the Commandment, Thou shalt not commit adultery, and he fired straight at his most fashionable congregation a solid shot of declaration that to marry for money was to violate the Commandment. Do you wonder that Mrs. Dives, who at the age of twenty had espoused Dives at sixty-five, and Mrs. Gorilla, who had devoted her daughter Jane at the same age to old Midas, were shocked and grieved, and were ready to expire with mortification at the Doctor's extraordinary conduct?

Well, my dear Mrs. Trinkard, this thing is going on all the time. In the most flagrant cases we speak of it and shrug our shoulders. Jane Gorilla marries the long-eared Midas. Do you suppose any human being does not know that she marries him for money? Would she marry him if he were poor? And when she marries him for money she sells herself, does she not? Very well, what do they do in the Rue Breda? Now if you and I go to the maison Midas, and have roystering little suppers after the roystering little opera of the Grande Duchesse, and we all drink and smoke and talk whisky and tobacco talk, do you mean to tell me that I have not had a little orgy in the Rue Breda? Names don't change things. If I had arrived yesterday from "fast life" in Paris, from the demi-monde and the rest of it, and had landed in Mrs. Midas's drawing-room, I should have quoted the Latin grammar, and the motto of the old Albion, Cælum non animum mutant, qui trans mare currunt.

My dear little woman, I hear you say, with amazement, "Why! we are not really bad!" Excuse me, but you are. Such a life is necessarily bad. It wastes money, time, mind, health, life, soul. It is a degrading process. You are becoming meaner and more selfish all the time. You are learning to despise all pure and beautiful ideals. And what I complain of is, that you are justifying the melancholy line of the poet. Instead of lifting this poor Trinkard out of his tobacco and whisky, you descend into it with him, and you force yourself to think that it is a good thing. Ah me! little woman, with your Grecian bend and your panier and your absurd toggery, and your hail-fellow-well-met manner with Bob Guano and the rest, if Circe should pass this way—oh my! oh my! I saw what Trinkard was, because I know the kind, and I see what my young and pretty passenger who stepped in at the Peanut station is becoming. For pity's sake, don't do it! If you must have models, don't choose the worst! Believe me, for I am a man and I know, no man truly respects the fast woman. She may amuse him, but that is all. No man would wish to remember his mother as "fast," and what decent man would wish his sister to marry Bob Guano?

Good-by, little woman, young and pretty! Listen to an old stager; and if you would see who it is, when you take the morning train on Thursdays at Peanut station, look out for the elderly gentleman near the window behind a newspaper, and you will see

Your true well-wisher,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

FURS.

ALL furs of lower grade than sable are cheaper this season than last. Mink has fallen twenty-five per cent. Reliable furriers say they are selling ready-made sets of mink for less money than the skins cost them.

Small collars, boas, and sacques are the fashionable choice in shape. Two styles of collars are shown. The most dressy shape is the Imperial collarine, very small, only eight inches deep behind, with short, square fronts trimmed with the tails of the animals. Ladies who consider comfort the first essential prefer the new pelerine cape, slightly pointed back and front, and sufficiently large to afford protection to the chest and shoulders. The half-cape with long, square ends is entirely out of fashion. The Princess boa introduced this season is a graceful style, short in front, and shaped to fit the neck. A short, straight boa tied at the throat, or fastened by passing the head of the animal through a loop, is in favor with young ladies, but the long Bertha boa is more distingué.

The fur cloaks are gracefully-shaped sacques, made thirty-four inches long, with coat-sleeves, standing collar, and pockets. The large, clumsy capes are not in keeping with the present style of street dress, and have entirely disappeared. Sacques are more comfortable, as they fit closer to the figure.

Muffs are smaller even than last season. The round shape is preferred for full dress, the flat pocket-muff, suspended by a cord around the neck, for shopping and skating. Three, four, and sometimes five dark stripes adorn mink muffs. The ends are trimmed with a single tassel of brown bullion attached to a diamond-shaped head, or with the tails of the animal pendent from a passementerie acorn. Changeable silk linings are not used. Snuff brown satin, or Turkish serge of the shade of the fur, are in better taste and more durable. Sables have a soft lining of eider-down.

SABLE.

The great value of Russian sable places it beyond the means of the general reader. A single muff shown us is valued at $600. It is made of dark sable of the finest quality, with the tails of the animal left hanging in the centre—an original idea of the wearer, who selected the skins in St. Petersburg. Sets consisting of collar and muff range in price from $80 to $900. The sets at $80 are coarse and of light color; but there are ladies who will have Russian sable, even though of an inferior quality. Mink or Persiani at the same price is in better taste, because the best of its kind. Cloaks cost from $1800 to $6000.

Hudson Bay sable ranges from $50 to $400. The cheap sets are lighter than mink at corresponding prices, but are much warmer. $200 buys a collar and muff of fine color and quality. Cloaks of American sable, lined throughout with satin, cost from $300 to $2500.

MINK.

The reduction in furs is most evident in mink sets. The skins of mink caught in the mild temperature of the Middle States are of light color and quality. Sets made of these skins can be bought for $30. A year ago they were sold for $40. Canadian mink, and those caught in the Eastern States, especially Vermont and New Hampshire, are dark in color and a fine body of fur. A very small mink collar, made of two skins, trimmed with tails around the neck, with pendent tails on the short square front, will be the favorite collar of the winter. It is more stylish than the round collar, and only a trifle more expensive. A dark set of this kind, made of fine fur, the muff with three stripes in the centre, or a flat muff trimmed with the animal's head, is well worth the money asked for it, $80. The darkest shade costs $100. The Princess boa is only half the price of a collar, ranging from $17 to $35. A sacque cloak made of mink requires thirty-six skins, consequently it is an expensive garment, varying in price from $300 to $1000.

FUR SEAL.

Fur seal is not reduced in price, and promises to be higher in future. Dealers say they could not replenish their stock at the prices for which they are now selling. Two reasons are assigned for this. First, a vessel laden with a valuable cargo of seal-skins belonging to Messrs. Oppenheim, the great London furriers, sprung a leak in mid-ocean, and the salt-water rushing in damaged the skins to such an extent that out of fifty thousand only eighteen hundred were saved in good condition. This great loss affects the seal market all over the world. The second reason is, the fear that the race of seals will soon become extinct through the indiscriminate slaughter now going on in Northwestern waters. The sale of Alaska annulled the Russian laws for protecting this animal, and our Government has not yet enacted similar laws.

The rare golden seal is the most beautiful of the species. Seal-skin, in its natural state, is a light tan color; but it is more admired when colored a rich maroon brown. Dark seal sacques, smooth and glossy, are as handsome wrappings as Lyons velvet, and are infinitely warmer and more durable. They vary from twenty-four to thirty-eight inches in length, costing from $125 to $150. Long boas are sold for $10. Seal-skin gloves for midwinter are faced with kid. They are thick and warm without being clumsy. Price $10.

CURLED LAMB FURS.

The curled lamb furs worn last season will be widely adopted this winter. Russian lambskin, Astrakhan, and Persiani are all erroneously called by the general name Astrakhan, but a marked difference is perceptible to the initiated. The heavy Russian lamb is the most popular of the medium-priced furs, and divides public favor with mink. It has a smooth glossy surface, with peculiar wavy figures, and is the cheapest and most durable of the curled furs. A sacque of this skin edged with wide Angora fringe, with maff also trimmed with fringe flowing from the sides around the hands, constitutes a suit, which may be had as low as $50, and as expensive as $100. Genuine Astrakhan, known in Southern Europe, where it is found, by the name of Ukrainer, has short curly fleece with but little gloss. It is more durable than Russian lambskin, and may be worn for deep mourning as well as colored dress. A sacque and muff of good quality can be bought for $75. The next higher grade is Persiani, a silky fleece, with long irregular curl. A suit handsomely made and lined with satin is worth $100. The breit-schwanz is a peculiarly fine skin taken from still-born lambs, or those very young. It is as lustrous as satin, with smooth surface in large crinkled waves natural in the fur but resembling appliqué. It is lighter than the Russian lamb, yet very warm as it is soft and pliable, clinging closely to the figure. The price ranges from $120 to $300. A very handsome sacque is round behind with square mantilla fronts.

Gray krimmer, shaded from black through gray to white, has a short fleece in curly tufts. White Angora fringe over black is the trimming. Gray and white Astrakhan and Persiani are objected to because they are perfectly imitated in cloth.

A collar and muff of any of the curled furs is fashionably worn, trimmed with Angora fringe. $30 to $50 includes the range of prices.

CHINCHILLA.

Chinchilla, the softest of all furs and most fragile, is more highly appreciated abroad than here, where we have so many imitations. The best quality is as soft as down and in delicate shades of gray. It is brought from Arica, that ill-fated South American province devastated by the earthquakes last summer. Its value is about the same as ermine. A handsome set, a wedding gift to a Philadelphia bride, was sold at $50.

ERMINE AND ANGORA.

The royal ermine is of immaculate whiteness, without that yellow tinge erroneously believed to enhance its value. The black tails with which it is spotted should be marked and distinct. It is no longer called Opera fur, as it is worn with full day dress. The pelerine cape and the collarine, with muff trimmed with Angora tassels, are sold for day attire. The best quality costs $50. A yellowish white set may be bought for $30. A shaped boa a yard and a half or two yards long is admired for evening. Sacques are made for Opera cloaks, but are inconvenient, requiring assistance in taking them off. The old-fashioned circular is preferred, as it may be gracefully thrown from the shoulders. An exceptional novelty in Opera cloaks is a circular made of tufts of down of the Russian eider swan. The tufts are sewed on soft muslin, forming a smooth surface wonderfully light and soft. An arabesque border of the down of the gray swan is inserted for trimming. Price $250. These cloaks are made only in Archangel, a Russian hamlet, whose people depend upon this labor for subsistence.

A collar and muff, formed of the wavy white fringe made of the long fleece of the Angora goat, is admired for evening. The muff is lined with bright blue silk. Sets of the Swiss grebe, a glossy white, bordered with delicate fawn color, are worn by very young ladies and misses. Price $25.

FUR HATS.

Jaunty hats of fur seal, of krimmer, and of breit-schwanz, are made for the promenade and for skating. Heavier furs with long pile are too clumsy for hats. The crowns are high and sloping. Brims narrow. The only trimming is slender plumes directly in front, extending over the crown, without destroying its well-defined outline. The lining is of quilted satin. Another style has a rolled brim. Turbans are out of fashion. Seal-skin hats cost $15. The black furs are $10.

Traveling hoods are made of velvet or plush, bordered with beaver.

CHILDREN'S FURS.

Gray Persiani and krimmer are the fashionable furs for children. A small collar and pocket muff cost $12. Sets of the white Iceland lamb, a soft shaggy fleece, are sold for $10. A little boa and muff of fine ermine is worth $20. The muff is lined with bright blue or scarlet silk. Only the poorer grades of chinchilla are made up for children. The Siberian squirrel is no longer in vogue. Tiny little flat muffs of Iceland lambskin, lined with down and faced with silk, are shown for babies. Price $4.

FUR TRIMMINGS.

Fur borders on cloaks and dresses are the height of style, but are too expensive to be greatly used. An imported dress is being trimmed with fur at the cost of a thousand dollars. We were shown a border of sable tips, only two inches wide, marked $30 a yard. Chinchilla is a favorite fur trimming on velvet. A two-inch border costs from $6 to $10, according to quality. An inferior article brings $2 a yard. Astrakhan krimmer and Russian lamb are cut for trimming in different widths at corresponding prices. A mink border, two inches wide, costs from $4 to $7, according to quality. Astrakhan will be popular for trimming skating suits. A band of good quality, two inches wide, is worth from $1 50 to $2 a yard.

GENTLEMEN'S FURS.

Seal-skin is the most fashionable fur for gentlemen, taking precedence of sable, Persiani, krimmer, beaver, and otter. A set consists of cap, collar, and gloves. Vests and coats of fur seal are costly luxuries. A handsome seal set, the cap flat without a centre peak, wide rolling collar, and short gloves, costs $40. Seal-skin coats, of which there are not a dozen in the country, are worth from $200 to $400.

A sable cap made entirely of the paws of the animal is marked $15.

Otter sets, including the three most important pieces, cost $40. Beaver is $30. A driving set of seal-skin has a jockey cap with bell crown and visor, and gauntlets reaching to the elbow. Coachmen's caps are of the heavy black jet set fur, with visor and ear-pieces. The broad collar is fastened with jet links.

LAP-ROBES.

The favorite carriage robes are wolverine and white polar bear skins. Wolverine is a yellow brown fur resembling fitch. Robes of fine quality cost $150, coarser ones $110. Small polar bear robes may be bought for $75. The long, white fur of the Arctic fox makes beautiful robes, costing from $115 to $135. The soft gray beaver is sold for $75, and the glossy, luxuriant fur of the Isabella bear for $100. The height of elegance is found in a robe of Hudson Bay sable ornamented with the tails of the many skins used in making. Mink robes are made of inferior skins, colored probably, or taken from animals found in warm latitudes where nature does not provide heavy furs. Gray chamois skin, fox, coon, wolf, badger, and black jet are the lower-priced robes.

A sleigh-robe is made of the skin of an immense Bengal tiger with tail and claws preserved intact, and the huge stuffed head arranged to fall over the back of the sleigh. A polar bear robe with stuffed head costs $150. Black bear is the same price, and the grizzly bear $100. Heavy buffalo-robes are not handsome but are warm and stand rough usage.

Carriage-mats of heavy pile, into which the feet sink as if in cushions of down, are shown in bright colors—blue, magenta, white, and green—bordered with Angora fringe. Price from $10 to $15. Foot-muffs into which both feet are thrust are of spotted leopard skin, or of lynx or wild-cat, lined with soft fur; $5 to $10 is the price.

METHOD OF PRESERVING FURS.

Ladies living in cities usually consign their valuable furs to a reliable furrier during the summer months. For the benefit of those who take care of their own furs we give some advice gathered from the highest authorities. Do not wear your furs late in the spring. On the first advent of warm weather beat each piece separately, whipping it with small rods in order to cleanse thoroughly; then wrap with paper, and place in a paper-box made as air-tight as possible and kept in a dry closet. During the whole summer this process should be repeated once in three or four weeks, according to the heat of the season, in order to keep the hair smooth and straight, and to prevent the accumulation of animalculæ. This is the only positive preventive. Camphor and cedar trunks are excellent for preserving furs, but even these are only partial mediums, requiring that the furs be aired during the season.

PERSONAL.

On the 20th of September, at the good old age of 88, died Mrs. MARY L. HUTCHINSON, the mother of that family of singers once so famous. She knew the psalms and hymns of the late Mr. WATTS by heart, so that she never needed the printed page, and so delighted in them that lines and couplets and verses would find their way into her ordinary conversation, often with amusing appropriateness.

The report is authoritatively contradicted that that most witty and able of Southern journalists, GEORGE D. PRENTICE, has ceased to be connected with the Louisville Journal. He still lends the brilliancy of his pen to the columns of that paper.

The best illustrations in the English magazines are the work of young ladies who have adopted drawing as a profession. Some of the most amusing sporting pictures in Punch are from the pencil of a lady, and several of our American magazines are illustrated by lady artists. Miss LUCY GIBBONS and Miss MARY L. STONE are notably clever. Miss STONE has a great deal of fancy, an excellent eye for grouping and composition, and is rarely at fault in drawing the human figure. She was for many years the pupil of EDWIN WHITE, and more recently of Professor RIMMER. The fine illustration entitled "Thridding my fingers through my hair," in the Galaxy for August, was from the pencil of Miss MARY HALLOCK, a young artist whose compositions contain promise of no ordinary kind. Miss C. W. CONANT is also giving attention to drawing on wood, and some of her compositions show great taste and culture.

The young Crown Prince of the Netherlands, who is soon to be married to the young Princess of Hanover, is said to be a naughty young man of the most pronounced type, compared with whom WALES and young HUMBERT are models of propriety. A gentleman writing from Vienna says: "I saw the princess yesterday—a very pretty, modest, intelligent-looking girl. Two weeks ago I saw the young gentleman who is to be her husband, and, knowing both of them, I can not but pity the young lady, though a dower of a million dollars and a royal throne await her. If her heart will not be broken within a few weeks after her wedding, and if she will not then envy the fate of the poor but happy wives of the fishermen of Amsterdam, I must be seriously mistaken. I used to sympathize with her blind and dethroned father, and with her mother, whose hair has grown so prematurely gray; but since I know that they can sacrifice their lovely daughter in such a ruthless manner (for they are well aware of the character of the husband whom they have selected for her), all my compassion is gone; and I believe now what the Prussians say, namely, that the EX-KING OF HANOVER fully deserves the fate which has befallen him, and that he is a bad, heartless, and excessively proud man."

Madame GEORGE SAND has been made the subject of a little personal sketch by the younger DUMAS, according to whom she lives, moves, and has her being in the following, to wit: "It is noon, the hour when every thing is visible. Notice you woman coming down the steps of her porch. She has under her little straw-bonnet hair which is turning gray. She is all alone. She walks quietly in the sun. She contemplates her ordinary horizon. She listens to Nature's vague noises. She amuses herself following with the eye the clouds which are nothing to you. She talks with the gardener. She stoops to smell flowers which she takes good care not to cut. She stops. She listens. What? She herself doesn't know! something which is not yet, and which will be one day. She sits on her stone bench. She does not move. She merges into immensity, she is plant, star, blade of grass, ocean, soul. She recollects. She divines. Every thing you hear amidst the waves she hears as well as you, under her dome of lilacs, and the birds and the storms, and every thing which sings, and every thing which weeps, and every thing which laughs. She wanders, observes, listens in this way, without exactly knowing—sommambulist of the day—what she does; but as the shadow steals over the fields—like those plants which are impregnated from morning to night with dew and sunbeams, with rain and sun, and which do not open and exhale their perfumes except at night—at night this woman will restore to the world of the soul and the mind every thing she receives from the material and visible world." Which, in brief Anglo-Saxon, is, that GEORGE SAND walks in the garden in the daytime, and writes in the evening—that's all!

—The "coming woman" of the opera continues to come. The last comer is Mlle. MALLINGER, of Munich, who has achieved sudden celebrity by her charming performance in RICHARD WAGNER's new opera, "The Meistersinger." She knows that she is popular, and has therefore informed his Bavarian Majesty that she will condescend to remain at the Royal Opera of Munich, provided the king will make a contract with her by which she would receive ten thousand florins a year for ten years. Several years ago she was glad to receive forty florins a month.

—A very excitable gentleman sat near a very phlegmatic one at one of the concerts of the famous CLARA SCHUMANN in Leipzig. Excitable gentleman almost beside himself in his rapture, and is "fidgeted" to the extremity of endurance by the phlegmatic individual, who hears piece after piece played cold as an icicle.

Ex. GENT. (who, after a splendid performance of a piece by CHOPIN, can endure it no longer). "I say, Sir, do you not like her playing?"

Phleg. IND. "Why, yes, I like it very well."

Ex. GENT. "Why the deuce, then, Sir, don't you applaud?"

Phleg. IND. "I—? Applaud? Oh, I am her husband!"

—The boy prince-royal of Belgium, whose life is despaired of, and whose sufferings are said to be of the most painful character, has exhibited qualities that ought to endear him to the people of whom he may become the ruler. His father, King LEOPOLD, has been so affected by the boy's sufferings that at times he has been unable to remain in his room. A small door behind the bed has been made to admit the King unperceived. By this he enters to ascertain his state. The child knows the peculiar sound of the bolt being withdrawn, and that his father is the only person who enters his room thus. On hearing it he immediately pretends to sleep. The King calls him in a low voice. He makes no reply. His father, knowing the importance of sleep to him, goes back to his apartments more tranquil. The child opens his eyes, and says to his tutor, to whom he is devotedly attached, and who never quits him, "The King will be satisfied now." It is a little strange that all the world should know of this loving stratagem except him whom it is intended to deceive.

—Our American sculptor, STORY, has just finished, in Rome, a fine bust of ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING, a lady who has expressed, in the following delicious bit of poetry, her belief that there is such a thing as a generous gradation in love-caresses, from the hand to the lip. Thus:

"First time he kissed me he but only kissed
The fingers of this hand wherewith I write;
And ever since it grew more clean and white.
... The second passed in height
The first, and sought the forehead, and half-missed
Half-falling on the hair....
The third upon my lips was folded down
In perfect, purple state; since when, indeed,
I have been proud and said, 'My love, my own.'"

—Mr. A. T. STEWART's income is said to be not less than $10,000 per day, yet the poor gentleman is obliged to give at least fourteen hours out of every twenty-four to looking after business matters, else they would get into confusion and bother him. Why should a $10,000-per-day man permit himself to be bothered? (Not a conundrum.)

—The Emperor NAPOLEON has written the MARQUIS DE CAUX congratulating him on his marriage, and notifying him that while a Chamberlain's salary will be continued to him, and his place kept open for him in the Imperial household, he can not appear at Court so long as his wife remains on the stage.

—The old KING OF HANOVER, who was supposed to be hopelessly blind, is really recovering his sight, and has hopes of its complete restoration. His children, even his handsome young princesses, are all near-sighted. The King still believes in spiritualism, and carefully notes down all the dreams he has. He is firmly convinced that he will recover his lost throne at no distant day, and speaks in terms of unmeasured contempt of the King of Prussia, whom he calls KOSUTH's and GARIBALDI's boon companion, and predicts that WILLIAM I. will be the first to mount a revolutionary scaffold.

—The Rev. Mr. PUNSHON, whose oratory is just now the topic of conversation in religious circles, is spoken of as follows in "The Pilgrim's Wallet," a book of European travel, by Rev. GILBERT HAVEN, now the editor of Zion's Herald: "London fame settles on two men—PUNSHON and STURGEON. PUNSHON reminded me of BACON and CHAPIN. He reads fast, has but few gestures, is no orator, at least in the pulpit, and carries his crowds by the splendor of his language more than by all other gifts. He rushes on with such impetuosity that you are swept along as in an express train. His subject was Jeremiah's complaint against the Jews for abandoning the living fountains and hewing out to themselves cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water. His description of the Jews was masterly, so was the portrayal of the labor of man to save himself. His sermons are very ethical orations. His house was full, and were it known where he preached the crowd would be enormous. His forte is in these rushing tides of gorgeous rhetoric, not overflowing but full to the brim. Reading his sermon spoils it for oratory, but does not seem to conflict with his style. He may break away from these inky fetters on the platform; if so, his sweep must be grand."

Java Canvas Tidy.

MATERIALS: White Java canvas, black sewing-silk.

The illustration gives a full-sized section of this tidy. First, fringe the outer edge of the piece of canvas used to the desired length as shown in the illustration, then draw out one way eight threads between every twenty-four, and the other way of the piece twenty-four threads between every twenty-four. The squares of the canvas which are thus left are ornamented with black silk; on the outside with button-hole stitch, and in the centre with a star in point russe. These squares are separated by the wider and narrower strips formed by drawing out the threads. Leave the narrow strips without ornamentation. Wind the threads of the wide strips in one another by drawing through them two of the raveled-out canvas threads, as shown in the illustration. The outer ends of the threads thus drawn through must be fastened with four other canvas threads and wound around as shown. By this means they are made to imitate a tassel, and must be of the same length as the fringe-like threads which finish the remainder of the outer edge of the tidy. Fasten a small tassel also in each corner.

Tatted Worsted Fanchon.

This fanchon, tatted in worsted, is new and serviceable. The pattern is of white zephyr worsted, and consists chiefly of a simulated band of insertion with a violet ribbon drawn through. This forms the foundation and extends to form the strings. It is completed with rosettes and small figures. Fig. 1 shows the foundation in reduced size; Fig. 4 the full-sized end of one of the strings. Begin with the simulated insertion, which is worked lengthwise in two rounds. Work, first, a ring composed of 5 ds. (double stitches), four times alternately 2 ds., 1 p. (picot), then 5 ds., turn this ring downward, and work at the distance of one-fifth of an inch space on the thread a small ring composed of 7 ds., 1 p., 7 ds., turn the work so that the first ring shall point upward, work at the same distance another ring like the first, which must, however, instead of working the first picot, be fastened to the last picot of the similar ring; turn the work, work at the distance of one-fifth of an inch a ring of 7 ds., 1 p., 7 ds., and repeat from a forty times. The picot of the last small ring must be one-fifth of an inch long. Now work for the end of the foundation six times alternately, and always after one-fifth of an inch space, a large and small ring in the same manner as the former, but each of these six rings must be fastened to the long picot of the last small ring of the band instead of working picots. This completes one side of the band and one end; work, now, the second side in the same manner and the other end. In working the other side join each of the small rings to a corresponding ring on the other side. Fig. 4 shows the manner in which the ribbon is drawn through the band. Work, next two three-leaved figures from Fig. 3, then eight two-leaved figures and two single rings, which are joined by reference to Fig. 1, and fastened to the finished band by means of the picots. Outside of these arrange the rosettes. Of the four large rosettes which count each twelve rings, and of which Fig. 2 shows one of the full size, three are arranged on the back of the fanchon and one on the front, as shown by Fig. 1. The small rosettes, arranged as shown by Fig. 1, number but eight rings each around the edge. Instead of white wool the fanchon may be worked in lilac, gray, or red. When knitted of black wool they are especially suitable for elderly ladies.

Netted Barb.

The accompanying illustration gives one end of a netted barb worked of white wool with colored ribbon run in. It may be used also for a fanchon similar to that just described, with a foundation completed with rosettes. Different styles for these last have been given in Harper's Bazar, No. 42. For making this barb are needed, first, a flat fringe mesh about four inches around (a piece of heavy pasteboard may be used instead of this); next a round netting mesh three-fifths of an inch, and one of an inch and one-fifth circumference, and a coarse knitting-needle. Work, first, for the middle part of the barb, on a coarse thread, the ends of which are tied together, the 1st round: over the broad fringe mesh 94 stitches; then, as 2d round, over the smaller round mesh, in every two stitches of the last round which are joined together two knots. Now draw the thread out of the stitches of the first round, string the stitches of the last round on it, and

Two Corners of Borders in Net Guipure.

See illustrations, p. 853.
Both these designs are worked on netting of any fineness desired. The thick portions of each border are darned in point de toile. Between these work small wheels in the manner shown by the illustration. The three-cornered leaves of the border, Fig. 2, are worked in button-hole stitch, while the smaller leaves and cross-bars are worked in point de reprise. The outer edges of both borders may easily be worked by referring to the illustrations.

Watch-Case Embroidered with Beads.

See illustration on page 853.

MATERIALS: white pasteboard, white silk, black velvet, garnet beads, garnet silk, red wool.

This watch-case, which is shown of the full size in the illustration, is embroidered with garnet beads, put on in satin stitch over pasteboard which has been covered with white silk. First trace the design on the covered pasteboard, cut away the surplus pasteboard on the outer edges, cover the central shield-shaped part with black velvet, and work on the beads in the manner shown by the illustration over an under layer of red wool, in doing which always put the needle through the pasteboard. In working the outside row be careful to cover the edges with the beads. Next sew on a brass hook as shown in the illustration, and paste the case on heavy white paper. Lastly, arrange on the upper part two loops by which to hang up the case.

Point Lace Border for Altar-Cloths, Curtains, Lambrequins, etc.

This border is made of white braid, guipure cord, fine netting, and lace stitch. It must be worked over stiff white paper on which the design has been traced. First fasten to the paper single pieces of netting for the netted figures seen on the illustration, next fasten on the braid, and join the braid around the netting, letting the stitches show as little as possible, and in the same manner join the pieces of braid where they meet. The bars of guipure cord which join the figures of the design are stretched from one to the other in the manner shown by the illustration; it is closely sewed to the braid. The cord must also be fastened at the edge, even when it is desired to extend it under the braid. Lastly, work the lace stitch (button-hole stitch and wheels) in the figures not yet filled out; border the edge with woven picots, and cut away the paper and the surplus edges of the netting.

DISAGREEABLE BABIES.

TO babies may be attributed the existence of two public curses—the stupid nurse and the perambulator. It is no doubt very pretty in a man to talk of babies with the gush of a young lady; but let such a man have a fat child, heralded by a wheel and covered with an oil-skin, driven into his shins by a dull and heavy maid, and then see what that man's opinion of babies will be henceforth and forever after. Cynicism in the consideration of babies is, perhaps, of the bad traits in a man's character the most pardonable. If a man who is born with a natural aversion to infants were suffered to contemplate the little creatures unmolested, the chances are that he might in time come to master his dislike and develop into a positive lover of babies. But, unhappily, there is no baby born into the world who has not at least four or five backers ready to im-molate themselves, or you, at any possible moment, in order to prove that this is the very finest baby that ever shrieked an approval of its new state of existence. Now, when one comes to reflect that no man can even venture on a cursory inspection of a baby without being forced by its backers into an exhaustive and wearisome consideration of all its beauties, its virtues, and its "little ways," it will become obvious that such a man's natural objection to a baby is very reasonable, and not to be reprobated with any show of justice. There is a better argument still to support a man's dislike of babies, and that is the fact that of every hundred babies born there are at least ninety who, to every body but the mother, the father, the aunt, and perhaps two more relations, are thoroughly disagreeable babies. There is no use denying it. The infantine squall may be melody in a parent's ear, but to others it is nothing more than an irritating noise, a disturbance from which it grows an immediate necessity to flee, and in nineteen times out of twenty rendered the more aggravating not only because the person dandling the bawling child seems utterly insensible to the uproar, but because, in spite of its kicking, in spite of its half-blackened face, in spite of its shrill clamor, you have to sit patiently by with a painfully assumed expression of admiration in your face, feeling called upon during the intervals of the hideous noise to confess the delight you experience in having made the acquaintance of so remarkably fine a child.

It may be consolatory, perhaps, to a mother to feel that the struggling little portion of herself upon her lap may grow up a very sweet-tempered daughter or amiable son. We do not know whether the observation is based upon the result of any experimental science; yet it seems true enough that the irritable baby always makes the good-tempered man, and vice versa. But that hardly alters the fact that a disagreeable baby is a very great grievance in the society which moves about it. Goldsmith says that we cried when we came into the world, and every day that we live tells us why. Perhaps the disagreeable baby is nothing more than the intellectual baby—gifted with a foreknowledge of the inevitable ills it will have to encounter ere it subsides again into the blackness of the world from which it has so recently arrived. It deter-bird's legs! You, who have the keenest appreciation of the luxury of ease, can you picture to yourself any more horrid discomfort than to be turned abruptly, first on your back, then on your stomach, then on your back again, while your waistcoat is being buttoned in front or your coat-tails adjusted behind; your face rubbed over with a moist sponge, in spite of your wrinkled nose and whistling-shaped mouth; your back scoured; your little hair carefully brushed over the surrounding baldness, and your hands dried with a vexing towel? Who can blame a baby for rebelling against such a series of indignities? No wonder it clenches its fat fist and takes unequal aims at its mother's nose and mouth! No wonder if it catches hold of her hair it won't let go! No wonder, in the absence of speech, it yells its irritation with the most convincing form of eloquence—the eloquence of noise! Placed in its position, dear Sir, you would do the same thing—and so would we!

But, whatever excuses may be framed for such a baby, there is no use in denying the fact that it is a disagreeable baby. Yet there is another kind of baby much more disagreeable than the noisy baby; we mean the baby that never utters a cry—the baby that you can lay upon the sofa and leave—we were going to say from one year's end to another—and find that it has not budged an inch. There is something living about a noisy baby; you watch the animation of its legs and listen to the uproar of its lungs with anger, yet with a sense upon you that after all it is human nature. But what shall be said of the pallid, minute infant with great big motionless eyes which never will shut; with thin, sparrow-like legs which never will kick; with unfolded fingers that never will close? It is healthy enough. The doctor has assured the mother that its existence is perfectly secure. And yet it lies in the arms or on the hearth-rug, swathed in flannel, as motionless as if it meant to assert that, having been born against its will, it was determined to have as little to do with existence as it possibly could, and so spite its mother. This is a disagreeable baby. It will cry to be nursed perhaps once a week; and the noise that it utters is thin and weird. It has eyes like those you see in a picture, which follow you about wherever you go and yet never move. Their want of speculation perplexes you. You would give worlds to see them screwed up preparatory to a good, healthy, hearty yell. It is just the kind of baby that, on being asked by its little inquiring brothers and sisters where it came from, you would be justified in answering it was found by the doctor, say, or the gardener, or the nurse, in a wood said to be haunted by weird fairies. It seems overawed by the astonishing condition of being into which it has suddenly been launched. There is a querulousness in its infrequent cry suggestive of an earnest desire to be off once more to the land of shadows and silence. It is an unpleasant baby. It is a disagreeable baby. When you go to bed at night you dream of its eyes. You wish you had never seen it.

Another opposite type of the disagreeable baby is the restless baby. It has a wondrous faculty of journeying. You may leave it safe, as you fancy, in its cradle for ten minutes. When you return you find it scrambling around the fender, making vain efforts to reach the fire, with its back turned toward you, and its shirt over its head. It cries lustily when you pick it up, and nothing silences it but a good shaking. Over such a baby it is ridiculous to hope to keep the bed-clothes. It is so strong in its legs that it will kick off any weight of covering. The sense of decency has no influence over the mind of such a baby. Its recklessness of appearance is intense. But, oddly enough, such animated babies never come to harm. It tumbles about with the safety of a drunken man. Let it roll off the bed; there will be the noise of a fall and a loud cry, but never any injury. Let it grab at a lighted candle, and put the flame in its mouth. The flame is at once extinguished; there is no burn, only excessive irritability, and many a wry face over the disagreeable taste of the wax and the smoke. This is a miraculous kind of baby. It makes its nurse's life a burden to her; but it is always its mother's darling pride. Its predilections are all destructive. Its grabbing powers are amazing. It will seize and overturn any thing in the wink of an eye. It is a dangerous baby to touch—certainly for a man to handle. If it does not succeed in putting his eye out, it will certainly entangle its hand in his mustache or whiskers, and cause him intense agony, or crumple his collar, or destroy his shirt-front, or break his watch-guard. Yet on the whole we confess to a weakness for this type of disagreeable baby. It will revenge for you any indignity. Put it into the arms of your worst enemy, and you may rest assured that human malice can devise no more subtle annoyance than this baby will subject him to. This, indeed, is the one great use of this kind of disagreeable baby; and to judge from our experience, we are afraid that there are a good many mothers who are in the secret. At all events, they have an especial fondness for testing the endurance of their acquaintances in this manner, and woe to him who winces beneath the torture.

LOOKING BACK.

On the sea lay opal lights,
On the fields the autumn gold,
And the heather on the hills
Rose and purple hues unrolled.
O'er the green of waving woods
Lay a rain of fiery leaves,
And the scarlet poppies burned
In the reapers' rustling sheaves.

Oh! the morns so dewy bright!
Oh! the gorgeous breezeless days!
When the glowing sun looked down,
Through a veil of floating haze.
Oh! the crimson-clouded eves!
And the nights' grand mellow moon,
Shedding radiance brighter far
Than the pale Night-Queen of June.

Faint and wan was summer's bloom,
To the flush of autumn flow'rs,
Velvet soft, and rich, and dark,
Climbed late roses o'er our bow'rs.
Bright moths flitted to and fro,
'Mid the fuschia's coral bells;
And the honey-bees droned by,
Bearing treasure to their cells.

In that golden bounteous time
First we met—'tis long ago—
And all dreams but this have paled
From their early morning glow.
But I see, as 'twere to-day,
All that garden bright and fair,
And the shadows of the plane
Moving o'er thy sunny hair.

What was I, to look on thee?
In the blue veins of thy hand
Ran a tide that well might mate
With the proudest in the land.
But the peasant lad that toiled
For thy pleasure, or thy gain,
Felt thy beauty like a spell,
Loved—though love brought only pain.

Once I saw him at thy side,
Him whose name thou bearest now,
And I marked his earnest mien,
And thy downcast maiden brow.
Then I cast my spade aside,
Ay, forever and a day,
And a poet-heart rose up,
Where youth's life in ruins lay.

Time and change have wrought their will;
I am poor and low no more,
And I draw the fame I own
From the agonies of yore.
Furnace fires must purge the gold,
Ere it shineth free from stain;
Rocks are rent ere gems shine out,
That had else been rich in vain.

Art thou happy in thy home,
With his children at thy knee?
Does the world's loud voice of praise,
Ever speak to thee of me?
Dost thou ever dream how dear
Once I held, and hold thee yet?
For the true heart knows no change—
It can all things—save forget.

CHAPTER XIV.

MY HONORABLE MASTERS.

Now followed a passage of my life so long and dreary, a period of such utter and hideous monotony, that the memory of it is rather like the confused recollection of a procession of nightmare dreams than of an actual experience in this waking world. For ten months our ship plowed the waters; for the greater part of a year we wretches huddled together in our dingy quarters, or snatched a brief respite from gloom and suffocation at such times as the captain graciously allowed us to take the air on an obscure corner of the upper deck. No words can tell how we suffered; and if the helpless African bondsmen in the middle-passage suffer more than we did, man's cruelty to his fellow-men is indeed an illimitable quantity. Our quarters were of the closest, our food of the roughest; water was doled out to us by the veriest thimblefuls; the atmosphere we breathed was a compound of foulest stenches; the very pigs and poultry—narrow as was the room allowed them—fared better than we. And this slow torture lasted for ten months.

Brief was the excitement which the sight of land afforded to us; 'twas a bitter, desperate kind of pleasure, a very passion of longing and despair, like that of a lover who snatches one fond look at the mistress who can never be his. To this day I can recall the violent throbbing of my heart as, through the thick haze of evening, Madeira rose upon our larboard bow, and we poor wretches crowded together at the narrow port-hole, and almost fought for a sight of that strange island. 'Twas a month after this that a shoal of dolphins played round the ship; and as these free and happy creatures sported in the sun I could but remember the legend of Arion, and long for some friendly monster whose scaly back might bear me to the shore. Alas! the days of fable are long gone, and the gods come no more upon earth to rescue man from his fellow-man's oppression!

We had not been long afloat before my fever left me, still very feeble and unlike my former self, but no longer an invalid. The first business of my convalescence was to obtain the means of writing—which I accomplished with some difficulty, so scant were the accommodations of these dismal quarters. Provided at last with these, I penned a long letter to Lady Barbara, detailing the story of my capture, and describing my present miserable condition. I besought her, by the love she had borne my father, by her Christian piety for undeserved misfortune, to attempt my early rescue from a fate so hopeless. I warned this generous friend that the same treachery which had compassed my ruin would blacken my character, and that slanders the most plausible would be invented to rob me of her confidence; and then followed the incoherent entreaties of despair, passionate lamentations, wild messages of affection for the beloved girl I had forever lost, which, in some small measure, relieved an overcharged heart and brain.

This letter I directed under cover to the milliner in Long Acre, and having secured it, placed the packet in my waistcoat pocket in readiness for any homeward-bound vessel with which our captain might exchange greetings. Day after day, week after week, I watched and waited for the friendly sail that was to convey this letter; and my heart sickened as the days wore out, and no vessel came within hail of us. Nor was this all; for on one occasion I endured the sharper agonies of disappointed hope, when, on our captain hailing a trading-vessel, she turned out to be a brig laden with Spanish wine, and bound for the Mauritius.

We had been more than six months afloat when the opportunity I so longed for at last arrived in the shape of a homeward-bound Indiaman, to which the long-boat was speedily dispatched with a couple of officers. I was not the only one among the recruits eager to send home some greeting; but when I and half a dozen others crowded to the open hatchway and besought the captain to dispatch our letters, the kindly gentleman laughed us to scorn. Did we think he could trouble himself with the whims and humors of such dirt? And what had we to write about, pray? Complaints of our treatment, no doubt, which would only make mischief at home, and rob the Honorable East India Company of good soldiers.

"No," cried the captain, "I know what a set of lying, ungrateful rascals you are, and you shall send none of your lies to England by my help."

This speech the skipper liberally garnished with such blasphemies as were the salt of his daily discourse, and then roared to one of his men to shut down the hatchway and drive that vermin into their holes.

There is no despot so awful as the tyrant who reigns upon his own quarter-deck. Against his cruel will there is no resistance except crime, and to oppose his hellish tyranny is to be at once involved in rebellion and bloodshed. The spark of mutiny is a fire that spreads swift as flame among the parched jungle-grass of the Sunderbunds, and I knew that it would need but little to stir that idle Pandemonium between decks into an active Inferno. So I crept back to my hole with the other vermin, and lay there as desolate as, and more desperate than, Job; for I needed no tempter to bid me curse God and die. I think at this time my sufferings had banished all Christian feeling from my mind; and if I endured life when self-murder seemed a relief so easy, it was from no faith in the Divine Providence, no fear of the almighty wrath, but from the one savage hope that, in some time to come, when my cup of anguish had been drained to the very dregs, Fate would give me the opportunity of being revenged on the author of my misery.

After the captain's refusal to send my letter I abandoned myself utterly to despair, and fell into a state scarcely less degraded than that of my companions. Like them I no longer kept count of the wretched days; like them I slept a dull dreamless sleep through the dreary nights; like them I ate and drank the scanty portion given to me with the appetite of some half-savage beast; like them I forgot the existence of a better world than this floating hell, and blasphemed the God who ruled above that happier earth. And thus the time went past us somehow; in days that had far less of color and variety than the waves that rolled by our narrow port-holes; in nights that were darker than the storm-clouds that brooded over our vessel in the time of the monsoon; until one dull, stormy morning there rose the cry of land, and a friendly sailor told us that the temple of Juggernaut was visible about fifteen miles to the northwest.

Every creature among our luckless herd felt a curiosity to behold this first spectacle which our new country offered us. We crowded to the hatchway, and in the confusion of the moment were suffered to gaze our fill. Dimly discernible to the naked eye appeared the dark outline of a pagoda which, at that distance, seemed not unlike a rude church-tower. Bernier's Travels had made me familiar with the monstrous worship that prevails in this temple of the Indian Moloch, the road to which for fifty miles is bestrewn with bleaching bones and rotting carrion, and I felt that the shrine of a religion so ghastly was a fitting object to greet my eyes at the end of this fatal voyage.

"Would to Heaven I could believe in the Brahmin's Paradise, and after steeping my senses in some maddening spirit cast myself beneath the wheels of the monster god's triumphal car!" I said to myself, as I stood among the squalid crowd, gazing at that dim outline in the distance.

We fancied ourselves now at the end of our journey; but we were doomed to lie within sight of Juggernaut for two days and nights, and then made but slow head against the swell and current from the northeast. The coast of Orisa is so low as to be indistinguishable from a very short distance, and our sailors were compelled to feel their way by soundings every half hour. Meanwhile the situation of the herd below was, if possible, a little increased in wretchedness, for the ship was being painted in order to make a fair show in harbor; and we, poor creatures, had the worst of the paint, which did much to render an already stifling atmosphere utterly unbearable. Nor did we fare any better by venturing on deck, whence we were driven by execrations from the busy seamen, and had thus no alternative from the misery of our hole below.

I wondered, as I heard the men whistling gayly at their work, to think how brave a thing the vessel would look riding at anchor, and how little any stranger who gazed upon her would suspect the anguish and cruelty that had been suffered between her decks.

On the next day we anchored in Sagor Roads, and from an unoccupied port-hole I enjoyed a clear view of Sagor Island—a flat, swampy shore, with tall trees that looked like fir, and beneath them vivid green jungle. Here I saw animals browsing among the swampy grass, and was afterward informed that these were wild deer, and that the island is furthermore infested by tigers, who will even swim off from the coast to destroy any imprudent boatman who trusts his bark within their ken—whence it is that no bribe will induce the natives to approach this savage wilderness.

While I peered from my port-hole at this low-lying island a dark object floated close beside my post of observation, and drifted slowly past with the tide. It was a human corpse, consigned to the sacred river—perhaps ere death had closed the scene—by the pious hands of its dutiful progeny.

"Alas, poor ghost!" I said, "art thou the sole friend who dost welcome me to this barbarous shore, where superstition has added her own peculiar horrors to the natural terrors of death?"

While we lay at anchor a crowd of boats surrounded us, laden with fruit and other merchandise, while Sircars—men who practice as agents and money-lenders, and who surpass their fellow-practitioners, the Jews, in the arts of their profession—exercised their fascinations upon the captain and officers of the ship. Now, for the first time, I had the opportunity of observing the living Gentoo, and in his delicately-moulded form and finely-chiseled features I saw much to induce the belief that from this Oriental stock sprang that flower of antique civilization, the Greek.

After lying for some hours at anchor we approached the side of the river opposite Kedgerie, and I beheld a dismal shore, thickly wooded, black, monotonous—the very home of all noxious and fatal creatures, from the tiger and the cobra, down to the scorpion and mosquito. Night closed in as I gazed upon this dreary coast, and lightnings flashed incessantly above the fever-haunted woods. The sailors spoke of the place as the grave of all hapless wretches who were doomed to remain many days in its neighborhood.

At Diamond Harbor we anchored again, and here we recruits were drafted into a smaller vessel sent down from Calcutta for our reception; and on board this we made our voyage up the Hooghly River, a noble stream, across which our vessel tacked as in a sea.

And now the end of our troublous transit had come, or not quite the end, for we were put ashore some miles from the British settlement to which we were bound, and had a weary march through rank woods of Oriental foliage, and afterward by an ill-made sandy road, scarce worthy the name, with ditches of stagnant water on either side. This being the dry season, we tramped through an intolerable cloud of dust, which, together with the heat, well-nigh stifled us; and so onward, with but brief respite, till we came to one of the ill-guarded gates of Calcutta.

Hence we were marched to the fort, and here we found a very meagre force of mixed soldiery—English, Hindoos, and Topases, so called from the fact of their wearing hats, a species of native Christians, a mixed race, produced by the intermarriage of natives with the early Portuguese settlers. I had heard and read so much of Oriental magnificence as seen by Jesuit travelers at Delhi and other cities of the East, that I had good reason to be disgusted with the English settlement to which fate had brought me; but it was yet the humble beginning of British rule, and the conqueror who was to trample on the neck of Indian power, and transform a trading company into a splendid despotism, was but upon the threshold of his marvelous career. I look back to this period, remembering that it was then I first heard the name of Robert Clive, and can still but wonder at the obscure commencement of that heroic romance of which this young man was destined to be the protagonist. When I landed on the shores of the Hooghly in February, 1751, it was but six years since Clive had arrived at Madras, with no higher hope than belongs to the position of a clerk or writer in the Company's civil service. He came, poor, friendless, and lonely, to the shore of that land which he was fated to hold by a grander power than India had felt since the sceptre of the Moguls slipped from the loosening grasp of Aurungzebe. I, who have drained the bitter cup which step-mother Fortune offers to the lips of friendless youth, can but think with a peculiar sympathy of this unfriended lad, who was sent to India chiefly because his father knew not what to do with him in England, and whose lofty spirit sickened at the common round of daily drudgery, while his warm heart languished in the loneliness of a land so strange.

Nothing could well be more insignificant than Robert Clive's start in life. He whose name was to be in less than ten years the wonder of the civilized world, and the chief glory of Great Britain, had not a single friend, nay, scarce an acquaintance, in Madras, and was of a temper too wayward and reserved to seek introductions by the common arts of society. Studious as he was proud, he esteemed the admission to the Governor's excellent library the highest privilege he enjoyed. I have been told how that constitutional melancholy, which was so near akin to madness, displayed itself even at this early age, and how one day, on a companion coming into the young man's room in Writers' Buildings, Clive begged him to take up a pistol and fire it out of the window. The man complied. "Then, by Heaven, I am reserved for something," cried Clive; "for I have twice snapped that pistol at my head." Alas, 'twas but a premature rehearsal of a future tragedy!

When I first saw Calcutta, nothing could well be darker than the aspect of affairs in that presidency. John Company held his ground as yet only on sufferance, and by virtue of handsome payments to the Soubahdar, whose rule was at once nearer and stronger than the somewhat shadowy sovereignty of Delhi. Nor was the Soubahdar the only power our Company had to fear. France had in these days an apparently sure footing in Hindostan, while her interests were well cared for and her power audaciously pushed by Joseph Francis Dupleix, the Governor of Pondicherry. It was but five years since the bombardment of Madras by the French admiral, De la Bourdonnais, ending in the capitulation of that town and the Governor of Pondicherry's infamous violation of the treaty of surrender, whereby the Admiral had pledged himself to restore the settlement on payment of a moderate ransom. This notorious treachery had resulted in triumph to the traitor and disgrace to the honorable man, who strove hard to redeem his word with the English, and who, on his return to France, was flung into the Bastille, and left to languish there for a period of three years, as an encouragement for future honorable-minded admirals. For here I think we may retort upon M. de Voltaire the jest which he afterward made about our own unfortunate Admiral Byng; since the iniquitous sentence that deprived Byng of life was no more cruel than the slow torture which murdered De la Bourdonnais, a much greater man.

Dupleix, on the contrary, had succeeded in elevating himself to the giddy summit of power by a series of intrigues with native princes and native usurpers. He was now Governor of the Mogul dominions on the Coast of Coromandel from the river Kistna to Cape Comorin. He affected an Oriental magnificence known only to native princes, and displayed among his splendid insignia the princely badge of the fish; while his friends boldly affirmed that ere long the Mogul on his throne would tremble at the name of Dupleix. The English beheld these triumphs of a rival nation with an indifference that might proceed from either apathy or despair. They made no attempt to stem a torrent that threatened to overwhelm them; and Major Laurence, the commander of the troops, chose this critical juncture as a fitting time for his return to England.

The fort at Calcutta was ill-defended and worse garrisoned. The wide ditch, dug in 1742 by the Indian inhabitants of the colony, at their own expense, and under a panic-like terror of a Morattoe invasion, had never been completed. It was designed to completely encircle the Company's bounds, and would have been, when perfect, seven miles in extent; but when three miles had been completed, after a labor of six months, the Bengalese, with true Indian supineness, desisted from the work, nor did the Company care for its completion, seeing that no Morattoes had ever been on the western side of the river within sixty miles of Calcutta, and that Allaverdy, the Soubahdar of Bengal and Orisa, exerted himself vigorously to prevent their incursions into the Island of Cossimbuzar.

When I first entered Fort William I was completely ignorant of the present condition of the country in which I found myself. Hakluyt's voyages and Bernier's pleasant book had made me tolerably familiar with the splendid court and city of the Mohammedan conquerors of Hindostan, but of Indian history since the death of Aurungzebe and the decline of the Mogul power I knew scarcely any thing; and I can not but wonder at the small degree of interest which Englishmen at home felt in the adventures of their countrymen in this strange land.

When Philip Hay and I, with some twenty other recruits, reached our destination, we found the meagre garrison of Calcutta commanded by five captains, with corresponding subordinate officers, who agreed in nothing so heartily as their contempt for the station to which they were appointed, and their neglect of all duties connected with it. To drink, to sleep, to gamble, to intrigue with loose-lived native women, and to absent themselves from their quarters on every possible occasion, in order to indulge their fancy for the field-sports of the adjoining country, formed the rule of their lives. They had indeed sorry inducement for fidelity to their posts. Nothing could be more dismal than life in the fort and in the town of Calcutta, where the few European houses scattered among the ruder native habitations were in the occupation of British traders and merchants, who thought of nothing but the rapid increase of their wealth, or were absorbed in the discussion of their petty disputes with the managers of the Company at home.

And thus did Sergeant O'Blagg's florid promises of Oriental glory and plunder result in the guardianship of a factory, or store-house for cotton-stuffs; and I found myself at twenty years of age the companion of a mixed assemblage, and subject to the tyranny of the Irish sergeant, who proved himself a truculent scoundrel, before whom the Topases and native soldiers—spahis, or sea-poys, as they were called by us—quailed and trembled.

I have little need to linger over this first portion of my Indian experiences. My life for the space of one year was a blank, the monotony of which was broken only by some petty variety in the details of my suffering. I, whose youth had known only the refined labors of a scholar, found myself working in a ditch with a mixed gang of British recruits and tawny Hindoos, at some necessary repair of our feeble fortifications, exposed to the glare of a meridian sun in a copper-colored sky, and threatened with the lash at every symptom of flagging industry.

Our military education meanwhile was of a most primitive order. We shared the drill of the sepoy, who wore their native costume of turban, shirt, and loose cotton trousers, and wielded their native arms of sword and target. The number of our officers was in ridiculous proportion to the pitiful handful of troops, not two hundred in all, and but sixty of these Englishmen. They were too lazy to give us much instruction, too indifferent or unexpectant of danger to be interested in their duty; nor did the seizure and French occupation of Madras, with its loss of millions to the Company, arouse the garrison of Calcutta to any extraordinary exertion. It appears to me, indeed, that it has ever been a quality of the British mind to await the imminent approach of a peril before taking measures to prevent it; and it was only in the fatal summer of '56 that the five captains of our garrison discovered how ill we were defended.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE affairs of Spain absorb every one's attention just now, but all definite intelligence stops at Biarritz; and there are few, except those directly in the Court circle, who are fully informed of what is taking place.

The Empress sets such an example of simplicity at Biarritz that extravagance in dress seems to have somewhat diminished. She always appears on the beach in short suits of woolen, cashmere, flannel, poplin, or Scotch plaid. She is especially partial to black and gray. She has several suits, some pearl-gray and others dove-colored, simply trimmed with the same material; the under-skirt has a deep flounce, the tunic is caught up at the sides à la Pompadour, and edged with a narrow cashmere flounce. The mantilla with square tabs is lined with silk of the same color. A belt of cashmere without ends, or of gros grain with fringed ends, is fastened over the mantilla. A gray straw-hat with curled feathers of the same shade as the dress completes this toilette. The Empress usually wears long Saxony gloves without buttons, and buttoned kid boots, or slippers with silk stockings of the same color as the dress.

The Emperor rises very early at Biarritz as well as every where else; and if he has no urgent business on hand goes out alone at seven in the morning to walk in the suburbs. These are his happiest moments; he chats with the peasants whom he meets, questions the children, gives a few louis to the poor of the neighborhood, and returns to the Eugénie villa as late as possible.

The family breakfast is very unceremonious; the ladies of the Empress appear in the dress that they intend to wear the rest of the day, and that they have already worn in the morning on the beach; for the Empress goes down to the shore the moment she is dressed. What is more astonishing is that the dinner also is entirely without ceremony; the gentlemen appear in frock-coats, and the ladies' dresses are not low, but simply heart-shaped or square in front with long close sleeves. When the Empress wears a low-necked dress she often adds a lace fichu, open in front, like those that are seen in the portraits of Marie Antoinette.

I will describe one of the dinner dresses worn by the Empress. A trained dress of sky-blue taffeta trimmed with ruffles, with a flounce of point d'Angleterre between each ruche; both ruffles and lace extend up the en tablier. The heart-shaped corsage is edged in front with a ruche and a frill of lace, with lace truyauté inside. Medallion of turquoises and diamonds, suspended round the neck by a black velvet ribbon; coiffure of curls behind, with Grecian knot on top of the head, and short curls in front; long pendants of turquoises and diamonds in the ears.

The young girls at the imperial table generally wear white corsages of muslin and Valenciennes, with light silk skirts, or dresses of silk gauze with high corsage over a low-necked silk dress.

There are but four young girls staying at this moment with the Empress; these are her two nieces, the daughters of the Duchesse d'Albe, and Mdles. Marion and de Lermina, her readers. The Emperor sits in the middle of the table with the Empress at his right, and the Prince Imperial at his left. Opposite the Emperor is the Prefect of the palace, who has at his right and left the daughters of the Duchesse d'Albe. The other persons are seated by the Chamberlain in waiting. The elder of the Empress's young nieces, who is but fifteen, is dark like her mother, and slender, with an exquisite rosy complexion. Her finely-cut features are charming. She promises to become a great beauty. The table service is almost always double; for instance, there are always two soups, eight entrées, two roasts, etc., etc.

The winter fashions are already beginning to appear. The Scotch or tartan plaids will be very much worn for negligée street dresses. A very pretty fashion called the Arabella costume has lately been invented by the celebrated modiste of Paris, Mme. Elisé. This is the Forty-second costume (green and blue), so called because it is worn by the Forty-second Highlanders. The under-skirt is pleated around the bottom; the tunic is caught up very high at the sides, forming a little apron in front, and is fringed all around with large chenille balls of the same color as the plaid. The tunic is looped up with black gros grain rosettes with flowing ends. Small paletot of the same material, simulating a tight jacket in front, and buttoning at the side with two square tabs falling in front, the whole fringed with chenille balls. A small cape notched at the bottom forms the back of the paletot. Rosettes of black gros grain with flowing ends are set on the shoulders and the back of the cape. The belt is of the same material as the dress, and is worn over the paletot. This costume is extremely pretty and coquetish.

JULIE DE PUISIEUX.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE Bois de Boulogne, which is the pride of Paris, is a park of magnificent distances. It contains over twenty-three hundred acres, and has a thick growth of various kinds of forest trees. Indeed, since the improvements were commenced in 1851, more than two hundred thousand trees are said to have been planted in the Bois. It is also abundantly watered, its lakes and little streams being supplied by an Artesian well at Passy, which springs from a depth of eighteen hundred and seventy-five feet. There are no less than fourteen lakes in this renowned pleasure-ground, the largest being about a mile in length. Many of them are well filled with fish, which flourish remarkably. There are nearly seventy miles of carriage-roads, and over thirty miles of shady paths for horseback riders. Moreover, it contains one of the largest race-courses in the world. There are in this Park some immense oaks and cedars, which are supposed to be four or five centuries old. No wonder the Parisians are proud of the Bois de Boulogne.

A London paper thinks that agricultural meetings will soon become the rage. Reason, as follows: A short time ago, at the annual dinner of the Huntingdonshire Agricultural Society, one of the gentlemen proposed as a toast, "The health of Mrs. Fellowes and the ladies of Huntingdonshire." Presently Mrs. Fellowes, wife of a well-known member of Parliament, who was chairman of the evening, rose and "with great distinctness" responded in a pretty little speech which was received with enthusiastic cheers.

In Paris the question of woman's rights and wrongs has recently been warmly discussed in a series of public meetings held in Le Vauxhall. Only one of the speakers is charged with having said anything original and worthy of notice. She—for it was a woman, Mlle. Maxime Breuil—claimed for women equal political rights with men, but did not wish to see them in possession of those rights at present. She remarked that until women were properly enlightened respecting their duties, men must continue to bear alone the responsibility of the lamentable incapacity of which they have given proof hitherto. In presence of this incapacity, and while bearing with them the burden of its grievous results, she could without temerity assert that women might have done better, and there was great consolation in thinking that at any rate they could not have done worse!

The women of Germany have held a conference at Stuttgart recently—but not to discuss the popular question of suffrage. They desired to find out the best ways and means to teach young mothers how best to regulate the physical education of their children. They also wished to make some arrangements for establishing small museums of literature, art, and industry, connected with schools or academies where proper instruction on various topics could be given to women. Furthermore, they desired to commence a reform in dress, and as a basis for this reform the following points have been accepted: That nothing be declared "old-fashioned" which has once been found useful, appropriate, and becoming. That nothing new be adopted unless it has proved itself to be both to the purpose and answering the demands of good taste. That all garments and articles of toilette that are hurtful to health be put away. And, finally, that all suitable saving be effected in articles of dress, so that expenses may conform to the income. The German women are very sensible.

The number of lives lost by the late earthquakes in South America is estimated at 60,000; but it is probable this can not be relied upon as being correct. Additional accounts of damage from inundations have been received, but there is some confusion in them, and it is difficult to know the truth definitely. Gradually the whole dreadful reality will be revealed.

A very interesting and ingenious instrument is reported from inventive Paris. It is a "universal alphabetical piano," on which children can be taught instantaneously to read, to calculate, and to play music. Price six francs, which is certainly a good deal cheaper than sending children to school.

An Englishman criticises "cablegram" as mongrel and unsatisfactory. He suggests, as a word that is regularly and analogically formed, "calogram," the first half of which is from the Greek word signifying cable.

Twenty-seven public evening-schools have been opened this fall in our city by the Board of Education. The facilities thus afforded for instruction are largely accepted by persons of mature age; and experience has shown the wisdom of making such liberal arrangements for the educational wants of those whose avocations prevent them from attending day-schools.

In commenting upon the precocity of American children, Mr. Macrae, a Scottish writer who recently visited this country, remarks: "One thing that astonished me was the food given to the children. It seems to be the rule in America to let the children have a share of everything on the table. A New England lady told me that every one of her eleven children had been brought to the table at seven months old, and at thirteen months could handle their forks as neatly as she could! Brought to the table so soon, and hearing all that goes on, they begin at a preternaturally early age to take an interest in general affairs, and to acquire the ideas and language of grown people." Among other instances he mentions a family-party which attracted his attention at a hotel breakfast-table at Niagara. One of the party was a child between two and three years of age. The first thing this small gentleman had was a cup of milk and biscuit. Then he had two eggs and a slice of "Johnny-cake." He sipped very little of the egg, and then called for fish. After fish he had beef, and after the beef bacon and biscuit. What more he might have needed was left uncertain by reason of his spilling the eggs over his own and his mother's dress, which caused him to be carried away from the table in a state of humiliation.

Madame Rachel, who has long been imposing upon the ignorant and superstitious people of London, by promises to make them "beautiful forever," has at length come to the end of her business for the present. She has been sentenced to five years' penal servitude, as punishment for various frauds which her recent trial unveiled. One of the wonderful preparations which she sold to credulous customers was "Magnetic dew-water, from the Desert of Sahara, two guineas a bottle." The story is that in the interior of the Great Desert of Sahara there is a magnetic rock, from which water distills sparingly in the form of dew, which is possessed of extraordinary property. Whether a latent electricity be imparted by magnetism, or an additional quantity of oxygen enters into its composition, is not known. But it is said to have the property of increasing the vital energies, and to restore gray hair, and to give the appearance of youth to persons of considerable antiquity. Whether Madame Rachel filled her bottles in Sahara may be open to doubt.

"A well-cooked piece of meat," says Professor Johnson in his "Chemistry of Common Life," "should be full of its own juice." In roasting, therefore, it should be exposed to a quick fire, that the external surface may contract at once, and the juice be retained. In boiling, the meat should be put into boiling water at first, unless beef-tea, broth, or soup is to be prepared from it; then it should be put into cold water and slowly brought to a boil.

The old statuary-gallery of the Boston Athenæum has been transformed into a large, light, and attractive reading-room. Much of the sculpture and statuary remains as appropriate ornamentation of the room.

"Sidewalk Etiquette" is a topic which might be studied up advantageously. If promenaders in Broadway would follow a few well-known common-sense rules, there would be much less friction on the sidewalks of that great thoroughfare than we now frequently observe. If those walking up Broadway are resolved to follow a straight line close to the shop windows, they had better take the east side of the street, unless they desire to endure collisions and reproving looks. Stopping in the middle of the sidewalk to chat a few minutes with a friend creates an obstruction less easily avoided than a good-sized pile of bricks. We have seen a party of three or four spread across the sidewalk as if linked together, slowly promenading, quite unconscious that they are seriously annoying those behind, who can not pass without seeming rudeness. When a gentleman and lady are walking together, a common rule, and a very good one, is that the lady should always be at the gentleman's right arm; then the lady will be protected against any friction incident to passing those coming from the opposite direction.

The Cornell University, which has been recently opened in Ithaca, New York, is located about three-quarters of a mile from the town, on a slightly ridge. The entire country in the vicinity of Ithaca is exceedingly romantic and picturesque, the beautiful Cayuga Lake forming a marked point of interest. The buildings of the University are not yet entirely completed by any means—the plan embracing a large number designed for various uses. Two buildings, however, are ready for occupation, and about three hundred pupils have been admitted upon examination. The public exercises in connection with the opening were of much interest. A valuable gift was made to the University by a lady of Ithaca—a chime of nine bells, weighing about six thousand pounds. Cornell University will afford to students the means of obtaining an education, in which the literary, scientific, and practical are happily combined, at a very moderate expense.

In Paris there are a number of negro and mulatto families among the wealthy foreign residents, who associate with aristocratic French families on terms of equality. M. Pontchery, a wealthy negro from Port-au-Prince, lives with his family in one of the finest houses on the Chausée-d'Antin, keeps half a dozen white servants, and was invited into society last winter. He is a millionaire, and has a very fine gallery of paintings and statuary. Candoris is another rich negro resident. His eldest daughter is a great belle, and receives much attention in society from many who seem to care nothing about her ancestry.

There is a pleasant superstition, supposed to have originated in Poland, that the nativity of every individual has a mysterious connection with some one of the precious stones. Hence it is considered by many as appropriate to wear those jewels which are imagined to give significance to a certain month, if the birthday occurred in that month. That is, one born in January should wear garnet or jacinth; amethyst belongs to February; blood-stone to March; sapphire and diamond to April; emerald to May; agate to June; carnelian or ruby to July; sardonyx to August; chrysolite to September; opal to October; topaz to November; and turquoise to December. Of course each of these gems, in their fabled character, is supposed to have a special signification.

Victoria is reported to be busy—writing a novel! This, with her attempts to regulate the conduct of the Prince of Wales, is sufficient occupation.

Sydney Smith is said to have cut the following extract from a newspaper and preserved it: "When you rise in the morning form a resolution to make the day a happy one to a fellow-creature. It is easily done; a left-off garment to the man who needs, a kind word to the sorrowful, an encouraging expression to the striving—trifles in themselves light as air—will do it, at least for twenty-four hours. By the most simple arithmetical sum, look at the result. If you send one person, only one, happily through the day, that is three hundred and sixty-five in the course of the year. And supposing you live forty years only after you commence such a course of medicine, you have made fourteen thousand six hundred beings happy, at all events for a time."

Who is a "lady" now, in the original sense of the term? The word "lady" is an abbreviation of the Saxon "leofday," which signifies "bread-giver." In olden times the mistress of a manor was accustomed, once a week or oftener, to distribute among the poor a certain quantity of bread. She bestowed the gift with her own hands, and made the hearts of the needy glad by the soft words and gentle actions which accompanied her benevolence. The poor regarded the "leofday" as a sort of ministering spirit in a world of sorrow and suffering.

Fig. 1.—VICTORIA. Black velvet paletot rounded in front and shawl-shaped in the back. The paletot is edged with a bias fold of black satin, above which is set a double row of passementerie rings. The point is bordered with deep fringe. Cardinal pelerine rounded in the front and back, and trimmed with the same passementerie and fringe; a few pleats are laid in the back of the pelerine and confined by a black satin rosette. Dress of Irish poplin, slightly looped at the sides. Cashmere skirt of the same color, trimmed with a pleated flounce. Fanchon of iris velvet, with a ruche of black lace sprinkled with small velvet bows, and a black and white aigrette at the side.

Fig. 2.—TROUVÈRE. Negligée paletot of dark blue velvet, open square at the sides, where it forms two draped pleats. At the angle of each pleat is set a blue passementerie olive. Three rows of black silk galloon encircle the whole paletot, which is confined round the waist by a blue belt, fastening in front. The back is very full, forming pleats to match those at the side. The sleeve is full at the elbow, widening to the bottom, and is trimmed with black silk galloon. Fanchon of blue satin, bordered with a ruche of black lace, with a large blue velvet bow on the top and a diadem of the same velvet in front. Black faille dress.

Fig. 3.—DAUPHIN. Short paletot of black faille, bordered with a bias fold of satin, with a heading of cocotte points of the same satin. A long point, edged with passementerie fringe, surmounted with a satin bias fold and cocottes, extends below the back of the paletot. Two passementerie rings, through which are passed a short bias lappet ending with three tassels, are placed at the top of the V that forms the point. Cardinal pelerine, slightly looped up in the back, and trimmed with a bias fold and cocottes of satin to match the rest of the paletot. A sharp-pointed Armenian hood falls below the pelerine, and matches the point on the lower part of the paletot, being trimmed in the same manner with fringe, and having in the middle a passementerie ring and bias lappet. Sleeves trimmed with black satin cocottes. Bear's-ear taffeta dress, with two flounces round the bottom and a third round a tunic which is rounded at the sides and slightly bouffant behind. Black felt toque with large bow of lace with long ends at the back, and small toque of velvet and lace and tuft of bear's-ear velvet in front.

Fig. 4.—HENRY IV. Black velvet circular, bordered with a broad bias fold of satin, and with large buttons extending all the way up the front. Close-fitting corsage, with brandenburghs of black satin cocottes, arranged diagonally, which begin at the shoulder and end under the band that holds the buttons. Adjusted belt. Two long rings of black cocottes extend from each side of the belt and simulate pockets on each side of the front. A large pelerine, open in front, and reaching only to the shoulder, is set on the paletot and bordered with fringe. The bottom is trimmed only with cocottes set on in narrow ogives. The paletot is without sleeves, and, the pelerine being very open, shows both the sleeves of the dress and brandenburghs on the front. Dress of light gray Irish poplin, with an under-skirt of a darker shade, trimmed with a very deep pleated flounce. The over-skirt is caught up at the sides, and bordered with a narrow pleated flounce, surmounted by three rows of gray velvet which form a bow of loops and ends at the place where the skirt is festooned. Green crape fanchon, trimmed with a diadem of grapes and vine-leaves, with a small mantilla-veil behind, extending so as to form bars under the chin.

Fig. 5.—NINON DE L'ENCLOS. Large violet velvet mantelet, shawl-shaped behind and trimmed with a rich passementerie fringe formed of detached tassels, and embroidered around the bottom with black silk and several shades of violet. Cardinal pelerine above the shawl-point, and trimmed in the same manner. The pelerine begins at the side seam, which is covered by the raising of the arm. The mantelet has two long, half-rounded tabs in front, which are trimmed around the outer edge with embroidery and are fringed only on the ends. Fanchon of very light pearl-gray crape, trimmed with violet velvet chrysanthemums, with fall of violet blonde behind. Dress of very light gray gros grain, with Louis XV. flounce.

Fig. 6.—LAIS. Suit of dark capucine serge. Plain under-skirt. Rounded tunic trimmed with fringe of the same shade. Tight-fitting paletot, looped by two large shell buttons. Round belt, fastened behind with a rosette, from which fall two black and capucine passementerie cords. Fringe round the shoulders like that on the tunic, with a rosette in the middle. Gray felt toque, bordered with a large black and capucine curled feather, with lace veil at the back.

in the ceremony of stealing the bride which prevails, or not long ago prevailed, at weddings in the country districts of the Border. "A wedding cortège in Sweden," says Mr. MacLennan, "was long after the introduction of Christianity a party of armed men, and for greater security marriages were generally performed at night. A pile of lances is said to be still preserved in the old church at Husaby in Gothland, into which were fitted torches; these weap-

In those turbulent times every church had a rack in the porch for holding the axes and spears of the congregation, so that the lances of Husaby may not have had any special or symbolical reference to the theory of marriage by capture; but we thought that we could trace the influ-

A HARDANGER WEDDING.

AN English tourist gives an interesting account of an old-fashioned wedding or bryllup, which he was fortunate enough to see during a journey through the Hardanger Province. The word signifies the race for the bride, and alludes to the custom of marriage by capture which has been shown to have prevailed in ancient times among all the savage nations in the world. The traces of the same custom have survived in the "Welsh weddings," and ence of the tradition in the wedding which we attended, where the shouts and excited rushings, with the firing of guns and pistols, raised all the din and confusion of a real battle for the bride. The bride's father sat outside the house among the elders of the village with a silver spigot in his hand. Ale was served from the barrel at his side into a massive peg-tankard, inscribed with verses in the Hardanger dialect; and the bride herself, smiling through her tears, handed the stronger drinks in finely-embossed cups to all who wished to drink "Skaal" and long life to her. At last the time came for the service in a church across the water. The bridegroom no longer dangled his bonnet, but helped to push off the boats; the flags waved, the bride was embraced, and amidst a parting salute from all our artillery at once, the wedding cortège departed. We had been permitted in the morning, while the bride's hair was being plaited in thick coils of a shape fit to receive her crown, to inspect her ornaments, which had been heirlooms in the family for several generations. The most valuable, of course, was the crown, silver-gilt and adorned with garnets, which was of a more massive pattern than those in the Bergen shops; it differed from them, moreover, in being hung with gilt pendants, beads, and tufts of colored wool. A fine breast-plate, filigreed brooches, and a silver marriage-belt, complete the list of her principal adornments. The following description of the belt of a rich lady in Iceland applies exactly to that of the Hardanger bride: "The petticoat is fastened by means of a girdle nearly five feet in length, composed of a number of oblong pieces of silver about an inch and a half long and one inch wide, sewed with their extremities close together upon a piece of green velvet, so that it forms a number of joints and is easily bent round the body and fastened with a buckle: one end is suffered to hang down in front of the apron and nearly reaches the bottom of it. All the joints are gilt and beautifully ornamented with open work and raised knobs of silver." After the wedding a feast commenced which lasted for nearly three days, as far as we could judge by the succession of jaded revelers who returned in scattered boat loads from the bride's new home across the water. The king of the feast was her father, who boasted afterward of the strength of mind and body which had enabled him, like Socrates, to drink down all the boon companions, and return unconquered by the flow of "Port og Punch og Braendevin." A few nights afterward we joined a revel of a more pleasing kind, the lads and lasses of the village having been invited to a dance in the kitchen of the chief farm-house. A fiddle and a wooden black-jack of beer completed the simple preparations of the host, and the company were soon merrily engaged in their favorite Sultan Polka, and the Jenny Lind, which here they call the Hamburg Dance. We were much amused at the strangeness of the Halling dance, which was performed with great success by the most agile of the village lads. He marched round the floor with a solemn face to a soft fantastic tune, casting his eyes now and then upon a large nail which had been driven into the centre of the low wooden roof. Then at the right note, as he passed beneath the nail, he turned a sudden somersault, and struck it with his clouted boot, which brought down great applause at each successful repetition of the feat.

BY THE PEACH-TREE WALL.

WHERE the manor-house garden is tangled the most,
By the door in the peach-tree wall,
You bid me farewell—for an hour, as you thought—
But we parted for once and all.

Through the long white glare how the peonies flamed,
In the noon of the July day,
As you crossed the grass with the gold on your hair,
And the crickets leaped up where they lay!

The sunflowers unwinking, looked straight at the south,
And the hollyhocks stood tall;
And the butterflies hovered brown, azure, and red,
In the hush by the peach-tree wall.

After midsummer days with never a night,
Came the winter, the chill, and the rain,
When the hollyhocks' life was asleep in the ground,
Till the peach-blossoms flowered again.

And the wearisome months of waiting in vain,
Ever stealing my youth from me,
Ever straining my eyes through the darkness,
Ever stretching my arms o'er the sea.

For the fire of that sultry summer sun
Has burned down so deep in my heart,
Though years and the autumn bring calmness, my dear,
I am scarce now content to part.

For still when the July noons are come,
And the hollyhocks grow tall,
I walk and dream dreams as we dreamed, my dear,
Under the peach-tree wall.

When the passionate life-strife is over,
The folly, the chill, and the pain,
A shadow, in shadowless noontide,
Perhaps I may walk here again.

SPOKEN IN IDLENESS.

By ANNIE THOMAS.

"IT is of very little consequence where he met her, or how he met her, he has married her!—that is the point that concerns us most painfully," Mrs. Armitage said, with a sad severity, when she first heard of her brother's marriage. But Ethel, her daughter, felt a great curiosity on the subject, and so when her mamma dropped the letter that contained the tidings, Ethel picked it up hastily, and asked:

"Very likely uncle tells you where, and how, and when, and all about it, mamma, if you will only have patience to read on and see—or may I?"

Mrs. Armitage waved her handkerchief and hand, which she had the moment before pressed to her eyes, assentingly, and Ethel read on to the end of the letter without delay.

"What can have induced him at his age to be such a fool?" Mrs. Armitage said, angrily; and Ethel, without looking up, replied:

"What? oh! he tells you 'what' here; uncle says 'he thought their marriage would make him happier, and he knew it would make him so.' Bravo, old gentleman! what a capital reason!"

"Pray do not be so flippant," Mrs. Armitage sighed; "no one knows the difference it may make to us—it's the breaking up of our home, I see that."

Ethel blushed, and looked up now. "Mamma," she said, gently, "we only came on a visit, and we have been here ten years; we can't complain of having to turn out now."

"But I am not sure that we shall have to turn out, and I shall feel that I have every right to feel it if we do," Mrs. Armitage exclaimed, energetically. Then she got up and rang the bell, and when the old servant, who had been butler, footman, and valet for the last thirty years to Mr. Lee, came in, she said:

"I have had news that has upset me very much, Warner—your master is married!"

The news had such an effect on Warner that he nearly upset the breakfast service; still he was able to say he was glad, and to ask "who the lady was?"

In answer to this Mrs. Armitage shook her head, and looked a look that was published by Warner, and remembered in the village long after it had escaped the memory of its author. "Ah! that I can not tell you, Warner; I only know that she was a Miss Chester, and that she is Mrs. Lee; say as little about it as possible."

"Mamma, how could you say that?" Ethel asked, reproachfully, as soon as they were alone.

"I am acting for the best," the lady said, grimly.

"No, mamma, you are making things look strange when you needn't. Tell people out and out that Uncle James is married; 'saying little about it' won't unmarry him again, and why should it?"

"I really can not answer frivolous questions," Mrs. Armitage said, testily. "I have many things to think about; we may not have a roof over our heads long."

"That will be our own fault, then," Ethel said, defiantly; "we can afford to have one." And then Miss Armitage deemed it discreet to go out for her morning's ride, and to leave her mother to chew the cud of mournful meditation alone.

A young, careless-natured girl, well endowed by nature with good looks, and feeling tolerably certain that fortune had very good things in store for her, Ethel Armitage could very well afford to be tolerant to the change which her uncle's marriage would make in their manner of life. True, his house had been like a father's house to her for the last ten years. But there was no grievance to her in the thought that this state of things must come to an end now, for, as she said, her mother "could afford a roof of her own"; and, as for herself, her cousin Frank, the young Squire up at the Hall, had asked her to be the mistress of it—so no wrong was done to Ethel by the Rector of Everton bringing home a wife.

The Lees of Everton were a flourishing, well-rooted stock. There was always a son to spare to the church, a good thing for the family since Everton was a family living. It had been given to James Lee by his brother, the "old Squire," as he was called by the present generation. And it had been held by James Lee for thirty years, with satisfaction to himself and his parishioners, with the exception of certain of these latter who had wanted to marry him.

Ten years before the opening of this story their only sister, Mrs. Armitage, had come back to Everton a widow with one daughter. She had come back for several reasons, among which affection for the soil and the scenes of her youth was the least potent. Like a sensible woman, she argued that it would be a very good thing indeed if her eldest brother's eldest son, the heir, should fall in love with and marry her pretty Ethel in years to come. Likewise she thought that, waiting the arrival of those years, it would be a very good arrangement for her to live at the rectory with her bachelor brother James, and so save house-rent.

During these ten years all things had gone precisely as she desired. The old Squire died; Frank, his son, reigned in his stead, and asked Ethel to reign with him. And Mr. Lee, the Rector, thought no arrangement could have been so perfect as that which devolved the management of his liberal establishment upon his sister.

But now apparently he thought so no longer, for he had taken to himself a wife without beat of drum—a stranger in the land—one over whom Mrs. Armitage could not hope to have any manner of authority. It was easy enough for Ethel, who was going to a grander home of her own, to bear this blow gallantly; but Mrs. Armitage made room in her heart for the hardest thoughts of her new sister-in-law, as she thought of the carriage and other comforts which that sister-in-law's advent would wrest from her.

Still, for all her annoyance, she could not resist the dear delight of uttering many words about the matter. In the course of the walk she took through the village that day, she contrived to make known to a great many people the great fact of her brother's marriage. Before nightfall, the knowledge that the Rector had married a young lady, quite a stranger to him, of whom his family knew actually nothing, was pretty widely diffused.

"I suppose you hardly know what to hope, Miss Armitage?" an elderly maiden lady, who had at one time made herself a district visitor toward the subjugation of the Reverend James, said with a sort of satirical grimace that was infinitely aggravating to Ethel.

"Yes, I do know what to hope," that young lady replied; "I hope she'll be young and a pleasant companion for me." And this Miss Ethel said in a tone that implied that she had not too many pleasant lady companions in Everton.

Miss Armitage made a very pretty picture as she sat upon her horse outside the garden-gate of the cottage in which Miss Anstruther lived, and talked over the topmost bar to that lady. Her Saxon name was well borne out by her Saxon beauty. She was a fair-skinned, fair-haired, blue-eyed girl, with a broad brow and a resolute nose and mouth, and a figure that was beautifully developed by health, and those best of all gymnastics, plenty of horse and walking exercise. She made a very pretty picture—there was something very winning about her; moreover, she was going to be mistress of and dispenser of hospitalities up at the Hall, so Miss Anstruther did not care to differ with her. The elder lady, therefore, only said in reply:

"To be sure—very nice for you, and I'm sure it's high time that your uncle should settle in life; he's not so young as he was," and she smiled.

"No," Ethel said, carelessly, "we none of us are. I was ten when I came here, and I feel rather more than that now, don't you?"

"You can only sincerely hope that, hasty as his decision has been, it may prove a wise one," Miss Anstruther said, solemnly, evading giving any answer to Ethel's last remark. And then Ethel said "good-by," and rode home refreshed by her ride to the extent of being able to support a repetition of her mother's doubts and fears on the subject.

"Mamma," she began, when they were alone in the evening, "don't you think we ought to take some steps about giving treats to the school-children and the choir, or will you leave that till Uncle James comes home?"

"I shall have nothing to say about it," Mrs. Armitage replied.

"Then I'll ask Frank," Ethel said, quickly; "he is coming here to-night, and after all, as he is the Squire, it will be the greater compliment if he organizes every thing."

"Please, Ethel, do not try to make your cousin put himself in a ridiculous position; we may all have better cause to rue this marriage; I never knew a case yet of a young woman marrying an old man turn out well; if she is flighty and frivolous, and anxious to join in all the amusements of the neighborhood—"

"They're not too numerous," Ethel interrupted. But her mother went on unheeding:

"Your uncle will lead a pretty life, and some people will not scruple to say that it serves him right."

"Poor dear Uncle James!" Ethel said, heartily. "I won't look forward to his being punished in such a way when no one can deserve punishment less; at any rate, let us wait to see before we pronounce her flighty and frivolous; time will show what she is like."

Then Mr. Lee, the Frank of whom mention has been made, came in, and heard the great news, and laughed good-temperedly at the idea of his uncle having stolen a march on him in the matter of marriage. "Dear old fellow! when is he coming back?" he asked, and he was told in three weeks.

The three weeks soon passed, and then the happy pair came home in the light of a glorious August evening. The young Squire and Ethel had taken care that all fitting show of rejoicing should be made. As the Rector and his bride drove from the station to the rectory, the bells pealed most joyously, and all the parish seemed to have turned out to welcome the lady, and see what she was like.

It was quite a young face that which was turned quickly from one side to the other, as they drove along. A young, pretty, but most observant face. And it was a young, graceful figure that sprang to the ground without help the moment the wagonette stopped at the door, and a young clear voice that said:

"How delicious to be home at last, after all the knocking about we have had!"

"Yes, she talked of 'knocking about,' and before strangers, too," Miss Anstruther told a friend that evening. "I had it from the best authority; talks slang! Well, he has waited for something, I must say!"

"My new home and my new niece!" Mrs. Lee exclaimed, as she entered the hall, and Ethel came to meet her; "how delightful they both are!"

She was perfectly composed and self-possessed, and very, very quiet. There was something that was infinitely prepossessing in her appearance and manners; there was refinement, intelligence, grace, and dignity—all, indeed, that is most charming in woman. Additionally she was very pretty, too. Her eyes were large, dark, and luminous, and their beauty was enhanced by the thick, long fringe of lashes that fell over them. Her fair, straight-featured little face varied in expression with every change of thought—and these were many. Though her figure was slight and supple, and full of yielding, graceful lines and curves, she walked erectly, with her head proudly poised in a way that marked her well-bred. On this August evening, too, she was dressed with such an exquisitely fitting regard to time and circumstances and situation. Ethel had been, all her grown-up life, at the mercy of the first dress-maker and milliner resident in the county town of the shire in which Everton was situated. This arbiter of fashions was a star of magnitude compared to the lesser luminaries; still, she was resident in the county town, and she did not get the latest cut, and shape, and length, and color, and gore. Ethel felt certain that she was behind the time, as she looked at her new aunt's dress. How far behind she could not say, but it was perceptible that Mrs. Lee's garments were, so to say, in advance of hers (Ethel's).

There was no discomposing embarrassment to combat in the bride. She made herself at home in the easiest manner in the shortest space of time—not at all as though she were impatient to rule, but as if it were only right and proper and becoming that she should do so with as little delay as possible. Accordingly, though there was no unseemly haste to usurp authority manifested, a complete reorganization of the arrangements which had been too long standing took place in the house. She transposed old furniture and introduced new, and put painters and paperers to work before she had been at home a week. She had brackets put up in gloomy corners, and white statuettes, or majolica pots holding brilliantly-colored flowers placed upon them. She brought life and fresh air into the house in a way that enchanted Ethel, who soon looked upon the Rector's young wife as a great authority in all matters where taste and cultivation were concerned. She won every body's heart in the neighborhood, though she would neither play the harmonium, nor teach in the Sunday-school, nor visit the poor. Above all, she evidently made her husband supremely happy, despite that disparity of age from which so much evil had been augured.

She talked freely about herself. Told how she had been educated abroad, at Paris for many years, and later, when she was grown up, in a little German town where she had resided with some English relatives. "Those had been the happy days," she told Ethel, "the sunny, happy days of her life—with the exception of one little cloud which" (with a gay shrug of the shoulders) "it wasn't worth while to talk about it. She was younger then, and better-looking." (This statement Ethel objected to strenuously.) "Yes, yes, much better-looking; and she was English, and, somehow, was always made a great deal of at the balls. Those balls! She had never been to any thing like them in England. There was always a regiment quartered in the town—and—they had been happy days!"

Mrs. Armitage, actuated thereunto by the representations of her daughter principally, had moved down into a smaller house in the village. But the two young women, having very little else to occupy their time, spent the greater part of it in each other's society. Even Mrs. Armitage came to feel it as truth that it was the greatest advantage which had yet fallen to Ethel's lot, this unfettered, familiar, constant intercourse with one of her own sex, who was well endowed with accomplishments and knowledge, and with the power of imparting these pleasantly, as she did to Ethel. Miss Armitage felt a hitherto unknown interest in all her old pursuits, which she had first been taught to pursue under the best, i. e., the most expensive local instructors, when she recommended them under the auspices of her aunt. Mrs. Lee played brilliantly, and sang, with no great power of voice, perhaps, but with a taste and management that made it a divine treat to hear her. Her linguistic powers were great also. German, French, and Italian were to her as her mother-tongue, and as she was untiring in her endeavors to make Ethel feel that the tongue is a flexible organ, and can be taught to turn itself tunelessly to any articulate sound, and that some of the printed mysteries of German literature were well worth unraveling, Miss Armitage, in time, came to adventure upon the speaking of French and the reading of German with an assurance that was most comforting to herself. To say nothing of its being comforting to the young Squire, who contemplated taking her to Paris on their wedding tour, and who did not wish to be reduced to the ignominious necessity of evading every spot where "English was not spoken."

It ought to have been mentioned before, that the hasty nature of her marriage arrangements was a subject that Mrs. Lee did not shun by any means. With the utmost frankness she told every one who cared to hear about it how she had met Mr. Lee, and why she had married him. She had seen him at a luncheon given by a nephew of his—a younger brother of the Squire's—in the Temple. How came she to be there? Oh! she was invited with the Dalmaines—some people Arthur too knew very well—old friends of hers, or at least old acquaintances; for, years ago, before the happy German town days, she had been at the Paris pension with Ada Dalmaine. Well, it was at Arthur Lee's, in the company of these old friends, that she had met Mr. Lee, and he seemed to be interested in her at once, and sorry to hear that she was going away to Germany again soon, as a teacher in a school this time. So, as he showed himself interested in her, she did not mind showing him how utterly miserable such a prospect made her; and then he offered her marriage as an alternative, and she accepted it, and "hoped he would never, never, never have the slightest cause to regret his generous precipitation." So she said, looking up at his niece with tears in her lovely eyes as she said it, and his niece's firm belief and assertion was that "it would be impossible for Uncle James, or any one else, not to think how wonderfully lucky he had been."

All through the autumn and winter succeeding her marriage Mrs. Lee was an immense success in the neighborhood. She proved herself to be neither flighty nor frivolous, but a remarkably charming, intellectual, agreeable woman, and as such a great acquisition at the social gatherings in and around Everton. Her house was well ordered, her conduct as a young matron irreproachable, even in the eyes of many who would willingly have seen it a shade less so, for the sake of bearing out the adage as to May and December. She never gave any one an opportunity of thinking that her mind was dwelling with regret upon by-gone days and dead gayeties. She was, as she looked, supremely happy, and Mr. Lee was well justified in believing that he had made a wise choice in his maturity. They had been married nearly a year, when the birth of a son made them happier than they had been before even—a son who was christened Frederick, in order to gratify a whim of his mother's, who always insisted on her boy being called Fritz. "It's so much prettier than the English Frederick," she pleaded, when it was observed to her by Mrs. Armitage that there was a slight want of purpose in the name, "as it was not in the family;" Mrs. Armitage being one of those excellent people who think it a proof of family affection to perpetuate in their children the least euphonious names the tongue can utter, provided they have been borne by their forefathers or cousins. "Fritz Lee! it sounds outlandish!" Mrs. Armitage said. "I could have wished—but there, it's no use saying."

"Yes, do say," Mrs. Lee pleaded, politely; "it can't be helped now, you see, because I have taught every one to call him Fritz, and I believe he knows his name already" (he was three weeks old at the time!), "but do tell me what you could have wished."

"Why, that he had been called James."

"Oh! James would have been corrupted into Jim or Jimmy, to distinguish him from his father," Mrs. Lee said, shaking her head.

"Well, I shall never like it, and never know how to spell it; and as for writing it, I never can write a 'z' so that any one can read it: English names have always been good enough for the Lees before this."

However, in spite of this disapproval of his name on the part of Mrs. Armitage, the Rector's little son was known to every one as "Fritz," and his mother, in consequence, came to be regarded as "more foreign-looking" than ever in the uneducated mind—which was very much divided at this time between distrust of Mrs. Lee's French nurse and wild interest in the preparations for the young Squire's approaching wedding.

For Ethel Armitage was to be married very shortly, and in these latter days she relied more than ever on her aunt. Mrs. Lee was invaluable to the girl as regards all those arrangements which it is the lady's part to make before the great change. Ethel's dresses, the number of bridesmaids, the paper for Ethel's morning-room, and the color of the drawing-room furniture, what the guests were to do after the happy pair left—all these things were left to the choice and direction of Mrs. Lee, whose administrative genius was quite equal to the occasion. It was finally her proposition that Ethel should be married from her uncle's house, a proposition to which every one agreed without demur.

About a fortnight before the wedding, the regiment—a crack corps—quartered in the county town, gave a ball in return for the hospitalities which had been lavished on them. At first, when she received the invitation, the Rector's wife was indifferent about going; but gradually, as she heard speculations and brilliant anticipations about it on all sides, this indifference vanished, and she did begin to wish that her husband did not set his face quite so decidedly against all public balls and amusements in the vicinity of his own parish. Only to go once, this once, and see Ethel in her glory as Miss Armitage for the last time; she really never would bother him to let her go to a military or any other public ball again, if he would sacrifice his prejudices for once and take her.

She was a very winning woman, and her wishes were strongly set on carrying her point. Need it be said that she won? Sadly against his own intense conviction of what it would be wise and well to do, Mr. Lee agreed to let his wife chaperon Ethel to this ball, and to go with them himself.

The evening came, and she was a most radiantly lovely, happy-looking woman who bent over little Fritz's cradle to say good-by to him. She was excited into a state of deeper fascination than ever by this thought of mingling again in a scene that would be so like those that had once been familiar to her. "Really I ought to feel more like an old woman with that before me," she said, apologetically, pointing to the cradle; "this night shall be my farewell to dancing: James, I will show you that I know how to grow old gracefully."

"I am glad that I shall never see you grow old, my darling," he said, proudly, as he led her down to the carriage; and the remark startled her, and made her look up affrightedly, and realize that he was, in sad truth, too much her senior for her to dare hope that she might pass her life with him.

He was about fifty-five or six, looking young for his age, certainly; but fifty-five or six in spite of his looks. His had been a quiet, good, useful life, and he carried the certificates of its having been so in his face and bearing. A frank-eyed, fresh-colored old gentleman, with a juvenile power of feeling things acutely and being readily impressed, as was evidenced in his marriage. It had been a characteristic of his from his boyhood, that impressionableness. He had been one all his life who would have suffered from slights as women suffer, who felt kindnesses with an intensity of feeling that never quite matured. He had been known to keep aloof from people for months, even for years, if he could do them no good, when they had fallen under any cloud that might have made them, as he fancied, less glad to see him than formerly. In fact, he was most tenderly sensitive for the feelings of those on whom the breath of scandal had blown ever so lightly, and though this susceptibility might render him a less strong character than it is well one filling the position he held should have, it greatly endeared him to many who cared more for sympathy than strength.

This was the nature of the man who went to a public ball for the first time in his life, at the bidding and for the pleasure of his beautiful young wife.

It is not necessary, for the furtherance of my story, that I should place a panorama of that ball-room and its occupants before the reader. It was very much like other ball-rooms at great hotels in county towns, and it was filled with very much the same sort of people one sees under similar circumstances elsewhere. Suffice it to say, that among the guests was one, a young civil engineer, who turned to one of the officers of the—the instant the Lee party entered the room, asking eagerly:

"Who is that lady, do you know?"

"That is Miss Armitage, going to marry the young fellow by her side; he's rather a swell down here—the Squire of Everton."

"Her name is not Armitage?" the stranger said, half laughing.

"Yes, it is," the other replied; "I often meet her at her uncle's house; the lady in front on the old fellow's arm is his wife, and she's worth a dozen of Miss Armitage, or any other Miss in the county that I have seen."

"It's the lady in front whom I asked you about," the stranger said, quickly. "I used to know her in Düsseldorf."

"Then I advise you to renew your acquaintance with her as soon as possible," his friend said, at which suggestion the civil engineer only shrugged his shoulders, and answered:

"She was very much blown upon then—under a most awful cloud, in fact; she may not care to be recognized, now she's married, by any one who knew her then." When he had said that, the young man walked away to confide the same particulars to another friend he had in the regiment, and then to another, and so the thing grew.

Grew—until it attained such proportions that it forced itself upon Frank Lee's ears and understanding before the evening was half over. He heard half allusions to it, caught murmurs respecting it, knew that it was suddenly dropped as he approached on all sides, for Mrs. Lee was a popular favorite and a prominent beauty. In his dread that his uncle should hear it then, with the eyes of the world upon him, the young man was imprudent enough to confide it to his own betrothed, who indignantly repudiated the bare idea of so much as a breath ever having been raised about Mrs. Lee. "I will go to her at once, Frank, and ask her if she recognizes this man who says he knew her, and tell her what he says." It was in vain Frank entreated Ethel not to do so; all he could wrest from Ethel was a promise that she would not tell Mrs. Lee what the stranger had uttered respecting her until they reached home.

He was pointed out to Mrs. Lee, not as a man who claimed to have known her of old, but as a man who had been engaged in superintending mining operations in Prussia, and who spoke German fluently. And Mrs. Lee put up her glass and looked at him with the blank gaze of unrecognition. In a cowardly way the man seized upon this as "a proof that he had been right in assuming that she did not wish any back numbers from her life to be read," and then laughed about "little Kate Chester" in a way that made some other men long to wring his neck.

However, the story grew, gained monstrous proportions, finally reached Mr. Lee's ears, and broke his heart. And then, when all the world seemed ready to turn against her, when her husband's relations said "little Fritz ought to be taken from her and put under proper guardianship," then she stood at bay and defied all the inhabitants of Düsseldorf combined to say that she had been more than maligned. She had been the object of jealousy, the object of the basest falsehoods, the object of fierce female rancor, envy, and evil-speaking, but she had never been the object of a bad man's guilty love, or a good woman's scorn. And the man who blighted her life when it was promising to be so fair, who crushed her husband's heart with shame, who made her an alien to her child's father's kin, and robbed her of a home and peace, knew all these truths, and still spoke in foul-mouthed idleness.

CONTENT.

I weigh not fortune's frown or smile,
I joy not much in earthly joys;
I seek not state, I seek not style;
I am not fond of fancy's toys;
I rest so pleased with what I have,
I wish no more, no more I crave.

I quake not at the thunder's crack;
I tremble not at noise of war;
I swoon not at the news of wrack;
I shrink not at a blazing star;
I fear not loss, I hope not gain;
I envy none, I none disdain.

I feign not friendship where I hate:
I fawn not on the great in show;
I prize, I praise a mean estate—
Neither too lofty nor too low:
This, this is all my choice, my cheer—
A mind content, a conscience clear.

PROPER CONSTRUCTION OF FLORAL DEVICES.

ONE of the greatest faults in the present fashion of arranging floral designs is their stiffness and formality; bouquets are made in the form of a stone-cutter's mallet, and exhibit a ponderosity almost as great; the centre-piece for a dinner-table displays a solidity of form almost if not quite equal to that of a sirloin of beef, or any other pièce de resistance which the culinary artist may find necessary to introduce. If a gallant sends a basket of flowers to his innamorata it will be found arranged in ribbons of color, perhaps with a five or six pointed star in the centre, or maybe a spread eagle; if we attend the obsequies of a deceased friend we find the coffin literally covered with crosses, anchors, harps, crowns, and similar designs, as though such things could ever be appropriately made out of any other materials than wood, metal, or precious gems. At our floral exhibitions we find spades or plows smothered in dahlias or marigolds; or, as such occasions frequently occur near election time, we find temples of liberty, suggested by the political poster, posted on the nearest dead wall, made of verbenas and asters, and, what is worse, we find premiums awarded to their manufacturers as for floral designs. All such things are execrably devoid of taste, and should be eschewed by all persons of refinement; they are only outrageous impertinences in the exhibition-rooms.

The fundamental principle of taste is creative power, and it must always be exhibited if we would command respect or consideration for our work. It is this which distinguishes genius from talent; genius in works of art imitates nature, talent copies her. The one paints a picture; the other makes a scientific or anatomical drawing. He who creates or produces the greatest effect from the smallest amount of material has the greater genius, as showing the greater creative power, and his works give greater pleasure than do those of him who has to bring in a larger number of accessories to produce the same or similar effects. For this reason sculpture always ranks higher than painting, and is of a higher order of genius, and is the rarer of the two gifts; for, comparatively, there are sculptors few and painters many. One has to depend entirely upon beauty of form and simplicity of material to produce pleasant emotions in the beholder; the other has to call in the aid of colors and certain accessories of light and shade to produce the same or similar emotions.

On this account floral designs made of fern-leaves or other foliage always, to a cultivated and critical taste, produce the most pleasant emotions, as the effects produced always indicate greater creative power than if they had the accessories of color and the greater variety of lines to be found in flowers. Some of the exquisite designs of the silversmith, wrought in bright and frosted silver, of palm-leaves, or fern-leaves, or similar foliage, will exemplify what I mean if contrasted with the elaborately-wrought and colored work of the choicest Sèvres or Dresden china-ware. The exquisite beauty of well-arranged phantom bouquets is referable to this source; the material itself is almost despicable, yet the wonderful creative power displayed in the marvelous traceries, and wondrous variety and grace of form, fill us with astonishment and call into play the highest and most delightful emotions of the mind.

Success in such designs depends much upon the objects in view, which necessarily can be but two, and they the opposite of each other, and yet according to the character of the artistic treatment will equal degrees of pleasure be given. Either we must use simple and delicate forms to ornament some other object, when they become subordinate, or we must make them the principal objects to the eye, and so make them of primary importance. In the first case the object decorated must be of more value intrinsically than the material used in the decoration; in the second case the object containing them, or to which they are attached, must not appear to be of as much value as the material used. For instance, if you have a beautiful vase or central piece of silver you may arrange fern-leaves around its foot, or upon its stem, or in its cup, and so produce delightful effects of beauty by contrast; by contrasting the elegant lightness of the foliage with the more massive elegance of the silver; while beauty by harmony is preserved by the foliage being all of one color, though in different shades. In the other case you require more rare and less known species, and a greater variety of curious forms and shades of color; as in this instance they are presented to the eye on account of their value as rarities, as well as for their beauty, we must be careful that the object which contains them, or to which they are attached, shall not appear to be of greater value than themselves, hence a fine glass or simple porcelain vase or ornament is the most suitable for the purpose. But care must be had that we do not go to an extreme; the glass or vase must be of sufficient value, either in intrinsic quality or workmanship, as to aid in suggesting the idea of the value of its contents by showing them to be worthy of such a support.

This brings us to the consideration of another principle, viz.: that the material must be worthy of the labor bestowed upon it.

There ought to be in all productions of art a certain nobility of character, which should show that they are the products of intelligence or mental effort, and not the result of mere mechanical skill; and the embodiments of such intelligence or thought should be of materials correspondent thereto. Many years ago there were exhibited in this city some pictures or cartoons made of tufted wool, dyed of the necessary and suitable colors, to render them, not copies, but representations of some of the noble paintings of the old masters. They had cost the artist, if such he could be called, infinite labor and manual skill, and yet for all that they were not pictures; they were simply tufted wool dyed and skillfully arranged. Our City Hall Park is disgraced by a statue cut in red sandstone, which, no doubt, cost the workman who made it much manual labor, but it is not a statue, it is an effigy, and would be so even if it had been cut by Powers or Crawford.

At our floral exhibitions premiums are offered and given for bouquets of wild flowers, yet whoever has seen an instance of an elegant bouquet or floral design made of such materials?

There is among plants, as among all other forms of created objects, a certain nobility or aristocracy of class. Some are no doubt created simply to provide for the sustenance or similar needs of mankind; for others we can discover no other use, though this is a noble one, than to please the eye or gratify the olfactory sense of men; or, looking further, they may be the gems with which the Creator may be pleased to decorate his footstool. Eschew, therefore, all the sentimentalities and poetry, so called, of the woodland and forest, for, while they are all proper enough in their place, they are not suitable for the object we have in view; and if a beautiful thought or design suggests itself to your mind, work it out in the best flowers you can procure. Let them be cultivated flowers, suggestive of care and skill in their production, and suggesting also the sacrificing of the material for the intellectual.

Fitness of purpose is another principle which must be attended to in floral decorations. As such decorations are used on so many occasions, each having a more or less remote significance, it is very necessary to avoid any incongruity of purpose. A design intended for a festive board, when its elegance or beauty would be suggestive of the most joyous emotions, would be out of place at the funeral of a friend, as its tendency would be to attract attention to itself and away from the considerations suggested by the mournful occasion. At a funeral the flowers should be subdued in color, and should be arranged in a more careless and unaffected way than on other occasions. They should simply be accessories to the occasion, not prominent features of it; should be suggestive of affectionate regard, and be a simple token of our love and esteem for the deceased. Elaborately wrought designs of anchors, harps, crosses, crowns, etc., are entirely out of place; they are only impertinent displays of vulgarity, varnished over with a sickly sentimentality. Simple wreaths, as, for instance, of Lamarque or Safrano rose-buds, with their own foliage, are not only elegant, but appeal to our better feelings through their simplicity; aside from these, bouquets of choice and fragrant flowers, such as we would offer to the deceased if in life, are appropriate. Convenience requires that they should be made flat, if to be laid on the coffin.

It is the custom to decorate the fonts and chancels of our churches on Easter-Sunday, and on other occasions, with flowers, and an ignorant fashion requires that the flowers should be white. From time immemorial, in all countries of the earth, there has been a symbolism, which, especially in religious ceremonies and decorations, has been strictly observed and practiced. According to this symbolism, two principles, light and darkness, produce all colors. Light is represented by white, and darkness by black; but as light does not exist without fire, red is also used to represent it; and on this basis symbolism admits two primitive colors—red and white. Red is the symbol of divine love; white the symbol of divine wisdom and uncreated light. Red, in its various shades, was continually used as a prevailing color in the vestments of priests, as it is to this day in the Roman Church; and by a tradition of practice the cushions of our pulpits and the covering of the communion-tables are of this color. In the great Mysteries of Eleusis a child was always initiated dressed in red, and performed a character emblematic of death; hence he was called the child of the sanctuary; and to this day the acolytes in the churches wear red vestments. The artists of the Middle Ages always gave to Christ, after His resurrection, robes of red and white. Yellow was a symbol of the revelation of the love and wisdom of God. Azure was the symbol of divine eternity and of human immortality. From this it will appear that if we undertake on such occasions to emblemize we should do it with studious care, or else we shall be apt to commit anachronisms. In placing flowers on the communion-table, or in the font, on such festivals, we should not choose white only, but such colors as are befitting to express the ideas we wish to symbolize. As those who so use flowers believe in the divinity of Christ, the flowers in their prevailing colors should be red, white, yellow, and azure. Red, as indicating his divine love; white, as indicating his divine wisdom and emanation from the Father; yellow, as a revelation of his love in dying for us; and azure, as emblematic of his immortality and divine eternity. This curious and interesting subject could be pursued much further, and the symbolism of other colors and their various shades explained; and also the ideas conveyed in their different combinations and use; but the above will suffice for the present.

Stiffness and a regular formality are especially to be avoided in arranging bouquets for vases. Lightness and gracefulness are especially to be sought for; but if heavy solid flowers, such as camellias, or roses, or peonies, or similar flowers, are used, they ought to be used by themselves, with their own foliage, and not intermixed with lighter flowers or foliage. Such flowers, however, are better adapted for baskets, where massiveness of effect is not so much out of character.

Always use as much as possible the foliage properly belonging to the flowers themselves; it invariably harmonizes better with the flowers than the foliage of any other species. As a general rule it will be found, upon close examination, that the foliage belonging to every plant suitable for decorative purposes has a certain beauty, either by harmony or contrast, with the flowers it produces. Take the rose, for instance, in its full-blown state; its petals are rounded and involved in their lines of arrangement, while the foliage is pointed and simple; in this state it produces beauty by contrast of lines and forms. But the buds are pointed and plain, the swelling curve of the outline being similar to the beautiful curve of the leaves; in this state it produces beauty by harmony of lines. Again, take the camellia; alone without foliage, it is a cold, unimpassioned flower; but when combined with its rich, glossy foliage, with its acute termination, it produces a magnificent effect through the beautiful play of light reflected from its leaves, and the contrast of the noble curved lines and their harmonious substance with the regular, solid, wax-work appearance of the flower.

Bouquets for the hand should be made of the choicest flowers, gracefully arranged; heavy, solid flowers, or massive arrangement, should be as much as possible avoided. Such bouquets are necessarily brought under the closest inspection of the eye, and should be composed of flowers of delicate structure, or great variety, or exquisite fragrance. The present style of immense size, composed of solid flowers, scarcely if at all relieved by foliage, is only suggestive of some enormous variegated or pied fungus, hung with silk fringe or put up in lace paper. When carried at evening entertainments they frequently appear to be a burden to their fair possessors.

For successful effect in floral decoration much depends upon the judicious arrangement of color; violent contrasts are also to be avoided, as is also the sameness produced by having too much of one color. In producing harmonious contrast of colors it should be remembered that there are only three primary colors—red, blue, and yellow. From these arise what are called the binary, or secondary colors, namely—orange, composed of yellow and red; purple, composed of blue and red; and green, composed of yellow and blue. These form contrasting colors to the primary three, with which they are in harmonious opposition—as, the orange with blue, purple with yellow, and green with red. From the combination of these secondary colors arise three tertiary colors—olive, from purple and green; citron, from green and orange; and russet, from orange and purple. These tertiary colors harmonize with the primaries, as they stand in the relation of neutral tints to them, but are in harmonious opposition to the secondaries, from which they were combined. Red, blue, and yellow harmonize with each other, and may be placed in juxtaposition; but purple should not be near red or blue, as it is composed of those two colors; for the same reason orange should not be placed next to yellow or red, or green next to yellow or blue, the rule being that no primary color should be brought into contact with a secondary color of which it is a component part, nor any secondary color brought in contact with a tertiary color of which it is a component part.

Another rule is, that the secondary and tertiary colors, and the neutral hues arising from combinations of the tertiaries, such as brown, maroon, puce, slate, lavender, etc., should be used in the greatest quantities, and the primary colors used in smaller quantity, for heightening the effect. If you lack the proper shades for producing the necessary harmonies, and find that two colors do not harmonize well, separate them by a white flower.

Again: always place the brightest colors in the centre of your design, and gradually decrease the intensity of the tints as you approach the exterior; and avoid spottiness or patchiness by using, as much as possible, one prevailing color.

AT THE WINDOW.

By the Author of "Woman's Kingdom," "John Halifax, Gentleman," etc.

ONLY to listen—listen and wait

For his slow firm step down the gravel-walk;
To hear the click-click of his hand at the gate,
And feel every heart-beat through careless talk.
Ah, love is sweet when life is young!
And life and love are both so long.

Only to watch him about the room,
Lighting it up with his quiet smile,
That seems to lift the world out of gloom,
And bring heaven nearer me—for a while,
A little while—since love is young,
And life is beautiful as long.

Only to love him—nothing more;
Never a thought of his loving me:
Proud of him, glad in him, though he bore
My heart to shipwreck on this smooth sea.
Love's faith sees only grief, not wrong,
And life is daring when 'tis young.

Ay me! what matter? The world goes round,
And bliss and bale are but outside things:
I never can lose what in him I found,
Though love be sorrow with half-grown wings;
And if love flies when we are young,
Why, life is still not long—not long.

And Heaven is kind to the faithful heart;
And if we are patient, and brave, and calm,
Our fruits will last though our flowers depart:
Some day, when I sleep with folded palm,
No longer fair, no longer young,
Life may not seem so bitter long.

* * * * *

The tears dried up in her shining eyes,
Her parted lips took a saintly peace:
His shadow across the door-way lies—
Will her doubts gather, darken, or—cease?
When hearts are pure, and bold, and strong,
True love as life itself is long.

BEFORE THE DOCTOR COMES.

CUTS.

WHEN it is so easy to let out the current of life, and put an end to its flow forever, "with a bare bodkin," it is surprising that so many of us survive the reckless handling of the dangerous implements of daily labor and household economy. Though so large a proportion seem marvelously to escape death, there are but few who pass through life without a reminder of their mortality in the form of some ugly scratch or other, and are not scored with an enduring record of the risks they have run.

brought and kept close together by strips of sticking-plaster. A bit of old linen, however, will answer if there is nothing else at hand; and by wrapping this carefully about the cut its lips may be kept together, which should be the sole object. There should be no application of any kind in the shape of balsams, ointments, or other medicinal substances. There is nothing to be done but to keep the edges of the wound together, that they may be in a favorable position for union, which will in ordinary cases take place in a day or so. If, from the swelling which generally ensues, the bandage should become too tight, the best way of relieving the pressure is by slipping a sharp knife under the dressing behind, and slitting it up. You will thus avoid any disturbance of the plastic or uniting process going on in the wound.

If the simple cut, from some peculiarity of constitution of the sufferer, or neglect, should take on an unhealthy action, become greatly swollen, inflamed, and full of a thin, ill-smelling matter, it will be necessary to remove the original dressing. This is easily done by soaking in warm water, or applying a poultice over all, and leaving it on for a few hours. The poulticing should be repeated so long as the wound remains inflamed and pours out an unwholesome watery discharge. At the same time a single band of plaster may be used to approximate the edges of the wound, with the view of diminishing the size of the probable scar. In cuts of the face, neck, shoulders, and arms of the female especially, it is important, for the sake of saving her beauty, to avoid if possible a cicatrice, made distinct by size, irregularity, or discoloration. This is best done by dressing the wound immediately, before its edges become inflamed and swollen, and bringing them closely together. Black court-plaster must be avoided, for its coloring matter is apt to get entangled in the cut, and remain as a perpetual tattoo of the skin.

A penetrating wound, or clean stab, though not generally serious if extending no deeper than the flesh, is ordinarily slow to heal. It may close at the outlet while it still remains open in the interior, and thus burst out again and again with a discharge of matter. In such a case it will be well not to bring the edges of the external wound too close together.

A torn wound, if light and confined to the surface, may be treated like a simple cut, by bringing the shreds together with adhesive plaster. If the deeper parts are involved there will probably be considerable inflammation, requiring a series of poultices, which should be applied after the integuments have been washed gently with warm water, smoothed down, and kept in place by strips of plaster.

Scratches, though at first of little moment, are apt to become, if exposed to filth or any irritating substance, serious sores, in which case they should be treated with poultices. Pricks with thorns or splinters are apparently trivial, but are often serious accidents. A gentleman while out shooting was pricked with a thorn, and died with lockjaw in consequence. If the splinter, or whatever it may be, can easily be got at, it should be plucked out at once; but if difficult of access it is better to leave it alone, for the efforts to reach it may cause a good deal of subsequent harm, as they will much immediate pain. The wounded part must be carefully fomented during the day with flannels wrung out of hot water, and poulticed at night. When matter is formed, and causes great suffering by its presence, it should be let out by a free opening, which a surgeon may be called on to make if the necessary courage is wanting to the patient or his friends.

Anglers sometimes prove that they are not only the idiots, as Dr. Johnson called them, who attach themselves to one end of the rod and line, but also fools enough to be caught at the other. It is a very common accident for fishermen to get a hook in some part of their bodies. They are very apt, in such a case, to try to remove it by pulling it out. The right mode is to push it out. The hook should be severed from the line, and thrust through the flesh past the barb, and thus extracted by the sharp end.

A child, while playing with a fishing-rod and line, got the hook by some means or other far down into his gullet, where it stuck. After many unsuccessful trials to extract it, an ingenious bystander suggested making a hole in a bullet and stringing it on the line. This was done, and proved effective. The bullet by its weight slid readily down to and over the hook, pressing against the flesh into which it was imbedded, and thus extricating it.

IS IT THE FIRST?

DEAR BELLA, you've shown me this morning
The rarest of tropical blooms,
Your green-house and hot-house adorning
With exquisite tints and perfumes.
There are plants of great beauty about there
With buds just preparing to burst.
But—see—here is something I found there,
Now tell me, dear—is it the First?

No! It is not a Japanese lily—
It is not a rose of Cashmere—
Don't smile, miss, and say I am silly,
Or else you will make me severe!
It's a something I chanced to discover
Where the flower-pot yonder's reversed.
It's a small billet-doux from a lover:
And, Bella, pray—is it the First?

Confess that you know who 'twas hid it—
"You can not divine, on your word!"
You don't "spect it grew there"—now did it?
I don't think 'twas brought by a bird.

Is it one of those favorite cuttings
That the whole winter long you have nursed?
Come! It's useless attempting rebuttings,
So tell me, dear—is it the First?

Well, give me some slight information
My doubts on the subject to clear.
'Tis a note of—I guess—admiration;
And mine's interrogative, dear!
No! I don't mean to give up the letter
Till the postman's full charge is disbursed.
So please pay the fee—you had better—
By answering—is it the First?

Oh! it's useless to get in a passion
At Chance which your secret unveils.
You know flower-pots placed in that fashion
Are meant to catch earwigs and snails!
And I just turned it up to inspect it
For earwigs—or slugs at the worst!
'Twas by chance that I came to detect it,
So tell me, now—is it the First?

Nay! I'll not give it up till you tell me.
'Tis vain to petition and sue.
You know that you can not compel me
Unless I'm assured it's for you!
So let's have the truth—the whole truth, dear,
For which I confess I'm athirst.
Come, who is the fortunate youth, dear,
Who wrote it—and is it the First?

Unless, miss, this silence soon ceases,
You'll pay for it dearly! For, mind,
I shall tear it in thousands of pieces,
And scatter the bits to the wind.
You'd grieve were the tender epistle
By pitiless breezes dispersed
Far and wide—like the down of a thistle:
So answer me—is it the First?

Do you know what we do with the vermin
Thus under a flower-pot found?
You'd scarce wish that fate to determine
The end of this note, I'll be bound!
You'll hope that no letter so sweet 'll
Be e'er in hot water immersed,
As we serve master earwig or beetle—
So you'd better say—is it the First?

You won't? Then I'm bound to destroy it—
My eloquence moves you no whit.
Oh! I see that it's vain to employ it
While you're in an obstinate fit.
What's that? Oh! "You'll answer my question,
But will not be forced or coerced!"
My love! who made any suggestion
Of that kind? Well! Is it the First?

ELIZABETH, EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA.

IN the last days of the year 1852 the palace of the King of Saxony at Pillnitz presented a most animated spectacle. The royal family had invited its distinguished relatives throughout Germany to spend the holidays there, and most of them had accepted the invitation. Since Napoleon, in 1812, had received at Pillnitz the homage of the princes of Germany, the palace had not sheltered so many distinguished guests. Among those who had already arrived were the Queen of Prussia, Ex-King Louis of Bavaria, his son Maximilian and the whole royal family, some of the Thuringian princes, the Archduchess Sophia, and her son, the young Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria.

Early on Christmas morning a fine-looking young man, dressed in the handsome uniform of an Austrian staff-officer, emerged from the western portal of the Pillnitz palace and slowly wended his way toward the two large ponds in the northwestern part of the park. For a week past the weather had been very cold, and the ponds were completely frozen over. On the morning of which we are speaking, however, the cold had moderated, the sun was shining brightly, and the air was pleasant and bracing. When the young officer had leisurely sauntered past the first pond his attention was suddenly attracted by the laughter and gay shouts of girlish voices; and when he advanced beyond the fir-trees which had hitherto prevented him from seeing the second pond, his eyes suddenly beheld a scene of the most charming character. He saw before him on the smooth, glittering surface of the second pond three young girls skating with great dexterity, trying to catch one another, laughing and shouting with delight, and evidently enjoying themselves greatly. The strong resemblance which they bore to each other showed that they were sisters. Two of them were scarcely beyond the age of childhood; all of them were very pretty and graceful, and in their handsome Polish cassavicas and square red caps trimmed with ermine and adorned with a sparkling agraffe, they presented a most charming appearance. They did not perceive the young officer, who had stood still and watched them a while in mute admiration. Suddenly another person appeared on the pond. It was a poor old peasant woman who had gathered a bundle of fagots in the neighboring grove, and now, almost staggering under her load, tried to cross the pond. She advanced a few steps slowly and cautiously, but suddenly she slipped her foot, and, uttering a cry of pain and terror, fell to the ground. The young girls, who had not noticed her hitherto, now turned toward her, and one of them, a lovely girl of fifteen, who was closest to her, hastened immediately to her assistance. Upon reaching the old woman, she stretched out her hand to her and tried to lift her up; but as she had skates on her little feet, this was a matter of some difficulty, and she succeeded only after repeated efforts in raising up the old woman. The young officer had meanwhile hastened toward them, and he reached the two at the moment when the peasant woman, muttering words of gratitude to the young girl, went on her way. The girl now turned toward the officer, who stood two or three steps before her, and seemed fairly dazzled by her surpassing loveliness. Her natural beauty was much enhanced by the cold air, the exercise and the excitement of the moment having flushed her sweet face to the rosiest hue of carnation; and her sparkling eyes looked half laughingly, half timidly at the young man, about whom there was such an air of distinction, and who now uttered a few words of regret that he had been unable to help her in time. A few words more passed between them, and the officer finally asked her to be kind enough to tell him her name, saying that she must excuse the question, as he was a guest of the King of Saxony, and, having never before been at Pillnitz, was as yet entirely unacquainted there. She hesitated a moment, and then told him her name was Elizabeth, and that her father was Maximilian Joseph, Duke of Bavaria. "Ah!" exclaimed the officer, "I am very happy to hear that. We are cousins, then; the Archduchess Sophia, your aunt, is my mother. I am Francis Joseph."

The young lady was for a moment overwhelmed with surprise and confusion as she heard that the young stranger with whom she had chatted so unconcernedly was no other than the ruler of the Austrian Empire. Francis Joseph, however, shook hands with her so kindly, and seemed so exceedingly glad to have met his "dear cousin," as he called her, that she was soon perfectly reassured, and chatted with him again in the same manner as before. She told him that the other two girls were her sisters Caroline and Mary; that they had accompanied their father to Pillnitz; that this was their first journey from home; that her parents and all who knew her called her Betty; that she was delighted with Pillnitz; and a thousand little things, in all of which the Em-little scene on the frozen pond in the park of Pillnitz. Francis Joseph had found in the lovely young girl whom he had met on the ice under such peculiar circumstances more than a cousin: seven months afterward, in the paradisiacal garden of the imperial villa at Ischl, he offered her his hand and his heart, and on the 18th of April, 1854, Betty, then scarcely seventeen years of age, became his consort, and seated herself by his side on the imperial throne of Austria.

She was the daughter of Duke Maximilian Joseph, the head of the Birkenfeld branch of the Wittelsbach dynasty, noted throughout Germany for his talents as a poet and novelist, and, like most of his relatives of the house of Bavaria, an ardent lover of music and of the fine arts. In the environs of Castle Possenhofen, his beautiful country seat in the neighborhood of Munich, his personal amiability has made him very popular with all classes of society. His second daughter, the subject of this sketch, was born on Christmas evening, 1837, and her father, whose favorite room; but not a complaint, not a murmur escaped the lips of the poor little girl. Some time afterward a fire broke out in the night-time in the wing of Castle Possenhofen where the nursery was situated, and in the confusion the key to the bedroom where little Betty was sleeping, and which her foolish nurse had locked, could not be found, so that it lasted some time before the door could be forced open. When the overjoyed mother clasped her child to her bosom she asked the little girl if she had not been frightened. "Yes," replied little Elizabeth, "I was frightened; but I prayed the good God to save me."

The beauty of the little girl was at that time already so great that old King Louis, whenever he saw her, admiringly called her "You little angel from heaven," and said he had never seen a lovelier child in his life. When she was five years old the King caused a full-size portrait of her to be painted. This painting, on which the artist represented her standing by the side of her father's large Newfoundland dog, with one of her little arms wound round the dog's neck, may still be seen at the picture-gallery of the royal palace in Munich.

As she grew up with her two young sisters the contrast between the characters of the three girls became more and more marked. Caroline, the eldest of the three princesses, was a rather cold and reserved child; and Mary, Betty's youngest sister, who was afterward to bear such a conspicuous part in the closing scenes of the downfall of the Neapolitan Bourbons, was bright and pretty, but exceedingly self-willed, impatient of restraint, and impetuous—a regular little hoyden. The eldest sister was fond of fine dresses, proud, and ambitious; and little Mary liked to romp with her brothers and their young friends, to row on the lake, and ride on horseback—to all of which Elizabeth was decidedly averse. Both of them, however, idolized their tender-hearted little sister; and whenever they had done wrong, or wished to obtain something from their parents, they invariably begged her to intercede in their behalf. One day the Princess Mary and her youngest brother had been playing in their father's studio, and had been incautious enough to upset the easel containing an oil-painting which the Duke had nearly finished. The painting was much injured, and the children were afraid that the Duke would punish them severely. So they went to Elizabeth and implored her to ask their father to forgive them. Elizabeth found her father greatly exasperated, and was magnanimous enough to tell him that it had been she who had caused the accident. This generous little falsehood seemed so ludicrous to the Duke, who refused to believe that his gentle daughter could be the offender, that his anger gave way, and he forgave the two little culprits, who had tremblingly awaited the result of their sister's mission. Once the Duke had written a little play which was to be performed on his wife's birthday, and in which his three daughters were to appear as pages. Three handsome velvet suits were made for them for this purpose, and on the day before the performance the Princess Mary, dressed as a page, and her pretty face flushed with vexation and disappointment, burst into her father's room and exclaimed, "Oh, papa, this will never do. Betty has put on her costume, but she does not look a bit like a boy!" The first time when the parents took the daughters with them to the royal theatre at Munich, Schiller's "Mary Stuart" was performed. All three of them were profoundly affected by what they saw on this occasion; but the tragedy made the deepest impression on Elizabeth, who wept bitterly during the whole of the last act, and upon her return to Possenhofen she told her governess, Mlle. Renouard, with streaming eyes, what she had heard about the fate of the poor Queen of Scotland. Mlle. Renouard, who afterward accompanied her pupil to Vienna, says that little Elizabeth was not so bright as her sisters in most of her lessons, but that she excelled in needle-work; that some of her embroideries excited general admiration, and peror seemed to take the liveliest interest. Her sisters had meanwhile approached, but kept at a slight distance from them, wondering who might be the young officer with whom their sister Betty was engaged in such an animated conversation. As soon as the Emperor saw them he turned toward them and told them politely that he had just heard that they were near relatives of his, and in two or three minutes he was surrounded by the three girls and talking with them as merrily and familiarly as if they had been acquainted for years. As they told him that they thought it was time for them to return to the palace, he gallantly assisted them in taking off their skates, and throwing their skates over his shoulder and offering his right arm to Betty and the left to Caroline, who blushing took it, he started with them for the palace, young Mary walking in front of them. They entered the palace by a side-door, and parted at the foot of the large staircase, promising to meet again in the course of the day. Important consequences were to arise from this child she always was, called her ever after, for this reason, his "little Christmas-gift." At the baptismal font the Archbishop of Munich christened her three weeks after with the names Elizabeth Amelia Eugénie, the Queen of Prussia, the Queen of the French, and the Queen of Saxony being her god-mothers.

Her young mother had been dangerously ill before and after giving birth to her, and it was as if the joy which her little daughter afforded her from her earliest childhood forward was to indemnify her for the sufferings amidst which she had first seen the light of the world. The sweetness of her disposition developed already at a very early age. She was obedient to the slightest wishes of her parents and nurses, extremely patient, and especially susceptible of the religious lessons which her excellent and pious mother always took pains to inculcate upon her. In her fourth year a very malignant attack of scarlet fever prostrated her for weeks, and during the whole of her malady she was confined to a dark that with her fine voice and delicate ear she soon became an accomplished musician.

Toward the close of 1852 the Duke went with his three daughters to Pillnitz, where occurred the scene related at the beginning of this sketch. It was generally noticed by the guests of the King of Saxony on that occasion that the young Emperor of Austria, during his sojourn at Pillnitz, paid a great deal of attention to the three daughters of Maximilian Joseph of Bavaria; and every body, including the Emperor's mother, the Archduchess Sophia, believed that Francis Joseph had fallen in love with the eldest of the three princesses. Now, inasmuch as this princess was a most charming young lady, of very graceful and dignified bearing, and a union of the imperial dynasty with the house of Wittelsbach was considered peculiarly desirable at that time, the Archduchess resolved to bring about a match between her son and the princess, whom she believed to be the girl of his heart. For this purpose she entered into a correspondence with Maximilian Joseph, who received the idea very favorably, and they agreed that the betrothal of the young couple should take place in the following July at Ischl. When the Duke and his three daughters, of whom the eldest considered herself already as engaged to the Emperor, arrived at Ischl, the Archduchess Sophia and her son Francis Joseph received them at the landing of the staircase of the imperial villa in the stiff and ceremonious manner then still in use at the court of Austria; but, amidst the deep bows and obeisances on all sides, suddenly a sweet, girlish voice was heard exclaiming joyously, "Oh, dear cousin Francis, how glad I am to see you again!"

It was the Princess Elizabeth, who had just alighted from the carriage, and, holding out her hand, and with a radiant face, hastened toward the Emperor, regardless of the ill-concealed astonishment of the old Archduchess and the dismay of the courtiers at this terrible breach of etiquette. Francis Joseph, however, blushing with pleasure, cordially shook hands with his young cousin, and, offering his arm to her, conducted her to the reception-room, to the surprise and mortification of the Princess Caroline, who thought she was entitled to the attention which the Emperor bestowed upon her younger sister.

Half an hour afterward Francis Joseph informed his mother that he would marry his cousin Elizabeth, and not her elder sister, who had been perfectly indifferent to him all along; and as all the remonstrances of the Archduchess were unavailing, she finally gave her consent. The young Emperor then immediately sought a tête-à-tête with Elizabeth in the garden adjoining to the villa, and, after wrestling a low, sweet "Yes" from her lips, led with a radiant face the blushing and yet so happy maiden to his mother Sophia.

Nine months afterward the young couple were married in Vienna amidst imposing ceremonies. When the people of the beautiful old imperial city on the Danube saw the lovely young bride, with her childlike face so full of innocence and amiability, with so much grace in her every movement, and such a depth of warm feeling beaming from her fine large eyes, riding at the Emperor's side through the streets of the capital to the old imperial palace, all hearts throbbed enthusiastically toward her; all hailed her as the good genius of Austria that had returned at length; and all hoped and believed that a new and better era had dawned upon the country, still bleeding with so many wounds.

From Vienna the Emperor went with his bride by slow stages to Trieste. The journey was a continual ovation: the scenes of popular enthusiasm which had marked the reception of the Empress at Vienna were re-enacted at every station. Elizabeth thought her happiness complete. She looked with proud affection upon the husband of her heart; she knew that her own popularity had enlisted new sympathies for the dynasty itself; she saw Austria holding a commanding and imposing position in the councils of the world, and enjoying profound tranquillity at home: how could she have suspected that it was but the tranquillity of the grave-yard, that the greatness of Austria was only apparent, and that the first storm would wreck it? How could she have suspected all this when the rulers and statesmen of the empire themselves had no idea of it?

The birth of her first child added greatly to her happiness. It is true, the child she gave to her husband was not a son and heir, but a daughter—the Archduchess Marianne, and there was some disappointment manifested at court; but the Empress herself was overjoyed as she gazed at her baby, and the Emperor shared her happiness and delight.

Clouds, however, were not long in darkening the serene sky of Elizabeth's happiness. The child to which she gave birth a year afterward was again a daughter, the Archduchess Ghisela; and this time the disappointment manifested by the whole imperial family, and even by the Emperor himself, was so great that it reached the ears of the young mother and filled her heart with grief and anxiety. The greater was her joy when, on the 21st of August, 1858, she was at length able to fulfill the wishes of her husband and his family. At setting in of dusk on that day a hundred and one guns announced to the people of the capital that the Empress had given birth to a son—the Crown-Prince Rudolph. Now followed again a few months of unalloyed happiness, to be succeeded by many, many days of tears and anguish. On the 28th of December in the same year the Empress lost her eldest daughter, Marianne; and, a few hours after the remains of her child had been deposited in the imperial vault of the Church of the Capuchins, she heard the terrible news which the telegraph had flashed from Paris to Vienna, that a war between France and Austria was well-nigh inevitable. What added to the grief and anxiety of the young Empress was the change which her husband had undergone some time ago. Ever since Libenyi had stabbed him on the glacis of Vienna, Francis Joseph had been fretful and irascible; and, what was worse, it was notorious that he kept up a love-affair with the fascinating daughter of a well-known circus-manager.

After the peace of Villafranca, however, Francis Joseph returned with fervent protestations of love and devotion to the arms of his young consort, and, as he embraced her amidst tears and sobs for the first time after their long separation, he told her to cheer up, for a new era of happiness would dawn upon them, their children, and their country; but, alas! these hopes were not to be fulfilled. The unhealthy climate of Vienna, the rapid succession of her confinements, the excitement and grief of the last year, had undermined the health of the Empress, and consumption threatened to hurry her to an early grave. Her physicians told her that a change of climate was indispensable, and reluctantly and tearfully she bade her husband farewell in the spring of 1861, and embarked for Madeira. She looked so pale and emaciated that people were afraid she might die during the journey to that island; but she reached it safely, and the balmy air of Madeira checked the inroads of consumption, and enabled the Empress, after a prolonged sojourn, during which she had treated her follow-sufferers on the island with the utmost liberality and generosity, to return to Europe with renewed health and vigor. In midsummer, 1862, she arrived again at Vienna, and, with her children growing up around her, and the affections of her husband restored to her, looked forward to the future with the brightest anticipations of happiness. For four years these hopes were fully realized; but then broke out that terrible war of 1866, which, in course of a few days, brought the Austrian monarchy to the brink of ruin, and presented to the lips of the Empress a bitterer cup of sorrow than ever before. While her heart was filled with despair as she looked upon the ruin which, to all appearance, was impending over the house of Hapsburg, the poor lady was sent to Pesth to prevent the Hungarians from deserting the cause of Austria in the hour of her dire distress. Little fitted as she naturally was to play such a rôle under the circumstances, she at once consented to depart for Hungary, and restrained her grief until the moment when she took leave of the Emperor at the railroad dépôt. There, regardless of the large crowd that was present, she broke out into loud sobs, and the Emperor mingled his tears with hers. Few of the many startling scenes which the Viennese witnessed in those gloomy days made a deeper impression on them than this parting of the imperial couple. When the Empress reached Pesth a deputation of prominent ladies waited upon her to assure her of their heart-felt sympathies. A reply had been prepared, which her Majesty was to read to the ladies; but she crumpled the paper in her hand, and, bursting into tears, sobbed: "Your consolation does me good, dear ladies; I have lately suffered so much, oh, so much!"

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SOUTH WEST.—Gentlemen's furs are described in this paper. Trim your dress with black worsted braid and bullion fringe.

MRS. K.—Your inquiry about furs is answered in this Number.

MATILDA S.—Poplin alpaca, Irish poplin, and satin-faced serge are handsome goods for black suits. Satin braid half an inch wide, bullion fringe, or pleated frills are the trimmings. Make with two skirts and a half-fitting basquine belted in, or with a scarf baschlik. Alter your loose velvet sacque to a half-fitting basquine worn with a belt. Trim with guipure lace or wide fringe with a satin pleated lining. Renaissance bows or else large dahlia rosettes of satin down the front give an air of style. Your morning dress may be either long or short according to your fancy. A loose gored dress is admired for long dresses, with a small pelerine cape. Trim with bias velvet two inches wide. The short dress is similarly made.

MRS. C.—Make your reps with demi-train and a panier or tunic, for which you will find directions in Harper's Bazar, No. 52. Make a revers waist, and puffed coat-sleeve. Trim with rich fringe and several rows of narrow satin braid. Black velvet ribbon studded with colored buttons would enliven it.

ETTAM.—The chignon will cost you $15 or $20. Tie your own hair securely, leave it hanging, pin on the chignon with hair-pine, and wind your own long hair around the chignon. Many narrow folds of the material overlapping each other is the fashionable trimming for mourning. Serge braid is also much used. You are not definite enough about your dress. Is it for the house or street? You will find directions for both in answers to other correspondents. Information about mourning will be given soon.

S. S. H.—So small a sum as you speak of is best deposited in a Savings Bank. When you have added to it sufficiently you could not do better, in our opinion, than invest in Government securities, which can be obtained in as small sums as fifty dollars.

MARY H.—There are several ophthalmic hospitals in New York where provision is made for lodging strangers during treatment.

ELLA M.—When quinine fails to act favorably in fever and ague there are substitutes for it. One of the best is a preparation of arsenic called Fowler's Solution, but you should consult a physician before using it.

FRANK G.—A narrow satin braid is the best trimming this season for beaver-cloth. Seven or eight rows are stitched on.

BLISS AND MARY.—Make your plaid dress with a single skirt and basquine, with a small cape looped with rosettes. Scallop the skirt and basque in deep scallops bound with black silk sewed on with a thick cord covered with scarlet or blue merino. A Highland scarf over the left shoulder is faultlessly worn by girls of your age. Make your garnet Empress cloth with two skirts and a baschlik. Trim with pleated flounces.

ESTER.—Read the answer above to Bliss and Mary.

FLOUNCE.—Get a black velvet or satin fez, trimmed with shaded blue ostrich tufts.

MRS. S. G.—Cloth suits are very fashionable. The cloth used is called ladies' cloth, is double width. Six and a half yards make the single skirt, basquine, and cape. Dark blue and snuff-brown are the colors. Trim with narrow bands of fur, or bias bands of silk the color of the dress, edged with black. For your boy make a Bismarck suit of gray cloth or black velvet. There is nothing new in boys' clothing. Scallop the edge of the blouse, and the outer seams of the pantaloons. A sacque over-coat of gray Elysian beaver, with a large cape.

MRS. CORA M. JONES.—Soft warm lap-ropes of lamb's-wool may be bought for the price you mentioned, and are preferable to plush. They may be had in grave dark colors, or in bright grounds dashed with black.

CLERGYMAN.—It was Louis XIV. who made the remark to Massillon: "I have heard many preachers who greatly pleased me, but every time I hear you I am displeased with myself."—It was Massillon, too, who commenced his sermon preached before Louis XIV.—La grand monarche—and his courtiers with the words: "God alone, my brethren, is great."

READER.—Pour encourager les autres is from Voltaire, who, in one of his tales referring to the execution of Admiral Byng, said that the English Government "killed an admiral in order to encourage the others." The witty sarcasm is apparent.

ELIZA.—Though we do not relish being made the object of an experiment, we will answer your questions. Descriptions of shawls and patterns of cloaks will be given in the next Number. A plaid gored circular with hood, now greatly worn here, is the carriage wrap you need. It was described in a late Bazar under the head of Fall Mantles. Water-proof tweed is a superior article of water-proof cloaking, in lighter shades of gray, brown, and gold with black. Make your questions about hoods and petticoats plainer.

MARY THOMAS.—Read directions given to Country Parsonage. Make a black silk or Irish poplin polonaise with panier puff for the street. Lined and wadded throughout such garments are worn in mid-winter. Bonnet of blue satin, with black lace and ost. ich plumes.

MOURNING.—A border of Astrakhan fur is a stylish trimming for mourning cloaks. Wear an Astrakhan collar and muff trimmed with Angora fringe. Large passementerie buttons, two rows looped with cord. Line your bombazine skirt. Face with stiff wiggling sewed merely to the lining. Put one puff around the arm-hole of your coat-sleeve. The puff is bias, about a quarter of a yard wide before sewing on. Trim the waist with a quilling of crape beginning at the belt and extending over the shoulders like a berth.

M. A. T.—Dresses for girls of eight years are made quite short and gored. Handsome materials are made with two skirts after the manner described for ladies.

INQUIRER.—You are not sufficiently definite. Long crêpes, or topseys, for stuffing the strands of hair when forming a plait, are sold at the hair-dressers'. Mohair plaits, imitating plaited hair, are also to be had.

COUNTRY PARSONAGE.—In order to be stylish, your dresses should have demi-trains, say from a foot to half a yard in length. Short evening dresses just escape the floor. The length you mention is neither short nor trained. Take one of your seven breadths and piece the three full back breadths. Gore the remaining three breadths. Make a black silk panier to conceal the joins, according to the directions given in Harper's Bazar, No. 52. It is inexpensive, requiring only a yard and a half of silk, with some fringe or lace for trimming. If you think the panier puff too dressy, let the material hang plainly from the belt, like an apron. The Russian gored skirt is sold at the principal retail dry-goods stores on Broadway.

R. E. F.—Boots of the material of the dress or of white satin or kid are worn with short dancing dresses. They are cut high at the ankle, buttoned with Roman pearls, and trimmed with blonde lace and embroidery. The French heel, covered with the material of the shoe, is very slender, tapered to the middle and enlarged at the end to twice the size of the pattern you send. Two inches is considered a high heel; three and a half would cause a lady to be stared at even on Broadway. The shank is only half an inch wide. A steel spring is sometimes inserted between the leathers of the shank to preserve the arched shape, but this is very objectionable. The best authorities say if the shoemaker understands the anatomy of the foot, and fits the shoe properly over a Spanish last, it will retain the curve without the aid of iron or steel. The "pocket rubber" worn with the present style of shoes is a sandal or "mule," consisting merely of a sole with a strap over the back of the foot, through which the heel is passed.

DR. R. C., of Princeton, Illinois, writes: "In Answers to Correspondents, in No. 46 of Bazar, to 'Matron,' you say there must be a mistake in the weight of the child, and that it would be impossible to have children weighing 15 pounds at birth. Medical works and hospital records are not the only means of information. A lady at Troy Grove, in this State, gave birth to a child weighing 15 pounds. One in Mendota, Illinois, 16½ pounds. A lady in Blackberry, Illinois, 15 pounds and some ounces. A Dutch lady in Blackberry gave birth to triplets, weighing respectively 8, 8½, and 7 pounds each. She went to the baby-show and received the premium. The children, with the exception of one, are alive and well at the present time in all the above cases. If you want large babies come out West, we can beat the world."

TENA.—The effective depilatories are composed mostly of poisonous substances, and we therefore hesitate to intrust them to unknown and possibly indiscreet hands.

CURIOS.—Hallow-eve, or All-Hallow-e'en, is the night before All-Saints'-day, which comes on the 1st of November.—We are not familiar with "the poet James A. Barker," or the passage you quote, and therefore can not tell you in which of his poems it can be found.—"The Old Bachelor" who writes such charming letters" is an attaché of the Bazar, and we must refuse to disclose his name to any young lady, for fear of annexation or any other consequences which might deprive us of him.

BURNETT'S FLORIMEL, also BURNETT'S COLOGNE-WATER (three sizes).—There is a freshness in these delightful perfumes found in no others. New York Branch, 592 Broadway (Metropolitan Hotel Building). For sale by druggists and fancy-goods dealers in the principal cities of the United States.

CAN it be possible that over five million bottles of PLANTATION BITTERS have been sold during the past year? It is almost incredible; nevertheless it is absolutely true, and is the most convincing proof of their wonderful medicinal and health-restoring qualities. Every family should be supplied with these Bitters, at whatever cost or trouble it may be to obtain them. Be careful that you get the genuine, and that you are not imposed upon by a spurious article.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR REMOVED from any part of the body in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by UPHAM'S DEPICATORY POWDER. $1 25 by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, 115 South Seventh St., Philadelphia.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK OF FOREIGN TRAVEL.

HARPER'S HAND-BOOK FOR TRAVELLERS IN EUROPE AND THE EAST. Being a Guide through France, Belgium, Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Egypt, Syria, Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, Tyrol, Russia, Denmark, Sweden, Spain, and Great Britain and Ireland. With a Railroad Map corrected up to 1868. By W. PEMBROKE FETTERIDGE. Revised Edition: Seventh Year. Large 12mo, Leather, Pocket-Book Form, $1 50.

From the Boston Journal.

TO AMERICANS GOING ABROAD.—Some six years ago Mr. W. Pembroke Fetteridge, at the suggestion of the Messrs. Harpers, visited the leading cities of Europe for the purpose of gathering materials for a Guide-Book adapted to the wants of American travellers. Mr. Fetteridge passed a year abroad making notes and ascertaining by practical experience the items of every expense, besides visiting every place calculated to interest an American. The first edition of "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers in Europe" was published after his return to this country, and at once attracted the favorable attention of all who had occasion to visit Europe. The practical suggestions which the volume contained, and its reliability, gave it from the start a high rank. The volume has now reached its seventh year, during which time the East has been embraced within its scope, and it is now admitted to be perfect in design and execution. Mr. Fetteridge visits Europe every year, acquiring additional information, and by keeping au courant with the progress of events and changes of Continental topography, is enabled to make each edition every way fresh and complete.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK.

HARPER'S PHRASE-BOOK, or, Hand-Book of Travel Talk for Travellers and Schools. Being a Guide to Conversations in English, French, German, and Italian, on a New and Improved Method. Intended to accompany "Harper's Hand-Book for Travellers." By W. PEMBROKE FETTERIDGE. Assisted by Professors of Heidelberg University. With concise and explicit Rules for the Pronunciation of the different Languages. Square 16mo, Flexible Cloth, $1 50.

We must speak in high praise of the correctness of this hand-book.—Nation. A traveller knowing but one language, may by this book make himself understood in four.—Philadelphia Post.

Green (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."
Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the custom-house stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the express charges) by sending directly to the

"GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

SOL. SMITH'S

THEATRICAL MANAGEMENT.

THEATRICAL MANAGEMENT IN THE WEST

AND SOUTH FOR THIRTY YEARS. Interpersed with ANECDOTAL SKETCHES, autobiographically given by SOL. SMITH, Retired Actor. With Fifteen Illustrations and a Portrait of the Author. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

This autobiography of one of the first of American actors is immensely entertaining as a narrative; from the laughable Dedication to the Anecdotal Appendix it is irresistibly droll and comic. It is full of incident, character, and reminiscence. It is not only an autobiography of Mr. Sol. Smith, but a complete history of the American stage, full of facts about the early life of the principal actors and managers of the present day, and of reminiscences of the stage for the past thirty years and more. Besides, it forms a most pleasant and agreeable sketch of Southern and Southwestern society, so faithful that any reader who has ever encountered the peculiar people of those regions will instantly recognize its truthfulness.

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR, VOL. II.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York,

Have just ready:

THE SECOND VOLUME OF

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR. The Invasion of the Crimea: Its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER
WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps and Plans. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00 per Vol.

... The polished diction and burnished style which first made their author famous are still maintained in this volume; and were the interest of the subject even less momentous, they would be eagerly read as specimens of a literary production of consummate skill.—Saturday Review.

By a happy accident the author has acquired extraordinary opportunities and advantages for ascertaining and verifying the incidents of a remarkable episode in history, with which the national honor is inextricably mixed up. He has shown himself willing to undergo any amount of personal sacrifice and responsibility for the adequate performance of what, to him, is both a public and a private duty. He has instituted a careful survey of the localities; he has consulted and collected dispatches and correspondence with statesmen and warriors, with almost all the leading actors and many of the less prominent characters who have figured on the scene, and he has got together a mass of information perhaps unequalled in pari materia for fullness, accuracy, interest, and variety.—Fraser's Magazine.

... Mr. Kinglake in his present volume fully sustains his reputation; and this is saying much. Few non-professional men have ever so completely mastered the true spirit of the art of war, or described military events with such graphic power; fewer still can clothe their impressions in such pure and nervous English.—Examiner.

Mr. Kinglake has exhibited extraordinary powers as a historian in his account of the Battle of Balaklava.
The minuteness with which he traces all the movements of that terrible action—the care and industry with which he weighs the several and sometimes conflicting accounts—the mastery of detail and knowledge of military tactics which he displays—and the general vividness of the narrative, which often seems to glow with the light and echo with the roar of mortal combat, combine to form one of the most remarkable pictures of a great battle which our literature can boast.
Sometimes composed in the spirit of military criticism —calm, cool, and observant—and at others in that of some modern prose Homer, who feels the inspiration of the fight, and kindles with the personal heroism of individual actors, it shows throughout the hand of a master in this species of writing.—London Review.

THE OPIUM HABIT, WITH SUGGES-TIONS AS TO THE REMEDY. 12mo, Cloth,
$1 75.

The writer and compiler of the volume has been himself a victim to the habit which he describes, having eaten more than half a hundredweight of the drug and continued in its uninterrupted use for more than fifteen years. He emancipated himself by a short but painful struggle of six weeks, in which he proceeded from 80 grains a day by diminished doses to its entire abandonment. The story which he tells is interesting without being at all sensational; it is minute enough without being tedious, and its moral lessons of hope and perseverance are none the less impressive from the fact that there is not an attempt to state or enforce them. There is no cant nor preaching in the story, and but very little in the selections which follow it; the author judging wisely enough that the facts preach loudly and forcibly enough, and that to the great majority of opium-eaters their own reflections furnish more preaching than they care to hear or can consent to endorse.—Nation.

FACETIÆ.

THERE is a Gaelic proverb—"If the best man's faults were written on his forehead, it would make him pull his hat over his eyes."

A lady in Leavenworth has been on a new-fashioned Grecian bend, and her husband has been on an old-fashioned American bender.

To make a valuable speckled dog bullet-proof, Mark Twain says, "Take off his hide and line it with sheet-iron. Russia iron is the best, and is slicker and more showy than the common kind. Dogs prepared in this way do not mind bullets."

POOR BOY!—A good story is told in Paris of a son of M. Bixio. This eminent man was for a short time incarcerated in the fortress of Vincennes, after the coup d'état. His wife, accompanied by one of her sons, went to see him. They dined together in his chamber. The son was extremely sad and taciturn during the dinner, and at last attracted his father's attention. "Why, my dear boy, what is the matter with you?" "Nothing, father," replied the lad of eleven. "Nonsense! I see something is the matter with you. Come, tell me what it is." The boy blubbered: "Why, no, I am so disappointed. I made sure of seeing you in a dungeon, chained to the wall, and you ain't."

"I buy two cravats, which last me a whole year," said the famous Bach; "a black one and a white one. In about six months the one does duty for the other. The black, by constant use, comes rather white; and the white turns very black."

Oh! where can the breaksman be?
And in ladies' ears I can not utter
The thoughts that arise in me.

Oh! well for the "Railway Arms,"
Where the breaksman is smoking, they say,
Quaffing huge draughts of ale,
And forgetting the "permanent way,"

While the stately train goes on

And the blame is laid on a vanished hand,
Or a signalman's tickle will.

I hope no collision may be,
For compensation when I am dead
Will bring small comfort to me.

An old unloved deacon, in his last hours, was visited by a neighbor, who said:

"Well, deacon, I hope you feel resigned in going?"
"Y-e-e-s," said the deacon, "I—I think I—I am resigned."
"Well," said the other, "I thought it might be consoling to you to know that all the neighbors are resigned also."

ABSENCE OF MIND.—Lessing, the celebrated German poet, was remarkable for a frequent absence of mind. Having missed money at different times without being able to discover who took it, he determined to put the honesty of his servants to the test, and left a handful of gold upon the table.
"Of course you counted it," said one of his friends.
"Counted it," said Lessing, rather embarrassed, "no, I forgot that."

Baron Platt once, when visiting a penal institution, inspected the treadmill with the rest, and, being practically disposed, the learned judge trusted himself on the treadmill, desiring the warden to set it in motion. The machine was accordingly adjusted, and his lordship began to lift his feet. In a few minutes, however, he had had enough of it, and called to be released; but this was not so easy. "Please, my lord," said the man, "you can't get off. It's set for twenty minutes; that's the shortest time we can make it go." So the judge was in duress until his term had expired.

An old fellow of the ultra-inquisitive order asked a little girl on board the train, who was sitting by her mother, as to her name, destination, etc. After learning she was going to Philadelphia, he asked, "What motive is taking you thither, my dear?" "I believe they call it the Locomotive, Sir," was the innocent reply. The "intrusive stranger" was extinguished.

JOSH BILLINGS ON MILK.

I want to say sumthing.
I want to say sumthing in reference to milk az a fertilizer.

There are various kinds ov milk. There iz sweet milk, sour milk, skim milk, butter milk, cow milk, and the milk of human kindness; but the mostest best milk iz the milk that hazzent the most water in it. Butter milk izent the best for butter.

Milk iz spontaneous, and has done more to encourage the growth of human folks than enny other likwid.

Milk is lacteal: it iz also acqutic, while under the patronage of milk venders.

Milk iz misterious. Cokernut milk has never been solved yet.

Milk is also another name for human kindness. Milk and bread iz a pleasant mixtur.

Sometimes if milk iz aloud to stand too long, a scum rises to the surface, which iz apt to skare fokes that live in cities, but it duzzent foller that the milk iz nasty. This scum is called kreme by fokes who inhabit the country.

Kreme is the parent ov butter, and butter iz 70 cents a pound.

The most kommon milk in use, without doubt, iz skim milk; skim milk is made by skimming the milk, which is considered sharp practiss.

Milk is obtained from cows, hogs, woodchux, rats, sheep, squirrels, and all other animals that have hair. Snaix and geese don't give milk.

I forgot to state, in conclusion, that cow milk, if well-watered, brings ten cents per quart.

A worthy citizen of Boston was desirous, some years ago, of being presented at a French state ball, but lacked the costume. Military uniform or a court dress was then, as now, indispensable, and it was too late to get either. His more fortunate friends, "in full rig," took leave of him at his hotel, with many expressions of regret that he could not accompany them. No sooner were they out of the house than he determined he would, at any rate, try the experiment. Within an hour he made his appearance at the door of the throne-room at Versailles, arrayed in all the glory of his best blue coat, white vest, and nankens. Here the horrified master of ceremonies stopped him, and, pointing to his nankens, endeavored by word and sign to convince him that his dress was not comme il faut, and that he must retire. "Dress! dress!" said the traveler, "not pass! not enter! Why, it is the same dress I always wear in the General Court at Boston!" No sooner were the words uttered than the door flew open, and the obsequious attendant, "booming and booning," preceded him, and announced in a loud voice, "Monsieur le General Court de Boston!" to the infinite amazement and amusement of his American friends.

Winter Cloaks.

THE Supplement accompanying the present Number will be found to contain patterns for nearly a score of stylish winter cloaks, which can be economically made by any one with ordinary ingenuity. Illustrations and descriptions of various kinds of trimmings for the same are given on page 859. Tight-fitting paletots are preferred, although the sack is still worn. Sacks are often arranged in the Watteau fashion by setting a belt under the back, bringing it outside at the side seams, and fastening it in front, thus forming a wide pleat at the back. For elderly ladies we recommend the burnous shape, with hood or cape, the latter being pleated very high. The trimmings are principally of satin and gros grain. They may be selected of different colors, but must always be in harmony with the color of the cloak. They consist of flutings, flounces, cords, pipings, etc. Trimmings which imitate scallops or squares are particularly stylish; revers, tabs, and bows are also in favor. Tight-fitting paletots are finished with sashes. The materials most used for cloaks are velvet, Astrakhan, beaver of different kinds, and cashmere, lined with flannel or silk and wadded.

Marketing Bag.

MATERIALS: dark brown carriage leather, thin brown enameled cloth, brown worsted braid three-fourths of an inch wide, pasteboard, black buttons, silk, etc.

This bag is very convenient for marketing, and is easily and cheaply made. The model is of brown carriage leather, lined with coarse linen or thin enameled cloth which can be scrubbed out; the under four-cornered part of the bag is stiffened with pasteboard in order that it may not lose the proper shape. The edges of the bag are bound with brown worsted braid, which is worked in cross stitch with yellow silk. For making the bag cut of the material chosen from Fig. 59 of the Supplement one piece (Fig. 59 gives only a quarter of the pocket); join the outside and lining from 62 to 63 on 63, and from 63 to 64 on 64, with long overcast stitches, in doing which fasten in the pasteboard at the same time. Leave the bag unsewed on two of the upper sloping sides from 63 to 64. Next bind the seams and edges with the worsted braid, work this in cross stitch, and sew buttons and loops on the upper part. The handles consist of strips of carriage leather an inch and a quarter wide and seventeen inches long, bound and worked like the binding of the bag. The handles are sewed on in the manner shown by the pattern.

SENTIMENTAL WOMEN.

BY a sentimental person is generally understood one who indulges excessively in feeling, which is supposed to be confined to the emotion and to exhaust itself in an expression by words, tears, or some of its usual outward manifestations. The character may be found in both sexes, but it is less common among men than women. This is not owing so much, if at all, to any original difference of physical or moral constitution as to the enervating system of education and modes of life to which the female sex is subjected.

The whole tendency of the prevailing influence of society upon woman is to make her sentimental. Her vocation is supposed to be to feel, not to act; and a helpless woman in tears yielding to despair is thought to be a more lovable object than one who, with dry eyes and a strong arm, battles spiritedly with her destiny. This is by no means a complimentary view of woman, and she should refuse to conform to any such unsubstantial ideal.

Sentimentality is not only weakness but heartlessness. Softness of feeling is not by any means generally accompanied with kindness of act. Those who weep the easiest over real or fictitious scenes of misery are not the most ready to stretch a hand to help the sufferer. The wife of one of the cruellest of the Roman emperors turned away fainting from the agonies of a victim of the circus, but was heard to whisper, "Don't let him escape!" It has often been said of Sterne that he could weep over a dead ass and yet allow his mother to starve for want of bread.

Where feeling is cultivated to the excess of sentimentality it becomes all-sufficing. There is no disposition to look beyond the indulgence of personal emotion for the exercise of the natural compassion of every human creature. That most social of virtues thus becomes a pre-eminent selfish quality. Every one knows the relief of tears; and yet there could be nothing so useless to others, however grateful to the individual who pours them out.

It is a well-established fact that as the practical benevolence increases the sentimental diminishes, and the converse is equally true. John Howard, the philanthropist, was never seen to shed a tear, and yet was always doing good. Rousseau wept with greater facility than most women, and wrote more about sentiment than any man, and yet put all his children into a foundling hospital.

Tears are not worth cultivating for their own sake, and they indicate, after all, only a weakness of the lachrymal glands from too much use. We would commend our damsels, instead of saturating their lace handkerchiefs with the damp theatrical sympathy of tears for the Miss Angelina who was jilted by the elegant Augustus of the last novel, to dry their eyes and muster energy enough to turn a corner, look up the cases of genuine misery abounding in the neighborhood, and relieve them by a substantial charity. A little practical benevolence of this kind would do a double good, improve their own eyes, and better the condition of their suffering fellow-mortals. They would thus become more useful and better if less "sentimental women."

CHILDREN'S FEELINGS.

OF all human monsters the most monstrous are those who are deliberately cruel to children. It is creditable to our race that these are so rare, and when they show themselves are overwhelmed with the public indignation. Though the conscious torturers of childhood are few, the unconscious ones, unfortunately, are by no means scarce.

These, to whom we allude, would not for the world knowingly inflict pain upon a child, and yet they ignorantly make it suffer agony. They are careful of the delicate little body, nursing and nurturing it with the utmost tenderness, covering it with the warmest and softest envelopes, pampering it with sweets and shielding it from every rude touch. No labor, time, or expense is spared in rearing the corporeal frame and guarding it from the least hurt or injury.

With all this diligence of attention and unequivocal proof of tenderness, there is often a total disregard of the child's feelings. The little charge is not to be considered exclusively as a vegetative being—merely a delicate plant to be grown. Provided it be kept well watered with mother's milk, or enriched with pap, neatly trimmed, warmed with the sunshine of maternal affection, and secure from all rudeness of a material kind, it is expected to mature to full bloom of flower or richness of fruit.

The child, however, is not merely a vegetative being, but the most sensitive little animal possible, and if its true nature in this respect is disregarded much misery must ensue. The youngest infant is endowed with an exceedingly acute sensibility to mental impressions. "I have seen," reports Saint Augustine, "a jealous baby; it could not pronounce a single word, and yet it showed unmistakably, by its pale face and its fiery little eyes, that it was jealous of another little nursing fed at the same breast." The marasmus, or wasting away, frequent among children, is supposed by good medical authorities not seldom to be owing to the effect of a jealousy awakened by the ill-concealed partiality of parents.

The sense of ridicule is excessively acute with children, who can generally better bear to be whipped than laughed at. It is astonishing how ruthlessly parents and teachers will provoke this sensibility, and thus torture childhood and youth. A slight natural defect, perhaps no more serious than some irregularity of the shape of the nose or color of the hair, is caught at and pertinaciously thrust into the child's daily consciousness by his thoughtless but most cruel persecutors. His life is thus often rendered miserable, and darkened with a gloom of which the shadow will extend to the end of his days. Nicknames fastened upon a youth, or some objectionable peculiarity of dress noticed and ridiculed, will often be sufficient to embitter his whole existence.

Parents, teachers, and others, who have the control of the young, have the notion that this over-acute sensibility is to be laughed away.

They accordingly take every occasion to provoke and jeer at it. This is as absurd as it is cruel. Do they suppose that by exercise they can weaken or eradicate a perverted instinct? Are they to get rid of it by fixing it into a habit? The natural sensibility of youth should not be irritated to a vice but strengthened to a virtue, of which it is the germ that, under proper cultivation, will develop into delicacy of sentiment.

GENTLEMEN'S CABINS.

THIS name is given to the half of the ferry-boats set aside for tobacco-smoke. Otherwise it is a misnomer, seeing that the gentlemen who do not smoke crowd the ladies' cabins and fill up the seats, to the exclusion of scores of standing dames, leaving the seats in their own proper apartments empty. We would not cavil so much at this if one side of the boat were made a true Tabagie—a Tobacco Parliament, to which chewers as well as smokers were banished during the journey across the river; but so long as those who use the weed in its most offensive form practice expectation in the cabins devoted to ladies, regardless of the broad river around them, which would seem the fittest place, it is only just to protest against the present division of room. As the case stands, gentlemen have a monopoly of one half the ferry-boat, and all they can get of the other.

What is the use of "gentlemen's cabins," unless indeed men are willing to confine themselves as exclusively thereto as ladies do to theirs? We can understand how necessary "smoking cars" on long railroad routes are to the unfortunates who can not exist long without a cigar. But surely any man can forego this luxury during the few minutes he spends in crossing the river, or if he thinks he can not, he had better be made to learn. Ferry-boats are public vehicles, in which nothing should be permitted that is offensive to the inmates at large. If the cabins were made equally attractive to all the passengers the general comfort would be infinitely increased, and the overcrowding in particular localities diminished. As it is, one half the space is given over to tobacco and its attendants; the result of which is that the part ostensibly set apart for the gentlemen becomes so filthy and unbearable that even gentlemen smokers abandon it in disgust to the roughs, who find there a congenial atmosphere, and take refuge in the ladies' cabins. We presume that the great majority of men would cheerfully acquiesce in the abolition of the tobacco cabin, supposed to be set apart for them, but which they never use. When the golden age for travelers arrives neither smoking, spitting, swearing, nor rowdiness will be tolerated in any part of public vehicles, and these luxuries will be reserved for strictly private life, where they can not interfere with the comfort of others.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Upon Eating Toads.

MY DEAR ADOLPHUS,—As I came down town yesterday morning I met our old friend Tom Vine, who was hurrying along to catch somebody in front of him, and I soon saw that it was old Oaks. But Tom stopped for an instant to speak a word, and then said, "Ah, I must overtake Mr. Oaks," and away he went. As Thomas left me I found myself repeating that ridiculous ditty in Pickwick:

"On a log
Expiring frog!
Can I see thee panting, lying
On thy stomach, without sighing,
Can I unmoved see thee dying,
On a log
Expiring frog?"

And as I was repeating the lines and smiling, Peter Paul Pry suddenly accosted me and said,

"A penny for your thoughts."

"Dear for a toad," said I. But when I told him what I was repeating he said,

"That's a frog."

"Same thing this time," I answered.

The lines, you remember, my dear Adolphus, are Mrs. Leo Hunter's—a lady who received distinguished people, and whose name, being literally interpreted, means lion-hunter. Mrs. Hunter hunted lions. That is perhaps an invigorating pursuit. But to hunt toads, to eat toads—is that a vigorous or manly business?

I have heard of eating humble-pie. Indeed, my friend Adolph, your correspondent has made many a repast exclusively of that pastry. He does not pretend to like it; but he owns that, like many other unpalatable bits, it may be of great sanitary service. Who has not eaten humble-pie? Who will affect that he is fond of it? It is served up to us as elixir pro used to be at Mr. Rodd's school in the country, long and long ago. Did you ever hear of Mr. Rodd? Poor old gentleman! I suppose he meant well, as they say. But what a mess his well-meaning made! For my part I like people who do well rather than those who mean well. When we were ill, how hard it was for Mr. Rodd to believe it! Or let me more kindly say, when we said that we were ill, how hard was belief? I suppose it is so in all great schools. A boy who sees an awful arithmetical morning before him will very often say, probably, that his head aches, and his stomach aches, and that he aches all over. How is even the best and most humane Rodd to know whether the boy tells the truth? Our Rodd of long ago did not pretend to do it. All the complaining boys were put into a little room together, and just as the bell rang which summoned the other boys to the school-room, the door of the little room opened, and Mr. Rodd entered with a small tray covered with generous wine-glasses, of the kind that in later days we discovered to be claret-glasses.

"Well, boys, I am sorry you are not well, but I hope this will make you so!"

As I look back and think of that scene, the poor little boys, many of whom I am afraid had no pain whatever in the head or elsewhere, gazing at him and his tray of glasses with a horrible foretaste, I can not help thinking of Lucretia Borgia confronting the revelers.

"Here is a little elixir pro for the sick boys."

That was the next word, and then the sick boys fell to and drank the dreadful draught. Do you know elixir pro, Adolphus? Did you ever drink it? By the claret-glass full? It is inconceivable! It is a kind of rhubarb run mad. But you see the philosophy of the prescription. If the boys really had stomach-aches it was a warm remedy. If they had not, it was a prompt and memorable punishment.

Now humble-pie, I say, may be eaten often as this bitter draught was drunken, and morally may be of service. But deliberately to eat toads—not frogs, for which our French friends have a traditional fondness—to smack your lips, to say "How delicious!" and to pass your plate for more, and with an appetite, this seems to you an incredible and impossible thing; but this is what Tom Vine daily does. It is upon this that he lives. His constant food is toads. Do you know what I mean? I mean that he subsists upon the flattery that he offers, and from which he derives in turn an ample support. Here is Coke Oaks, Esquire, the distinguished lawyer. He is a gentleman who privately believes that a certain gentleman whose initials are his own is at the head of the profession in this State and country. It is an opinion in which many agree with him; and what is certain is that he is a gentleman of an immensely prosperous practice. I should be willing to exchange my revenues for his. If his income is not larger than that of the whole Old Bachelor family I am very much mistaken.

Now Coke Oaks, Esquire, must have all kinds of friends, agents—what say? what say? as poor old George the Third used to exclaim—I mean runners, puffers—toadies. All such men have. All kings have courtiers. Is it Canute or Coke Oaks, Esquire, it is the same thing. "Please your Majesty, the waves will retire at your bidding." "Mr. Oaks, you have only to speak, and your weight of character will settle the whole matter." I seem to hear the same voices, and I am very sure that I am encountering the same spirit. I take up the evening paper and I read that Coke Oaks, Esquire, has returned from his summer vacation, and the profession and the public will be glad to know that this eminent jurist is in the highest possible condition. I read, and I inwardly mark, and I know that the author of the neat little paragraph is T. V. He blows a small horn in advance. He swings the incense-vase like the young deacon whom I saw before the altar in the cathedral. He chin-chins before the illustrious idol. The opinions of Coke Oaks, Esquire, are Tom's opinions. His projects are Tom's plans. His words are Tom's wisdom. He is the marrow of Tom's bones, and it is a dreary and disgusting reflection.

Coke Oaks, Esquire, invests large sums of money in the Sewer and Refuse Association, and all the papers begin to celebrate its excellences, and to promise enormous dividends upon its stock. Certain journals publish pressing little articles at the request of Thomas Vine—little articles which Tommy Vine has written, and most seriously urged upon his friend the editor. By-and-by his friend the editor discovers that the head of the bar in this country has an enormous interest in the matter, and the feeling with which he regards Thomas Vine is inexpressible. Toad-eating! Why toad-eating? Is it that the idea of such food is the most disgusting of all, and that nothing less odious can adequately suggest the wretched fact of which I am speaking?

Why, Adolphus, I remember when the great Demosthenes delivered the oration at the annual clam-bake of the Company of Chowder-Heads. There is no guild, no society, of a prouder name or a more illustrious history, and this was the millennial anniversary of the association. The attendance was extraordinary. The music was glorious; but the discourse—my dear Adolphus, the great Demosthenes was, not to equivocate, drunk. Now it makes no difference to a worshiper that the idol is a brute, and the genuine toady shines only the brighter under adverse circumstances. When the oration was ended the orator went to a little meeting of admirers and made a maudlin speech. But his Vine—I forget his name, fortunately—stood by him with open mouth of admiration and ready hand of applause, and no human being was ever in a more mortifying position. In him we were all humiliated, and in his toadying we all fell down.

Why, what is Coke Oaks, Esquire, that little Tom Vine should crawl upon his belly before him? Is it a genuine admiration of his character and his powers? Is it a true affection for that man? Is it the magnetic charm of his manner, the winning tenderness of his heart? Is he in a manner in love with Coke Oaks? If this be so how gladly I should watch the young man and cheer him in his course; how warmly I should say to him, "Tom, you are a good fellow, and your admiration for a true and noble heart shows your own nobility." But I find that Coke Oaks's clerks and young students have no such feeling. They say that he is a pinch and a grind and a screw. They declare that they would gladly snub him if they dared. I learn that he constantly squeezes down their wages, and is so disagreeable that they hate to see him come into the office. Now I think you may judge the character of a General from the feeling of his army. If they love him so that they will follow him into any peril he is a man worth loving. If they cordially dislike him there is something wrong in the man.

Upon inquiry I find that the secret of Tom's toadying of Coke Oaks, Esquire, is his money—nothing more. If there should come a great earthquake to-morrow and engulf Oaks and all his fortunes, I am afraid our friend Tom would be stretching out toward another support. It is not, therefore, the man that he clings to, but only the man's wealth; and that shows you, my dear Adolphus, the difference between true hero-worship and toad-eating. The last is not a lower form of the first; it is essentially different, as different as meanness from manliness. When I see the steady and tender regard of Primus for Belisarius—old Belisarius, very poor, very blind, very forlorn now, yet who but a few years ago was the very favorite of fortune—when I see Primus as faithful now as ever he was, I think of the touching Bible story; I think of the sweet tale of Ruth, but with even a softer and more pathetic beauty. Tom Vine also used to eat the dinners of Belisarius and sun himself in his pleasant fortune. Doesn't he know that every body sees and despises his sycophancy? Doesn't he know that he is really what an actual bondman is theoretically—a chattel, a slave?

"I am Tommy Tinker's dog, whose dog are you?" I am Coke Oaks, Esquire's man, whose man are you? That is the question of which Tommy Vine, hurrying after his patron, is the mere interrogation point. My dear Adolphus, be your own man. Expunge the word patron from your book of life. Beggars may have patrons, not sound, self-supporting men. I am not the patron of my shoemaker, for I pay him an honest price for honest work, and that is what I used to demand for myself in the days when I called myself a lawyer. Here is our old acquaintance Tilbury. He drives I-don't-know-how-many-in-hand—Mrs. Tilbury crushes every body with her diamonds and her various glories. Tilbury thinks trades-people are very much his debtors because he patronizes them. Let Tilbury touch his hat obsequiously to me then, for I yesterday bought a bill of exchange of him to send to my sister traveling abroad. I am your patron, Tilbury—hats off!

Spew out the whole thing, Adolphus. Look at Tom Vine and be warned. Be yourself, not somebody else's man or shadow. Sell your honest work, your honest service, not yourself. Then we shall have a community of men, and not of toads—or of toadies. Again I say to you, as I say good-by, eat humble-pie as often as you find it necessary, and be grateful for such a medicament; but do not forget that under no circumstances whatever is it necessary to eat toads.

Your well-wisher,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW MUSIC.

WE would call the attention of our musical readers to the following pieces of new music published by the well-known house of WILLIAM HALL & SON, 543 Broadway, New York.

"Tis but a little Word." Ballad composed by ARTHUR W. HAWTHORN. Price 35 cents. One of those sweet, plaintive songs, which go directly to the heart.

"Bright Stars that shine above." Ballad, with English and German words. Composed by CHARLES FRADEL. Price 35 cents. One of FRADEL's best songs, and is already a great favorite in our musical circles.

"Oh, ye pretty twinkling Stars!" A very pleasing song by CHARLES HENRY. Price 35 cents. Sung nightly at BRYANT'S Minstrels, with immense applause.

"Prayer at Sea." Nocturne by J. de JASIEUSKI. Price 50 cents. This is one of the most beautiful nocturnes ever published. Easy and very melodious, and will be immensely popular.

"Magic Spell." Romance by FRANCIS H. BROWN, author of "Pride Polka," etc. Price 60 cents. An easy, beautiful, and graceful composition.

"Barbe Bleue" Lancers. By JULIUS BERNSTEIN. Price 60 cents.

"Barbe Bleue" Galop. By ADOLPH BERNSTEIN. Price 50 cents.

These are two of the best arrangements from OFFENBACH's popular opera "Blue Beard," introducing the best airs, and are well adapted for dancing.

"Rejoui." Polka Mazourka by PAUL STEIN-

HAGEN. Price 50 cents. Capital dancing Mazourka, and already very popular.

Our friends throughout the country who wish to procure very choice selections of music should send for the catalogue of WILLIAM HALL & SON, 543 Broadway, New York. Any of the above pieces will be sent by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the marked prices.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

WINTER CLOAKS.

CLOAKS for the winter, as we have said before, are designed to serve as the outer garments of costumes, consequently we advise the reader when selecting a cloak to consider the color of the skirts with which it is to be worn. This consideration makes black cloaks serviceable and fashionable, as they may be worn with skirts of any color, while cloths of high colors are objectionable, because they will not blend harmoniously with more than one or two shades.

It is in the smaller details of trimming rather than in shape that the endless variety is made in cloaks. Two leading styles are seen at all the best houses, viz.: the polonaise, or paletot, with a belt, and the basquine with loose fronts and tight corsage back, the fullness of the panier skirt added at the belt. Coat-sleeves, small at the wrist, are universal. The polonaise requires a slender figure with tapering waist, on account of the fullness under the belt caused by gathering thickly wadded materials. The close-fitting basquine is adapted to full figures. Capes of various shapes and depths, usually to the elbows, are worn with both styles. Narrow-shouldered persons seek the appearance of breadth given by the small pelerine cape of the cloak material, while the broad-shouldered wear pointed hoods on cloth, or lace over-capes on velvet. An ingenious modiste makes a pretty hood of the round-cornered thread lace veils, now out of fashion, by fastening the top to the neck of the cloak, and gathering the edges toward the centre by an elastic cord run through the border. When ornamented with Renaissance bows of satin, this forms an elegant and economical finish for a velvet cloak.

The panier puff is seen on many velvet cloaks. Cloth is more frequently caught up with pleats in the Camargo style. Immense bows, pleated loops, like fans, and puffed ends hanging from the back of the belt, give the Grecian bend tournure without the aid of the torturing straps, said to be worn for this purpose. Long broad sashes make any cloak look old-fashioned and dowdy.

The Watteau polonaise, illustrated on another page, is largely imported. It is a most stylish garment for a tall, erect figure, but the round-shouldered should beware of it, as the broad fold in the back increases this in appearance. The Louis XV. basquine, more youthful and dressy, is similar to the Watteau, differing only in having the fold begin lower in the back, and being caught up in a panier puff. The Camargo, represented in the engraving, is the best choice for stout figures. Mantillas of satin, velvet, and cashmere, with round backs and long square fronts, are worn by elderly ladies. The scarf baschlik, described in former papers, is more youthful. A style to be commended is a talma, slightly shaped to the figure, held at the waist by a belt under the cape. The front continues in long ends that are fastened low down behind like a sash. The skirt of a long dress may be drawn out in a puff over these ends, thus forming a panier, and adapting a house dress for the street.

MATERIALS.

Heretofore the choice in cloakings was limited to velvet, cloth, and fur. This season lighter materials, such as satin, faille, and cashmere, thickly wadded and interlined with flannel, are shown as novelties among French cloaks. A sleeved bodice made of thin silk, wadded and quilted, is worn under these cloaks—a comfortable device for people who suffer with cold, but designed by the French to give that embonpoint which they consider so desirable.

The blue-black velvet is more fashionable than the dead black. In buying velvet for a cloak, remember that the twenty-eight-inch width cuts to greatest advantage. The best Lyons velvet is the Ponson brand. It is not affected by water, and the pile is so close that it is not crushed when pressed against the back of a chair or pew. $16 a yard is the price. Yard-wide velvet of the same quality costs $25, and the additional width is of little service in cutting a cloak. The seventy-two-inch Ponson is $50 a yard. German velvet, all pure silk, but with lighter pile, is sold in the three-quarter width at from $10 to $14. A twenty-inch velvet, used in making jackets and for trimming, is from $5 to $8.

The serviceable tricot beaver is not a new cloth, but it retains its popularity despite the advent of novelties. It has a ribbed surface, which is scarcely perceptible in the finer qualities, becoming merely a waved thread, but is plainly defined in coarser goods. It is a yard and a half wide, ranging from $3 to $8. Two yards and three-eighths are required for a paletot with cape. Heavy castor beaver is smooth, glossy, and more expensive than tricot, but we do not commend it as it is stiff and unyielding, and consequently cold. Many French cloaks are of the thick Esquimaux beaver, weighty and warm, a smooth outer surface with rough nap inside. Soft pliable chinchilla beaver, with short, curled fleece, and the velvet meltons are shown in high colors—garnet, mulberry, purple, and green. A black velvet cloth without lustre is desirable for mourning cloaks. $9 a yard.

There are excellent imitations of fur, seal, and Astrakhan sold at prices ranging from $9 to $20. These can scarcely be told from the genuine article, but we do not advise their purchase for the reason that we deprecate all imitations. The same money is better spent in a tricot beaver, which is all that it professes to be. Moreover, these shaggy clothes are not durable. The long fleece is woven into a coarse, sleazy fabric, and with very little wear the fleece falls out, leaving a thread-bare surface. The same thing is true of plush with very long pile.

The basket-woven cloths, white grounds with scarlet or blue spots, are chosen for children—$6 a yard. Three-fourths of a yard makes a short, loose sacque. The white velvet cloth, half an inch thick, soft, and pliable, is quoted for opera cloaks at $9 a yard, double width. A silky plush of immaculate whiteness is $18. An article called racket cloth, like a heavy opera flannel, is sold for breakfast jackets at $4, and the heavy corduroys for the same purpose cost $2 a yard, and are three-fourths wide.

TRIMMING.

The handsomest velvet cloaks, costing $400 or $500, are almost covered with thread-lace, or are bordered with sable or chinchilla. Velvet muffs trimmed to match accompany these. Berthas, Watteau drapery, bretelles, and rosettes with looped ends at the throat and back are of the finest Chantilly. Lower priced velvets, the cheapest we have seen, costing $90, are trimmed with satin bows, chenille or netted fringe, leaf passementerie, a row of alternate loops of satin and faille, or a pleated faille frill, raveled at the edge to form fringe. The value of these garments is in their stylish fit. A simple and elegant trimming is the diagonal pleating illustrated in this Number, made of satin edged with velvet. Another good style is a box-pleated frill of faille four inches wide, cut straight, and raveled half an inch on each edge. This is around the wrist and elbow. A ruche of the same is on the neck, with large bows on the shoulder sides of the skirt, and the back of the belt. Thick ruches of satin, faille, and velvet about the neck of French cloaks are worn in lieu of furs, which are said to be losing favor with the fickle Parisiennes.

Fringe and faille are the favorite trimmings for cloth. Satin is restricted to velvet. Handsome netted fringe, very full, with heavy trellised heading costs from $5 to $12 a yard. Chenille fringe, each strand tipped with satin, is $4. Wide tassel fringe, each tassel long and full but distinct, costs $8. The novel fringe made of quill shavings, solid black, or in well blended shades, costs $3 or $4, according to the width. Leaves and vines of passementerie for heading lace and fringe are made of satin braids or cords without jet, at prices ranging from $1 25 a yard to $5. Pointed-serve braid is shown for cloth cloaks. Rosettes of passementerie, with long tassels pendent in the centre, are looped with cords for fastening cloaks. Similar ornaments are on the shoulder and sides of skirt. Buttons and button-holes on a faced slip are concealed in front.

Russian lamb, Astrakhan, and Angora fringe are used to trim cloth and cashmere. A pinked ruche of cashmere is in good taste.

LENGTH AND PRICES.

The added length prophesied for cloaks is not evident. A very long garment would appear clumsy with a short dress. Fancy French cloaks, of course, bring fancy prices, but we have seen cloth garments at $50 made here in good style. Thirty-five dollars buys a tricot paletot trimmed with several rows of satin braid or with very good fringe. The handsomest cloth cloak costs $180.

MODELS.

A Camargo of black velvet is lined with white satin. The skirt is caught in pleats at the side disclosing the lining at the edges. A frill of pleated faille surrounds the garment. Bows on the sides and shoulders. Belt of folds of faille with a large pleated fan-shaped bow at the back. Price $200.

A regular Watteau of Lyons velvet is trimmed with Chantilly lace set on the velvet above the edge with a heading of passementerie. On the top of the back fold is a passementerie rosette from which fall three tassels reaching below the waist. The wide lace is gathered around the wrist and elbow, and arranged on the waist in the square Pompadour style. Price $250.

A half Watteau or Louis XV. polonaise has the fold behind beginning low on the back, forming a panier puff. The belt of satin folds passes under the Watteau fold. The edge of the garment is untrimmed. Renaissance bows of satin form bretelles. Larger bows are on the wrist and sides of the skirt. Price $250.

Another of velvet with panier puff is for a young blonde. The waist is close fitting, with a pointed jacket frill pleated over the puff. The trimming is a two-inch band of chinchilla.

For elderly ladies we noted an elegant velvet mantilla round behind and square in front, shirred at the back and held in to the figure. A fall of Chantilly lace almost covers the back. Wide lace and passementerie around the edge. Large rosettes and tassels. Price $350. One of the most distinguished looking garments is a black satin mantilla lined with white satin beautifully quilted. A gathered flounce edged with lace is the trimming. The small hood is lined with white satin. The back is caught up in the centre with a rosette and ends. Fancy pockets in the square fronts. Price $150. A short Assyrian paletot is half velvet half satin. The side bodies are covered with satin and ornamented with appliqué embroidery.

In cloth goods we saw a handsome purple velvet beaver, with a sash hanging from the back of the neck to simulate the Watteau fold. The simple trimming is two cross-cut bands of faille piped with satin. Four passementerie rosettes down the centre of the sash. The front is in revers. This is a loose unbelted garment.

A black beaver is a shaped talma with ends to support the skirt of the dress in a puff. Gentlemen call this the Grecian bend cloak. Trimmed with faille and fringe, in very good style, it is sold for $55. An imported cloak of invisible green cloth of this Grecian bend shape is trimmed with braid and fringe, and marked $125. A jaunty mousquetaire jacket of bear's-ear garnet cloth is short, lapped on the breast, and trimmed with satin braid à la militaire. Price $45.

CARRIAGE WRAPS AND OPERA CLOAKS.

The carriage wraps in general use are the plaid circulars and burnouses mentioned before. Four and a quarter yards of double-width plaid make a double circular with hood. This appears to be a large quantity, but even more than this is sometimes necessary to make the plaids fit when joined together. The graceful burnous requires a yard and three-eighths of double-width goods. This is cut in two down the centre fold and sewed together at the ends. The seam is concealed in the Arab fold at the back. White plush striped with scarlet or with orange is made in the same way, trimmed with llama tassels and fringe.

A few sacques with wide sleeves, or with full sabot sleeve, held by a band near the wrist, are shown for opera, but these are troublesome to get off and on at an entertainment, and circulars and burnouses are preferred.

A blue cashmere burnous has a silver bullion fringe headed with embroidery in silver. Tassels of blue and silver combined are at the point of the Arab fold and in front. A scarlet merino baschlik has the hood deeply pointed, and trimmed with straw braid and fringe. Price $35. A circular for a bride is of white satin trimmed with ermine. A more youthful style is white merino, ornamented with rosettes of faille and satin. A white plush circular, with long pointed ends to be thrown over the shoulder like a burnous, has the gay Roman stripes for a border, and a drop fringe of gilt bells that jingle with every motion of the wearer. Price $135.

SHAWLS.

India shawls have new waving designs in the border, and gorgeous colors rather than the quiet subdued hues hitherto considered essential. In real India cashmere Magenta, white, and Metternich green are blended with fine effect, and are not thought too striking and pronounced because the material is fine, and the black and dark brown dresses with which such shawls are worn admit a gay wrapping.

Scarlet centres are most fashionable for square shawls with borders, black for the long shawls when filled up. A Calcutta bordered shawl at $200 is very handsome. Those made up in New York may be sold as low as $75. Striped India shawls for extra carriage wrap, shopping, and traveling are from $50 to $200. They make very comfortable Afghans, and endure any amount of wear.

A marvelous imitation of cashmere shawls has been introduced this season. The color and design represent India shawls perfectly. But after all it is only an imitation, and the $75 expended for it will buy a handsome Paisley that none need hesitate to wear. For a stylish, serviceable wrapping, economical, and that will last for a generation, we recommend a handsome French cashmere. Those sold at prices varying from $45 to $75 are well filled up with the brocaded borders and small scarlet centres. A white Paisley with gray centres is in favor with old ladies. $40 or $50 buys a good quality of long Paisley shawl. A long broché cashmere for country use, at $25, is in as good size and pattern, though not so fine material, as the cashmeres sold for $200. Plaid and striped long shawls, at $9, are stylishly worn as scarfs, the end thrown over the left shoulder.

PERSONAL.

THE distinguished German tragedienne, Madame VON BERNDOERFF, has come to America in the wake of RISTORI and JANASCHKE, and will appear in her most successful rôles this winter at the German Stadt Theatre of New York. Madame VON BERNDOERFF is considered one of the most gifted dramatic artists in Europe. After winning brilliant triumphs at the Imperial theatre of Russia and royal theatres of Berlin and Hanover, and a handsome fortune withal, she retired from the stage some time since; but has been tempted to return to it by a call from the United States, where we hope she will reap a golden harvest both of laurels and coin.

SAXE continued to make puns, the last having struggled out of him on board a steamer, where he met a lively young lady to whom he made himself agreeable. Of course he made an impression upon the damsel, who said at parting, "Good-by, Mr. SAXE. I fear you'll soon be forgetting me." "Ah, Miss," replied the many times defeated candidate for Governor of Vermont, "if I was not a married man already, you may be sure I'd be for getting you."

Mr. DISRAELI is of a family notably long-lived. His mother and his grandmother both attained a good old age; his father died at eighty-one; his grandfather at ninety. The family became English denizens in 1748; and the present Prime Minister's grandfather, to use his own words, was "an Italian descendant of one of those Hebrew families whom the Inquisition forced to emigrate from the Spanish peninsula at the end of the fifteenth century, and who found a refuge in the more tolerant territories of the Venetian Republic."

The SULTAN OF TURKEY, though his paper has been under protest for over a year past on army account, is constantly building new and beautiful palaces, and living at a grand old rate. His yacht, just arrived from the makers in England, is said to be the finest bit of naval elegance and luxury afloat. The cabin fittings cost a million of dollars. The Sultan is greatly feared by the people. He raises all his favorites to power. The general of the army was formerly a sergeant in the Austrian army (from which the rogue deserted!).

A romance in little is told of Mlle. LUZGEL, a pretty French actress at St. Petersburg, and how ingeniously she was "popped" to by Prince Tolstoy, a wealthy young Russian nobleman. The lady was presiding over one of the tables at a fair held for the benefit of a hospital. The Prince, wishing to do a little something for benevolence, banteringly asked her how much she would take for a kiss. She glanced at him rather sternly, and replied that she would not kiss any man but her betrothed. The Prince passed on, but returned to Mlle. LUZGEL's stand a quarter of an hour afterward, and said, rather thoughtfully, to the young actress, "Will you permit me to ask you another question, Mademoiselle?" "With pleasure, Sir." "Have you a betrothed?" She eyed him a moment in surprise, and said then, with a blush and smile, "No, Sir." "Would you like to have one?" "That depends on circumstances," said she, laughing. "Well, then, would you take me?" So saying, he handed her his card. She was greatly astonished, and finally stammered out she would give him an answer next day. On the following morning he called at her house, the reply was in the affirmative, and to-day Mlle. LUZGEL is a Princess and a happy wife. And thus the Bazar presents what is usually elaborated into a volume. Much better this way.

A new style of "cigar-girl" has appeared in Moscow, in the person of the Princess KOZIOSKY, who is very beautiful; but the paternal noble having lost all his rubles and real estate, the young daughter comes to the rescue, and proposes to secure "the comforts of a happy home" (as the boarding-house advertisements say) by retailing "conchas," "cabanas," and such to the young males of that old Russian city.

It is reported in German papers that although nominally Mrs. LINCOLN has gone to Germany for the purpose of having her son educated there, she intends to make that country her permanent residence. Her income would enable her to live very comfortably at Frankfort-on-the-Main, and as the widow of an ex-President she would be received with the utmost respect by the rulers and nobility of the continent.

A gentleman with a fondness for connubial statistics has ferreted out the fact that the age at which several people of a certain degree of celebrity were married is as follows: Adam and Eve, 0; Shakespeare, 18; Ben Jonson, 21; Franklin, 24; Dante, Kepler, Fuller, Johnson, Burke, Scott, 26; Tycho Brahe, Byron, Washington, and Bonaparte, 27; Penn and Sterling, 28; Linnaeus and Nelson, 29; Burns, 30; Chaucer, Hogarth, and Peel, 32; Woodworth and Davy, 33; Sir William Jones and Wellington, 37; Wilberforce, 38; Luther, 42; Addison, 44; Wesley and Young, 47; Swift, 49; Buffon, 55; Old Parr, last time, 120.

Ex-President FILLMORE, the halest and heartiest of the ex-Presidents, is on his usual autumnal visit to town, and is made much of by people who like to have their ex-President to dinner, etc., etc. His wife—excellent lady—is with him.

Those CLAFLIN people, of Massachusetts, are not only solid, able men, but are not to be obstructed on the political highway. Last year while Mr. WILLIAM CLAFLIN was Lieutenant-Governor, his father, LEE CLAFLIN, was a member of the Senate. The former will be chosen Governor at next election, and if the latter should be returned to the Senate, as is probable, the spectacle will be presented for the first time in Massachusetts of a son occupying the highest office in the State, while the father fills a seat in the highest branch of the Legislature.

Good thing to be leading editor in Russia, such as KATOFF, the "chief" of the Moscow Gazette, who receives a salary of ten thousand silver rubles and lives in a house which the proprietors of the paper have placed at his disposal. Next to the Emperor he is considered the most influential man in Russia.

The elder BOOTH had a broken nose. A lady once remarked to him, "I like your acting, Mr. BOOTH, but, to be frank with you, I can't get over your nose." "No wonder, Madam," replied he, "the bridge is gone."

The Rev. Mr. PUNSHON, whose lecture on "Daniel in Babylon," recently delivered at the Academy of Music, has been made the subject of so much commendation, is said to have made a fortune by his lectures, but not for himself. He has always given the lion's share of the proceeds to benevolent and religious objects. His disinterested life, indeed, and his unostentatious liberality, have done as much as the charms of his elocution and the eloquence of his discourses to endear him to his countrymen, and to the church which he so signally serves and honors. After enumerating a series of benefactions which Mr. PUNSHON had showered on struggling churches and local charities, an English paper says that "it is impossible to speak too warmly of his unselfishness and generosity. In 1862, seeing the poor accommodation provided by Wesleyans in several popular watering-places, he undertook to raise within five years, by lecturing and personal solicitation, the sum of ten thousand pounds in aid of a fund for the erection of chapels in those places. Every thing seemed against the project. The cotton famine and the financial panic occurred, his own health failed; and beside this nearly £200,000 were raised in the period for the Missionary Jubilee. Yet the promise was fulfilled. Such manifold labors, however, nearly broke down his health." Mr. PUNSHON, still refusing to lecture for his own benefit, is to speak in Boston during the next month, the proceeds to be divided between a city charity and the erection of a college in Canada.

When Mr. GEORGE W. CHILDS, of the Philadelphia Ledger, came on to New York to make his debut on board a Cunard steamer for Liverpool, he was accompanied by a car-load of the wealth, wit, taste, and enterprise of that city, so famous for Godey, MORTON M'MICHAEL, Girard College, Independence Hall, and Quakers. Mr. CHILDS is now a carpet-bagger in Europe.

Well-bred English and Scotch women are usually good horse-women, but we were not aware until now that the Scotch ladies are experts with the rod and line. At a fishing party at Gordon Castle, on the Spey, the COUNTESS OF SANDWICH killed a grilse weighing seven pounds; Lady CAROLINE LENNOX landed a salmon weighing seventeen pounds; and Lady FLORENCE LENNOX caught another weighing twenty-three pounds.

Lamp Mat in Application.

MATERIALS: colored cloth, silk twist, pasteboard, etc. This pretty lamp mat is made in mosaic of single pieces of colored cloth, which are embroidered in point russe with colored silks and sewed on over one another. The middle part and the scallops on the outer edge are of black cloth. The scallops are cut into points; the points which begin from the centre are of red, and the others of white cloth. For making cut from Fig. 60 of the Supplement (which gives one-sixth part) a circular piece of white percale, and draw on this the design given on Fig. 60. Then cut the middle part, as also the points and scallops of the design, of paper, paste these pieces of paper to the under side of the cloth of the color desired, and cut out the cloth. The contour must be preserved very particularly. Next paste these pieces fast to the percale foundation. The pieces are now cross-stitched on the outer edge, the black with blue, the red with yellow, and the white with brown silk. For the remaining embroidery, which may be worked from the illustration and design, choose bright colors according to the taste.

Fig. 2.—STOPPER COVER IN APPLICATION.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XVIII, Fig. 61.

Two Stopper Covers in Application.

MATERIALS: pieces of cloth of different colors—as black, white, red, and blue; silk twist in green, yellow, blue, black, and red.

These covers are arranged over corks, on the circular pieces of pasteboard an inch and a quarter in diameter. This pasteboard prevents the cover from coming against the stopper. Both cork and pasteboard are covered with red cloth. On Fig. 1 the largest pieces are of violet cloth; the little twig is of white cloth and green and yellow silk. The tabs which fall over in imitation of feathers are of black cloth, and the embroidery on them in herring-bone stitch of red and yellow silk. Above these is placed a circular piece of blue cloth scalloped on the edges, and embroidered in point russe with black and yellow silk. In the centre is a small rosette and handle of crystal beads. The tassels are of red, black, and green silk twist. Figs. 62 and 63 of the Supplement give the pattern and design.

Fig. 2.—The tabs of this stopper cover are alternately of red and white cloth. The figures are embroidered on the white pieces with green and red, and on the red pieces with white and blue silk. The chain and herring-bone stitches are also worked with silks in different colors. The ends of the tabs are furnished with either red or blue gretots and a few black beads. The remainder of the cover is made like the previous one, but a ruche of blue silk is arranged around the edges of the upper piece. Fig. 61 of the Supplement gives the pattern of the tab and the design.

Sofa Pillow.

MATERIALS: green and red zephyr wool, red cashmere, gray lining, horse-hair, wadding or flax, red worsted cord, red worsted tassels.

The outside of the pillow, Fig. 1, consists of lozenges or diamond-shaped figures, which are of gray wool worked in ribbed crochet stitch, edged with red wool and joined in the manner shown by the illustration. The spaces are of violet cashmere. The original is twenty inches long and eighteen inches around. Begin each lozenge with a foundation of two stitches, passing over the last of these, work 1 sc. (single crochet) in the first, then turn the work, after a ch. (chain stitch) work 2 sc., putting the needle through the back vein of the stitch. Continue in this manner, always adding one stitch at the end of each round till the lozenge counts ten stitches, after which work the second half, narrowing one stitch at the end of each round.

Having completed the requisite number of lozenges, border each of them with a row of single crochet in red wool, in doing which work the long stitches which come between the ribs by putting the needle deeper through the crochet work. Join the corners at the same time when the edge is being worked.

For the ends arrange nine lozenges in a star in the manner shown by the illustration. The points of the star must come on the corners of the lozenges of the outer stripe. For the foundation make a pillow of the gray lining, filling it with wadding, flax, or horse-hair, and sew in end pieces. Cover this with red cashmere and afterward with the crochet cover. A heavy red worsted cord with tassels serves for hanging the pillow over the back of the sofa. Fig. 3 gives another manner of working a lozenge for the pillow. This is worked in Tunisian crochet stitch with gray wool, and is also begun on a corner, edged with single crochet of red silk twist, and embroidered in point russe with silk of the same color.

Cover for Sofa Pillow.

THE knotted stitch is a new and pretty style of Berlin work, and is easily executed. Before making the knots work a foundation diagonally in the manner shown by Fig. 2, which also shows the manner of working the knots. In doing this put the needle from underneath up through a hole of the canvas, wind the thread once around the needle in the manner shown by the illustration, turn the needle, following the direction of the arrow, and put it back through the same hole. The thread must not be drawn too tight, and the knots must be worked regularly. Fig. 3 shows the design. Having worked the diagonally-wrought foundation in light gray, work the knots of the leaves and stems in yellow and bluish green, and those of the foundation in light gray. The pillow may be enlarged by making the foundation larger.

See illustrations on page 869.

THESE trimmings, etc., are designed for the cloaks given in this Number. Fig. 1 is a section of the trimming of the Sylphide paletot. It is made of satin with lustrous lining. The strips are cut straight of the same material as the cloak, and are stitched on each side, pleated, and finished with a narrow bias fold along the middle.

Fig. 2 shows a trimming made of a strip three inches wide pleated diagonally, and another one pleated straight. The two strips are fastened together with a bias fold.

Fig. 3 shows the section of a cloak trimming. This consists of a satin strip, which is stitched on with four cords, and forms the binding at the same time. The illustration shows the manner in which the cord is stitched down.

Fig. 3.—EMBROIDERY PATTERN FOR SOFA PILLOW COVER.

Fig. 4 shows the manner of sewing in a double cord, which is much used for the edge of cloaks. It requires a bias strip about an inch and a half wide, in which is sewed two cords in the manner shown by the illustration. The edge of the cloak is stitched over the edges of the cord.

Figs. 5 and 6 show the manner of arranging piping of different colored satin. Double the first bias strip through the middle, sew fast to this one edge of the second bias strip, and hem down the other edge. Fig. 5 shows the right side, and Fig. 6 the wrong side of the trimming.

Figs. 7 and 8 show the manner of binding a button-hole. In cloaks of heavy material the button-holes are bound with silk or satin instead of being worked in the ordinary manner. Fig. 8 shows how this is done. For each edge take a bias strip about an inch wide and of the requisite length. Sew the strip along the edge, after which turn it over, putting the stuff through the button-hole, where it is sewed down on the wrong side without allowing the stitches to show on the right side. Finish the ends with a few button-hole stitches. Fig. 7 shows the button-hole completed.

Fig. 9.—This illustration shows the manner of sewing on a button-hole strip. Many cloaks are so fastened that the buttons and button-holes are not visible. In order to do this a button-hole strip is sewed on the under side. The buttons are either sewed on the left front or on a piece of the material set on underneath for that purpose. Make the button-hole strip of a piece of silk double and lined with some heavy material; work the button-holes, and sew the strip to the cloak along the ends and the inner side. The front edge is left loose, but the strip is fastened with a band between each button-hole. The illustration shows the strip reduced in size.

Fig. 10 shows a loop made of two colors in the manner shown by Figs. 5 and 6. The loop is fastened to the cloak by means of a button covered with satin. The trimming of the Servian paletot consists in part of such loops.

Fig. 11 shows a strip of stuff arranged in such a manner as to serve at the same time for trimming and binding a cloak. In this case lay the edges over in the manner shown by the illustration, and stitch it down on the cloak, after which turn the other side over the edge and hem it down on the under side. If it be desired for trimming alone stitch down only the upper side.

Fig. 4.—This lace is crocheted crosswise as follows: Work 12 ch., join these in a ring by means of 1 sl., and work 13 sc. in the following eight stitches of the ring (the remaining 4 ch. remain free). Then crochet close on this a second ring composed of 12 ch., work 6 sc. in the first four of these, then 8 ch., and returning, 1 sl. in the middle stitch of the first scallop. Then crochet 13 sc. in the next 8 ch., after this 7

sc. in the next 4 ch. of the second scallop; close on this work another ring composed of 12 ch., crochet 6 sc. in the following 4 ch. of these, then 8 ch., and returning, 1 sl. in the middle stitch of the next scallop to the right, then passing over 12 sc. work 6 sc. in the following four of the 8 ch., again 8 ch., and returning, 1 sl. in the middle stitch of the scallop at the right. After this, 13 sc. in the next 8 ch., 7 sc. in the 4 ch., still free of the following scallop, 6 sc. in the next 4 ch. of the next scallop. The edging has now reached its full width, and is continued in the same manner.

Fig. 5.—This edging consists of alternated cross treble stitches which are crocheted crosswise. The edge is finished by a picot row.

Fig. 6.—This edging is worked lengthwise in two rounds as follows: 1st round.—* 14 ch., passing over the last two of these, work in the twelve following each 1 dc., but each of these dc. stitches is only half crocheted, retaining the last loop on the needle, and finally finish the loops on the needle by working them off, drawing the thread through all at once; draw the thread tightly, and crochet 2 ch., then 1 sl. in the stitch before the last of the two stitches which were passed over of the fourteen, putting the needle through from the back of the stitch. Repeat from *. On the straight side of this round crochet an open-work row of dc., referring to the pattern.

Figure 7.—1st round.—On a foundation of the requisite length work alternately 1 dc., 1 ch., passing over 1 foundation stitch. 2d round.—1 dc. in the following dc. of the former round, * five picots, each composed of 5 ch.

and 1 sl. in the first of the five, 1 dc. in the previously-worked dc. of this round, 2 dc. separated by 2 ch., in the third following dc. of the former round.

Fig. 8.—For this lace make a foundation of the requisite length, and crochet on this: 1st round.—* 2 sc. in the following two foundation stitches, 2 ch., passing over two foundation stitches. 2d round.—1 stc. in the second of the next 2 sc. of the former round, * 2 ch., 1 stc. in the same stitch in which was worked the preceding stc., 1 stc. in the second of the following 2 stc. of the former round. 3d round.—1 stc. in the first stc. of the former round, 2 ch., * 2 sc. in the next 2 stc., 2 ch., passing over two stitches. 4th round is like the 3d, but the single crochet stitches fall on the single crochet stitches of the former round. 5th round.—1 stc. in the first stc. of the former round, 2 ch., pass over two stitches, work two stitches in the next 2 stc. of the former round, 3 ch., * 1 stc. in the following stc., 5 ch., 1 stc. in the next stc. of the former round, pass over two stitches, 1 stc. in the following stc., 5 ch., 1 stc. in the next stc., 3 ch., passing over two stitches, 2 sc. in the following 2 stc.; then for the twig in a point work 7 ch., 1 stc. in the third of the 7 ch., 5 ch., 1 stc. again in the third of the 7 ch., then 6 ch., 1 dc. in the second of the 6 ch., 4 ch., 1 stc. also in the second of the 6 ch., 8 ch., 1 stc. again in the second of the 6 ch., 4 ch., 1 dc. in the second of the 6 ch., 4 ch., 1 sl. also in the second of the 6 ch., then 2 ch., 1 stc. in the third of the 7 ch., at the beginning of the twig, 5 ch., 1 stc. again in the third of the 7 ch., 5 ch., 1 stc. also in the third of the 7 ch., then 2 ch. This completes a twig. Crochet still 2 sc. in the next 2 stc. of the former round, and 3 ch., passing over two stitches. 6th round.—* 3 sc. in the double crochet figure before the first twig of the former round, and the first of these 3 sc. in the first scallop composed of 5 ch., the second between the 2 dc., and the third in the following scallop of 5 ch., then 3 ch., 1 dc. in the stc. of the first leaf of the next twig, 2 ch., 1 dc. in the next ch.-scallop of the second leaflet, 1 ch., 1 dc. in the following ch.-scallop of the same leaflet, 2 ch., 2 dc. separated by a ch. in the little leaflet at the point of the twig, 4 ch., 2 dc. separated by a ch. in the same leaf, 2 ch., 1 dc. in the next ch.-scallop of the following leaflet, 1 ch., 1 dc. in the following ch.-scallop of the same leaflet, 2 ch., 1 dc. in the stc. of the following leaflet, 3 ch. 7th round.—1 stc. in each stitch of the former round, after every 3 sc. crochet 3 ch. Widen at the point; in the inside of the points the picot of 3 ch. is omitted. Finally, crochet another round like the 7th on the other side of the foundation stitches.

Fig. 9.—This edging is worked partly crosswise and partly lengthwise. Begin with a foundation of six stitches, work a scallop composed of 6 ch., and crochet on the foundation stitches 6 dc., 1 ch., then turn the work, crochet 6 sc. on the 6 dc. then again a scallop of 6 ch., and 6 dc. on the 6 sc. Continue in this manner. Lastly crochet in each chain stitch scallop 4 dc. separated by 1 ch.

Fig. 10.—This edging is worked lengthwise. On a foundation of the requisite length crochet a round as follows: 1 dc. in the first foundation stitch, * 2 ch., 1 dc. in the same foundation stitch, work this stitch off with the following dc., which is worked in the third following foundation stitch. 2d round.—1 sc. in the first stitch of the former round, * 2 leaflets by 3 ch. (the leaflets are worked in the manner as those for the edging, Fig. 2), passing over five stitches of the former round, 1 sc. in the following stitch. 3d round.—* 1 stc. in the first sc. of the former round, 2 ch., 3 sl. in the 3 ch. between two leaflets, 2 ch. 4th round.—* 1 sc. in the first stc. of the former round, 3 ch., 1 dc. in the next sl., 10 ch., 1 dc. in the dc. just worked, 1 dc. in the third sl., 3 ch.

Fig. 11.—This lace is worked lengthwise of fine white thread, and is worked in lace stitch in the manner shown by the illustration. On a foundation of the requisite length crochet: 1st round.—* 3 dc. in the first three foundation stitches, 3 ch., passing over two stitches, 1 sc. in the following foundation stitch, 3 ch., passing over two stitches. 2d round.—In every stitch of the former round work 1 sc. 3d round.—4 sl. in the first 4 sc., * 9 ch., pass over five stitches, 5 sl. in the following five stitches. 4th round.—7 ch., * 3 dc. in the next ch.-scallop, 11 ch. 5th round.—1 sl. in the first of the 7 ch. at the beginning of the round, 5 ch., 1 sc. in the second following ch., 5 ch., * 1 sc. in the middle stitch of the next 3 dc., 5 ch., 1 sc. in the fifth of the 11 ch., 5 ch., 1 sc. in the second following ch., 5 ch. 6th round.—* 1 sc. in the first sc. of the former round; around the next ch.-scallop, 1 sc., 1 dc., 1 dc., 1 picot of 4 ch. and 1 sl. in the first of these, 3 dc., 1 picot as before, 1 dc., 1 dc., 1 sc., then 1 sc. in the next sc. of the former round; after this, on the next sc.-scallop, 1 sc., 1 dc., 1 picot as before, 1 dc., 1 dc., 3 sc., 1 sl. in the next sc. of the former round, then on the following ch.-scallop 3 sc., 1 dc., 1 dc., in working which fasten to the corresponding dc. of the former round, then on the following ch.-scallop 3 sc., 1 dc., 1 dc., in working which fasten to the corresponding dc. of the former scallop, 1 picot, 1 dc., 1 sc. Finally, work the lace stitch in the manner shown by the illustration.

Fig. 12.—This edging is worked crosswise. Begin with a foundation of thirteen stitches and crochet, returning on these, 3 ch., 1 dc. in the second following foundation stitch, then three times alternately 1 ch., passing over one stitch, 1 dc., then 7 ch., 1 sc. in the last foundation stitch. This completes a round. Now turn the work, crochet 7 ch., then 11 dc. in the chain-stitch scallop of the former round, 1 ch., three times alternating 1 dc., 1 ch., the dc. are always crocheted in the next single ch. between 2 dc. of the former round, 1 dc. in the third of the 3 ch. at the beginning of the first round. This completes the second round. Now repeat both rounds till the edging has reached the length desired.

Fig. 13.—Work, first, the middle part of the edging crosswise, as follows: 11 ch. as foundation, then 7 ch., and returning on the foundation 1 dc. in the first foundation stitch, then three times alternating, 1 ch., passing over a foundation stitch, 1 dc., then 6 ch., 1 dc. in the last foundation stitch. * Now turn the work, crochet 3 ch., then 9 dc. in the scallop of 6 ch., again turn the work, crochet 7 ch., 1 dc. in the second following of the 9 dc., then three times more alternately 1 ch., passing over one stitch, 1 dc., then 6 ch., 1 dc. in the third of the 3 ch. before the 9 dc. On the straight side of the edging crochet an open-work round of dc., work 9 dc. in each chain-stitch scallop on the under edge.

Fig. 14.—For working this lace crochet, first, the thick squares singly as follows: make a foundation of 4 ch., join this in a round with 1 sl., and crochet then in each foundation stitch 2 sc., and after this four more rounds sc. In each of these rounds add two stitches four times at regular distances by crocheting always 2 sc. separated by 1 ch. This widening must always come in the same place, by which means the square is formed. Then crochet on two sides of each square (these are the under sides on the illustration), going backward and forward, two rows sc., in the middle of each row, and also on the corner of the square, add always two stitches; lastly, edge each square, in the manner shown by the illustration, with an open-work round of dc. Now join these squares by means of the bars of different lengths which come on the upper sides of the squares. Begin with one of the shortest bars, crochet 4 ch., then 1 sc. in the first of the 2 dc. which were crocheted in the upper corner of the square, then working from left to right back, 3 sl. in the first three of the 4 ch. just worked, always putting the needle in the under vein of the stitch; after this work a bar of the same length in the following dc. of the square. Work the remaining bars by reference to the pattern. In working the two longest bars join the square with the corner of the next square as shown by the illustration. The bars on the under sides of the square are worked in the same manner as those already described, after which edge the under edge with one round chain-stitch scallops. On the upper straight edge of the lace crochet in the manner shown by the illustration one round chain-stitch scallops, one round of cross treble stitch, and, finally, another round chain-stitch scallops. Lastly, crochet a figure in single crochet on each square. From these work five rounds on a foundation of four stitches joined in a round, widening in such a manner that the circular part shall not draw, and after this five rounds narrowing to correspond to the previous widening; in these it must be observed that the wrong side of the work makes the outside of the figure.

KNITTED EDGING.

Fig. 11.—This pretty edging is knitted with fine thread. The thick parts are of alternate embroidered figures and imitation leaflets. Begin the edging, which is worked in backward and forward rounds with a foundation of 11 stitches, and knit for the 1st round.—Slip 1, knit 2, make 1, knit 2 together twisted, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, knit 2. 2d round.—Slip 1, knit 1, purl the remaining stitches. 3d round.—Slip 1, knit 1, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, 1, knit 2 together, knit 2, widen 1, knit 1. 4th round.—Slip 1, knit 3, purl the remaining stitches. 5th round.—Slip 1, knit 2, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, knit 4, widen 1, knit 1. 6th round.—Slip 1, knit 5, purl the remaining stitches. 7th round.—Slip 1, knit 1, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, knit 6, widen 1, knit 1. 8th round.—Slip 1, knit 7, purl the remaining stitches. 9th round.—Slip 1, knit 2, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, knit 5, knit 2 together. 10th round.—Slip 1, knit 5, purl the remaining stitches. 11th round.—Slip 1, knit 1, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, knit 3, knit 2 together. 12th round.—Slip 1, knit 3, purl the remaining stitches. 13th round.—Slip 1, knit 2, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, knit 1, knit 2 together. 14th round.—Slip 1, knit 1, purl the remaining stitches. 15th round.—Slip 1, knit 1, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, knit 1, knit 2 together, make 1, knit 2 together, knit 1. 16th round.—Slip 1, purl the remaining stitches. Now repeat from the 1st round till the edging has reached the length desired. The little figures are worked on nanook in button-hole stitch, cut out and sewed to the edging. The leaflets are worked with enameled cotton in the manner shown by the illustration.

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY;

OR, THE

Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh.

CHAPTER XV.

PROVIDENCE SENDS ME A FRIEND.

DURING my first dismal year at Calcutta the native magistracy of that presidency was chiefly in the hands of a black zemindar, or magistrate, one Govindram Metre, who acted as subordinate of the English zemindar, and deputy during the intervals that frequently occurred between the lapse of one appointment and the commencement of another. It is not to be supposed that a government which depended upon the instructions of a committee at fifteen thousand miles' distance, and was subject to the caprices and often ignorant errors of private individuals, actuated sometimes by private interests, and frequently by private dislikes, could be exempt from abuses; and this frequent change of zemindars, who rarely held the appointment long enough to learn the least of its arduous and numerous duties, was one of the worst among them.

Before Govindram Metre all native causes, civil and criminal, were at this particular period adjudged, in a tribunal entitled the Court of Cutcherry. In common with most Hindoos, his ruling passion was avarice, and his mercy was only to be propitiated by gifts, while his power extended to the dispensation of the lash, fine, and imprisonment. The luckless wretch who had not so much as a handful of pice to offer as tribute could expect but scanty grace from this functionary; and before the first year of my residence was ended I had seen many among my colored comrades writhing under the lashes administered by Govindram's subordinates. I had seen a good deal of the black zemindar, and had heard many scandals concerning the supposed sources of his reputed wealth, when it was my own ill fortune to become subject to his tyranny.

The Hindoo year, which commences in April, was not quite three months old, and the summer solstice was still at its height, when I began to suffer from a low fever resembling that which had chained me to my mattress in the Fleet Lane crimping-house. The damp enervating heat of the Bengal climate was in itself enough to cause sickness among Europeans, who were compelled to labor without regard to the conditions which only render residence in this country tolerable to the foreigner. Joined to this, I suffered from inadequate food, miserable lodging, a fitful indulgence in spirituous liquors, that were only agreeable to me because they enabled me for the moment to forget my wretchedness, and a constant depression of mind, unrelieved even by hope: for the letter of appeal which I had contrived to dispatch to Lady Barbara soon after my arrival was yet unnoticed. It is not to be wondered, then, that my health languished and my strength declined. The repairs of the fortifications, trifling as they were, were not yet complete; for an absolute want of system prevailed at this station, whereby no necessary work was ever finished; and, ill as I was, I was made to perform my share of the arduous labor—now employed in digging the foundations of a wall, now in wheeling barrows of rubbish for the construction of an earth-work.

I was like to have dropped one day under this work, when Sergeant O'Blagg, who was superintending our labors, attacked me with a sudden fury that for the moment well-nigh took away my breath.

"Look at that rascal, now," he cried to a young ensign who was loitering beside him on the curtain above us. "Did your Honor ever see such a lazy vagabone? O'ive had my oi upon him for the last tree days, and devil a bit harder has he worked than ye see him now. Don't dhrag the barrow along like that, ye scoundrel, but put your showlther to it with a will, or oi'll know the raison whoy, ye idle omathawn!"

For the moment I was too weak to answer him.

"Don't you see that the lad's ill?" roared out a voice from the distance (Philip Hay's), while the tawny wretches digging near me looked on and grinned.

"Ill! yes," cried the Sergeant; "he shams ill to skulk his work, the idle beggar!" and, leaping down from the curtain, he ran forward as if about to hit me. But I had just mustered strength to wheel my barrow of rubble to the summit of the mound, and the position of advantage was now mine. "You unconscionable skulk!" roared O'Blagg, shaking his clenched fist at me; "this comes of enlisting a sham gentleman. I might have known you'd make no soldier, and never earn the cost of your passage; and if it hadn't been to oblige a gentleman who wanted to be rid of his step-mother's bastard cousin, I—"

He had no opportunity of finishing the sentence, for anger lent me a spurious kind of strength, and I hoisted my barrow of sand and rubbish aloft, and emptied its contents upon the head of my assailant in a suffocating shower.

A dozen fellows seized and dragged me up to the little terrace on the top of the curtain, where the ensign lolled with folded arms, grinning at his subordinate's discomfiture.

My outrage upon my superior was sufficiently obvious. The ensign, who was about my own age, and obviously amused by O'Blagg's stifled execrations and frantic efforts to get rid of the earth and sand that covered his head and shoulders, felt it nevertheless his duty to punish me.

"Upon my word this is too bad," he said, very mildly; "though that fellow O'Blagg deserves to get into trouble with his long Irish tongue. But insubordination of this kind won't do, you see, my lad; and as the captain's out of the way—in point of fact, so uncommonly cut last night that he can't show to-day; and the senior lieutenant has gone up the country pig-shooting—I think you'd better take him to the Black Hole."

"In irons; ye'll put him in irons, your Honor?" remonstrated O'Blagg, in a suffocated voice.

"Oh, very well, put him in irons if you like," cried the ensign, with a merciful wink at the men, which plainly meant no irons.

On this I was conveyed to the Black Hole, that too famous prison, which I was doomed once again to occupy under circumstances that were to make that occupation distinguished among the darkest records of man's cruelty to the end of time.

The dungeon itself was in no manner alarming of aspect. It was the common prison of the fort, in which European or native delinquent was indiscriminately cast for any military misdemeanor.

I found myself in a square chamber of some twenty feet by eighteen, with two small windows looking westward—a direction from which no breath of air is to be expected during this summer season. To say that the dungeon was somewhat close and airless in the occupation of one person is perhaps to be fastidious; but I would gladly have preferred a more airy apartment for my night's repose; and I lay down in a corner of my cell with a supreme distaste for my strange quarters; though Heaven knows the great barrack chamber where I ordinarily spent my nights with the rest of the private soldiers on a wooden platform was no Sybarite resting-place.

Great God, could I but have conceived the horrid sufferings that were by-and-by to be endured in that very dungeon, what nightmare-visions must have broken my fitful slumbers, what hideous cries and groans must have sounded upon my sleeping sense, prophetic of agonies to come! But this one exquisite anguish of foreknowledge being spared to mankind, my feverish slumbers were undisturbed by painful dreams.

I was awakened soon after daybreak by a jem-mautdaar, or colored sergeant, who came, attended by a couple of peons, to carry me before the Black Zemindar.

To this I immediately objected, as I had been given to understand that the Court of Cutcherry had no authority over Europeans, and was a supreme tribunal only for the subjects of the Mogul. The jem-mautdaar answered with the usual slavish stolidity of these people. He knew nothing except that he had been ordered to convey me before the Black Zemindar. In vain I remonstrated and asked to see the captain or one of the junior officers of my company. The jem-mautdaar was bent on executing his orders, which I afterward discovered he had received from no one but my enemy, Sergeant-major O'Blagg, who enjoyed an extraordinary power in consequence of the prevailing supineness among his superiors.

I was taken to the Cutcherry, and there found myself accused of a murderous outrage upon my superior, with intent to do serious bodily harm; in proof of which Sergeant O'Blagg showed the somewhat inflamed condition of one eye, which had suffered from the shower of rubbish I had discharged upon my enemy's head.

I had seen something of English courts during my brief residence in London, curiosity having led me to Westminster and the Old Bailey on more than one occasion; but although I had there beheld enough to shock my sense of the sacredness of justice, I was completely unprepared for the flagrant iniquity of a tribunal presided over by an almost irresponsible despot. Enough that I, a subject of his Britannic Majesty King George, was condemned to receive a hundred lashes at the hands of a gentoo, whose national skill in the administration of this punishment I had heard and seen too much of. The Mohammedan abhors our British mode of capital punishment by the gallows, and hanging is therefore forbidden by the Mogul; but, on the other hand, the ruler of Delhi has no objection against his subjects being whipped to death, and the gentoo flagellant will lash his victim with a diabolical dexterity, the exhibition of which would have afforded a new sensation to Nero or Caligula.

The sentence was pronounced, and half a dozen black fellows advanced to lay their skinny paws upon my shoulders in order to convey me to the compound or open yard behind the court, where summary justice was to be executed; but as they were in the very act of doing this the sound of a cannon booming across the Ganges arrested them as if spell-bound, while a sudden unnatural stillness fell upon the court.

A Hindoo cooly entered the next moment, and prostrating himself slavishly before the Zemindar, informed him that a British vessel had arrived off Govindpore, and that Mr. Holwell had just landed, having come on to Fort William in a boat.

I had heard of this Mr. Holwell as a civil servant of some importance in the presidency. He had returned to England between two and three years before, there to end his days, as it was supposed, and nothing could have been more unexpected than his reappearance in Bengal.

My eyes happened to wander toward Govindram Metre at this moment, and never did I see terror more vividly painted upon the human countenance. The dusky change which is more ghastly than pallor spread itself over his copper-colored visage; but the man was past-master of all dissimulative arts, and when Mr. Holwell himself, three minutes afterward, came into the court-house, Govindram Metre received him with florid Oriental compliments and servile smiles.

The Englishman accepted these greetings with exemplary coldness.

"What are you doing here, Govindram?" he asked, looking at me; "and how comes a dispute between British soldiers to be submitted to the Cutcherry?"

"If it will please the most distinguished and favored among the deputies of our honorable masters to hear the matter, he will perceive that it is a case of extraordinary character, which called for—"

"Not for your interference, Govindram," interrupted Mr. Holwell. "This young man is a military servant of the Company, and can only be punished in accordance with military law. You ought to have known better, Sergeant, than to bring your complaints here."

Mr. O'Blagg, whose importance shriveled into nothing before this new arrival, muttered some excuse.

"Were they going to flog this young soldier?" asked Mr. Holwell.

The gentoo assented; and Govindram Metre began a rambling justification of his proceedings.

"Upon my life, it is shameful!" cried Mr. Holwell, indignantly. "But it is of a piece with all the rest. The president is absent at his country house, and the five captains of the garrison are asleep under shelter of their mosquito curtains, or away at their sports up the country, and this poor sick lad is brought hither in order that public justice may be prostituted to private malice. Why, the young man looks fitter for a sick-bed than the lash." And then, turning to me, he said, "You are free of this tribunal, but will have to answer to your captain for your offense against the Sergeant-major. Have you been ill?"

"I have been ill of a low fever for the last three weeks," I answered; "but they have made me work all the same, since I have just the strength to crawl about under threat of the lash."

"You shall be put upon the sick-list. How long have you been in Bengal?"

"A year, Sir. I was kidnapped by the Sergeant-major yonder."

"Kidnapped! Pshaw! There is no such thing as kidnapping allowed in the Honorable East India Company's service. You mean that you enlisted, and were sorry for it afterward, and were held to your bond, as all recruits are."

"I mean that I was betrayed into a house in Fleet Lane, Sir, and there detained close prisoner, in company with others, till we were shipped secretly, under cover of night, on board the Hecate. I mean that I could not have escaped from that crimping-house but at peril of my life, and that men have lost their lives in the attempt to escape from such houses."

"Humph!" muttered my new friend; "you speak as if you were telling truth. I know nothing of abuses in England. Abuses here are so many that the study and investigation of them would occupy a life as long as that of Nizam-ul-Mulk, lately deceased at the venerable age of one hundred and four."

This was said with a somewhat ominous glance at Govindram Metre, who gazed upon the newly-arrived Englishman with upturned eyes, expressive of such veneration as he might be supposed to entertain only for the gods of his fathers.

"What is your name, young man?" asked Mr. Holwell.

"Robert Ainsleigh."

"Ainsleigh! That is a good name, and one I am bound to honor. From what branch of the Ainsleigh family do you come?"

"My father was Roderick Ainsleigh. My grandfather was a colonel of dragoons, who married Lord Hauteville's daughter, Lady Susan Somerton. I was brought up at Hauteville, in the county of Berks; entered at the Temple as a student, and intended for the law, when it was my ill fortune to fall in with that kidnapping scoundrel yonder."

"Not so fast, Mr. Ainsleigh. You must not call names, though you do come of a good English family, and a family that I have reason to respect. If what you tell me be true, I am in duty bound to befriend you; for your grandfather, Colonel Ainsleigh, served with my father under Marlborough in the Low Countries; and at the bloody battle of Malplaquer the colonel carried my father, then a lad, from under the enemy's batteries. So you see, Sir, I have to thank your ancestor for my entrance into this world, since, had the French cannon made an end of Ensign Holwell on that famous occasion, there could be no such person as your humble servant.—What say you to this gentleman's story, Sergeant-major? Did he go by the name of Ainsleigh when you picked him up in London?"

"Sure he did, your Honor; but devil a bit of an Ainsleigh is he for all that, but the bastard son of Roderick Ainsleigh, a profligate scamp that got himself stabbed to death in a tavern quarrel; and my Lady Barbara Lestrangle, wife of his Majesty's plenipotentiary to Spain, adopted the young scoundrel and brought him up in charity, and he turned upon her like an ungrateful varmint as he is, and wanted to elope with Sir Marcus Lestrangle's niece—a great fortune, and a beauty into the bargain; but luckily for his family, that he was nothing but a disgrace to, he enlisted himself to me in a drunken fit, whereby the Lestrangles got rid of him."

"If you will let me tell you my story, Sir, I think you will believe me," I said, addressing myself to Mr. Holwell.

"I think I shall, Mr. Robert Ainsleigh," he answered, kindly. "Your face is hardly the countenance of a liar; and if the blood of my father's friend does flow in your veins I care little in what illegal manner you came by it."

"On my honor, Sir, that fellow has no warrant for his foul assertion, except the one fact that the obscurity of my father's death and latter days left me without the means of proving my legitimacy."

After this Mr. Holwell ordered me to be placed on the sick-list, and I was taken to a somewhat dilapidated building on the outskirts of the fort that served as an infirmary.

"I will make it all right with your captain," he said; "and you, Mr. Sergeant-major, must look over the lad's delinquency on this occasion, to oblige me."

Mr. O'Blagg replied with extreme obsequiousness, and I began at once to discover what it is to have a friend at court.

The doctor pronounced me suffering from a low intermittent fever, and sorely in need of rest; so I lay at the infirmary for several weeks, during which Mr. Holwell frequently visited me. He questioned me very closely upon the subject of my education, and appeared much surprised to find me possessed of several languages, among these Sanscrit—which I owed to the scholarship of my old friend Anthony—and a tolerable proficient in Hindoostanee, the acquirement of which, viva voce, from the native soldiery, and from such meagre books as I could obtain, had been my sole recreation during the last dreary year.

"Why, you are just such a fellow as I want for a clerk and secretary," he said; "the young writers they send out are for the most part raw ignorant lads, who are dispatched here only because their friends know not what to do with them at home. You have but to improve yourself in Hindoostanee, and to thoroughly master the native character in which their business documents are written, and you would be invaluable to me. Would you like to exchange the military for the civil service, if I could effect such a transfer?"

"To exchange the ignoble slavery I have endured here for your service would be to pass at once from the depths of Onderah to the Mahah Surgo; or, in plain English, to exchange hell for heaven."

"I see you have been studying the Shastah," said Mr. Holwell, who had already revealed to me that taste for Oriental research which was afterwards usefully displayed in his numerous pamphlets. "You can not do better than pursue such studies, for the Gentoos will respect you so much the more for being acquainted with the Sanscrit language, the knowledge of which is confined to their Brahmins and learned Pundits. And you would really like to be my secretary, Robert?"

"Nothing would please me better."

"I warn you that the work will be of the hardest, and tax your powers of accountancy. I am now engaged in the investigation of a series of frauds committed by that scoundrel, Govindram Metre, which involve the conduct of our finances for the last ten years, and by which that black rascal has pocketed thousands. Do you feel yourself capable of performing the mere mechanical drudgery of such a work?"

"I feel myself capable of making any endeavor to serve you, Sir. I was well drilled in accountancy by my lady's house-steward, who had an old-fashioned veneration for figures; and with a little direction from yourself, I doubt not I should soon master the mysteries of finance."

Mr. Holwell was contented with this assurance, and set to work immediately to redeem me from my hateful bondage. He was a person of considerable influence in the presidency; and among a supine and indifferent community his industrious and energetic habits multiplied that influence tenfold. So by the time I was sufficiently recovered to leave the infirmary I found myself a free man, and went immediately to Mr. Holwell's house, where I was provided with suitable clothes, and a decent chamber, and began life for the second time in the character of a gentleman.

It is not to be supposed I was so base as to forget my companion in misery, Philip Hay, in this happy alteration of my own fate. I tried to enlist Mr. Holwell's sympathy for that reckless scoundrel, and carefully suppressed his share in my betrayal. My new friend promised to do his best to serve my late brother in arms; but he remarked that Mr. Hay bore his lot with supreme equanimity, and was a fellow who would doubtless fall on his feet, tumble from what pinnacle he might.

"We may have some fighting by-and-by," said he; "for at the first hint of a war between the two countries Dupleix will be down upon us here. It is not to be supposed that the French will let us alone forever after their good luck at Madras. In the event of an attack upon this place your friend will have an opportunity of distinguishing himself; and be sure the fight would be a desperate one, for while I have a voice to raise in council the motto of Fort William shall be no surrender."

I lived to see this promise kept, and against a more cruel foe than the French. I lived to witness the base abandonment of Fort William by its chief military protectors, and its heroic defense by a civilian.

SINGULARITY.

A SIMPLE and dignified admission of special ignorance, or indifference, or want of skill, seems to be a virtue most difficult of attainment, and indeed is any thing but generally recognized as a virtue at all. If the admission is made it is apt to be accompanied with a certain boastfulness, as men will brag of their bad handwriting, or inability to reckon aright. There is, of course, nothing to pride one's self on in being ignorant of any thing, but nothing necessarily to be ashamed of in being unacquainted with many. Perhaps one of the choicest results of culture is the magnanimity which enables a man when he does not understand what other people are talking of to say so frankly and easily. It may even keep him unmoved and unshaken in the terrible conjuncture imagined by a recent writer, of being unable to join in the conversation at a dinner-table on some book of the day which has created an impression, and is being discussed by the rest of the company, simply through not having read it. Of course his not having read it may be very far from being to his credit, but it is none the more so because other people have. Life is, after all, but limited, and it is simply impossible to master every thing. Nor is to be in the fashion by any means a sound principle by which to guide one's studies. A few years ago ferns and sea-anemones were the rage. Now an intimate acquaintance with ferns and sea-anemones is wholesome and profitable enough, but yet a good deal of ignorance of both can hardly be held to involve any very heavy condemnation. If a man has brains, if he has read and can think, he will generally find in the course of any conversation ample opportunities of impressing the fact of his possessing these qualities on all persons similarly gifted, and need not fear faring the worse in their estimation if he for a while hold his peace, as having nothing to say worth the utterance. No doubt, if his companions are fools, he may; but such a result one would think was not unendurable.

Feeble as a man may be when he is natural and himself, he is always stronger so than when aiming at being something else. Imitation does not "pay." What failure, for instance, can be more thorough and deserved than that of the would-be sportsman, who, utterly unskilled in riding or shooting, yet dares not avow his ignorance of what is considered a "manly" accomplishment? Even if he is so fortunate as to avoid doing some serious damage to himself or some one else, he invariably makes himself ridiculous. No doubt one who frankly owned his deficiencies in such matters would in many, perhaps in most circles, have to encounter a little railleury; but no man or woman whose good opinion was worth five minutes' exertion to gain would seriously think the worse of him simply because he could neither ride nor shoot, if he only had the courage to say so, and not show himself at once a bungler and an impostor. And although in other lines it may be possible to escape such open disgrace, yet is there an effort, a ceaseless unrest, perceptible in the talk and bearing of one who "goes in," as the saying is, for being a wit, or a critic, or a "ladies' man;" not because either is natural to him, but because he thinks the assumption of the character will promote his social success, which robs him of all grace and attractiveness. He is forever doing or saying something, not because it is natural to him, but because he thinks it in keeping with his part; and his effects all miss fire from being so manifestly sought after. Indeed it is doubtful whether the last class we named—the "ladies' men"—do not often fail as ludicrously even as the sportsmen. No doubt there is among women a greater superficial conformity to a given type than among men. Whether it is more than superficial is by no means so certain; but that is a question too long to be discussed in this place. But, however that may be, it is a great mistake to assume that the characteristic is one they admire in the other sex; and many a man who has fondly flattered himself that he has been made "to order" after the most approved fashion, in polite speeches, and assiduous and perhaps officious attentions, has had for his reward only the doubtful satisfaction of being taken at his own estimate of his merits, and used, like the laborious but unillustrious quadruped to which he has taken pains to liken himself, as a serviceable beast of burden.

By shamming, a man never deceives any one in the long-run, and loses his own soul. We do not, of course, mean that it is well to aim at being singular. Singularity in itself is no more a virtue than it is a reproach. The tendency to a dead level of uniformity, however, is at present so strong that really a good many mistakes in this direction may well be pardoned. There are indeed certain matters of etiquette and general tacit agreement—such, for instance, as the wearing of a special costume in the evening—slight and worthless in themselves, but which have become by tradition, as it were, part of the social bond, with which a man would be a boor and a fool to refuse compliance. But, given conformity with these—and the inroads they make on freedom are inappreciable—let him, after satisfying himself as far as may be that the light within him is real light, and no mere will-o'-the-wisp, follow it, and dare live his own life and be himself, heedless whether or not he is "like other people," or is adequately posted up in the new book of which every one is talking. "Other people" are, for the most part, neither saints nor sages; and an ignorance of the newest of new novels, or the latest account of African explorations, is not incompatible with soundness of judgment and delicacy of taste.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

"DYNAMITE" is the name given to a new explosive preparation designed for blasting. It consists of seventy-five per cent. of nitro-glycerine, and twenty-five per cent. of porous silica. An interesting paper was recently read before the British Association for the Advancement of Science, giving some account of this new compound. Its introduction is so recent that many of its advantages over other blasting agents can not be proved by statistics; but while it is analogous to nitro-glycerine in most respects, dynamite is far less dangerous. Indeed, it has been so tested that it appears to be the safest of all known explosives. At Glasgow a box containing several pounds was placed over a fire, in presence of witnesses, and it burned slowly away. Another box filled with it was hurled from a height of sixty feet upon a rock below, but no explosion followed; nevertheless, the explosive force of dynamite, as compared with gunpowder, is as ten to one; but it is exploded by percussion-caps.

A story is told of one of the royal generals in Spain, which seems too barbarous to be true. A child only five years old was condemned to be shot as the son of a rebel. The child, not understanding the situation, moved about, and by extraordinary luck was not touched. The general then coolly threw it an orange, and while stooping to pick it up a second volley stretched it dead. A wretch who could do such a deed is wanting in every thing that makes a man.

An address was recently delivered in a medical college in this city with the design of impressing upon the students the importance of a most extensive and thorough knowledge of the science of medicine, so that effects might easily be traced to causes. The speaker—a cultivated physician—mentioned as a case illustrating his remarks that a young woman, after having been under treatment for disease of the spine for two years without benefit, placed herself under his care. His knowledge of chemistry satisfied him that she was suffering from paralysis caused by lead poison; but the patient asserted that she had in no way been exposed to the influence of such poison. After some time, however, he learned that she had been accustomed to use a cosmetic for the face, which chemical analysis proved to contain enough poison of lead to reduce her to a very helpless condition. The students for whose benefit this instance was cited may learn one lesson from it; ladies who use cosmetics should learn another. It is said that this harmful compound is extensively used. If ladies prefer boughten cosmetics instead of pure water and fresh air, which are the best of all, do let them make sure that those they use contain no poison.

We are accustomed to regard silk exclusively as an article of dress; nevertheless, it possesses peculiar medical properties, as was long ago ascertained. In Pomet's history of drugs it is stated silk was in his time used as medicine by reducing the pure part of the cocoon into a powder. Silk thus prepared has, as affirmed, "the virtues of cleansing the blood, making the spirits brisk, and heart pleasant." Neumann found that but few materials afforded an equal quantity of volatile alkali. Tournefort obtained from fifteen ounces of silk two drachms of volatile salt: this, which was called the spirit of raw silk, when rectified with some essential oil, was the medicine formerly celebrated under the name of "Gutta Anglicana," or English drops. The volatile alkali obtained from silk was then supposed to be of a different nature from that contained in any other substance, and it consequently was held to possess virtues peculiar to itself.

At a meeting recently held in this city by women who earn a livelihood by sewing, the following fact was stated. A young woman once worked seventy-two hours on a piece of embroidery, and her employer told her as it was very well done he would pay her an extra price. The whole sum paid, including the premium, was $3.50. She soon after entered the store for some purchases, and saw her work in a glass case. On asking the price, she learned it was $85. She remarked to the clerk, who did not know her, that the material could easily be bought for $20. "Ah," said the clerk, "but remember the labor! The labor cost $35. We pay the highest price for labor." The young girl happened to have her note-book with her, and set the young man right regarding the price paid.

A rich old man recently died in England leaving a young widow, whose conduct had rendered his latter days so miserable that he promised to be revenged upon her. His will revealed his vengeance. He left all his property, about $100,000, to his wife, on the condition that she passes every day from 8 A.M. till 6 P.M. in his tomb. Should she miss one hour the whole fortune reverts to the natural heirs.

The great sea-ports of the Chinese Empire are to be connected by submarine electric telegraph cables, and land lines are also to connect the prominent inland towns. A company has already been organized to commence the work.

On the southern coast of California, near Santa Barbara, is a monster grape-vine, concerning which the following story is told: A Spanish girl, having driven her mule a day's journey with a grape cane for a switch, took a fancy, on her arrival home, to stick it into the ground and see if it would grow. It did grow, and was allowed to extend itself, without pruning. A few years ago, when she had attained a green old age, and the vine covered an acre of ground, a petition in her behalf was presented to Congress, and secured the passage of an act confirming to her the title to a quarter section of public land on which it stood. The annual yield was then put at eight thousand pounds; and, according to a recent visitor, the crop now upon it is estimated at ten thousand pounds.

The Journal des Connaissances Medicales contains an interesting article, by Dr. Ozenam, on treating diphtheria and croup with bromine. By experiment it has been found that bromine, when introduced into the respiratory organs, first hardens the adventitious membrane, and then reduces it to dust. The researches of Dr. Ozenam also show that bromine prevents contagion. As a preventive to epidemic diphtheria, he administers ten or twelve drops a day in sugar and water. Fumigations of bromine he has found remarkably successful in cases of croup.

A singular fact was recently communicated to the French Academy of Sciences. In August last a violent thunder-storm visited the city of Nantes, during which a gentleman, who happened to be crossing one of the bridges of the Canal de Bretagne at the time, suddenly found himself enveloped in a blaze of light. The phenomenon lasted little more than a second, and caused no unpleasant effect. Afterward, having occasion to examine the money in his purse, he discovered that a half Napoleon was covered with a thin coating of silver. This strange phenomenon was thus explained. The gold piece had been put in the compartment of the purse adjoining that containing the silver coin. The electric fluid volatilized part of the latter metal, which, in this state, had penetrated through the leather partition, and deposited itself on the gold piece with remarkable uniformity. This is the first time such an effect has ever been observed.

As an instance of the difficulty of transferring delicate shades of meaning in translating one language into another, may be mentioned the oft-quoted line, "Frailty, thy name is woman," which a Frenchman rendered, "Mademoiselle Frailty is the name of the lady." While a German, who attempted Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner," could give it no better title in his own tongue than "The Old Sailor."

A writer in Chambers's Journal gives the following pithy counsel: "Woman, woman, take my advice and learn to cook."

A novel scheme has been conceived by an Italian who has been for many years residing in Africa. He aims at nothing more nor less than the reclamation of the Great Desert of Sahara, and its conversion into a fruitful region, by means of Artesian wells! The springs of water which fertilize the oases might, he believes, if properly directed, make the wilderness blossom like a rose.

Many estimates have been made of the number of smokers in our country. The truth might be somewhat difficult to state in exact numbers; but it is said, on good authority, that our metropolitan pipe-smokers number about 45,000, and cigar-smokers 50,000. Something like 200,000 cigars are, on the average, consumed every day in the city of New York. Paris is said to smoke about the same number. Then New York chews fearfully, but Paris snuffs. Between seven and eight thousand tons of snuff are annually consumed in France.

The microscope makes fearful revelations. A physician announces that he has discovered numerous infusoria in the air expired by children suffering with whooping-cough. They are about one-thousandth of an inch in length, and of a large, slender, cylindrical form. It is to be hoped that the microscope, or something else, will also suggest some effective method of destroying the "cylindrical" creatures.

A lady in writing about the best method of washing lace curtains, says she always soaks them two or three days in warm water, by which process they are so much cleansed that very little rubbing is needful. All attempts to iron lace stretches it entirely out of shape. The curtains should be spread smoothly upon the floor of a spare room—clean sheets having been laid down—and allowed to remain until dry.

According to a French journal, an astonishing variety of articles are used by celebrated singers for the purpose of strengthening the voice. Madame Sontag used to take sardines in oil between acts; Dorus ate cold veal; Desparres drank warm-water; Cruvell took Bordeaux wine mixed with Champagne; Adeline Patti favors beer; Sass eats beef-steak; Cabel ate pears; Ugalde potatoes; Luca took peppermint-drops and candy; Michot swallowed an enormous draught of coffee; Troy drinks milk; and Mario smokes continually. It is even hinted that a certain prima donna in New York depended for success upon sliced sausage between acts.

In an article on Insanity in Putnam's Magazine for November, a curious instance is given of insanity manifesting itself by great extravagance. A gentleman, who by speculation had suddenly become a millionaire, went to consult a physician about some chronic disease. The first time he went he handed the doctor a fifty-dollar bill, saying, as he did so, "Your fee, doctor, I prefer to pay as I go." Nothing was thought of this, for it was precisely what any grateful and free-hearted patient might do; but on the next visit, two or three days afterward, he again handed the doctor a fifty-dollar bill, with the same remark. His disease demanded a protracted course of treatment. He visited the doctor at his office several times a week for a number of months, and each time invariably offered a fifty-dollar bill. Afterward he became so reckless in his expenditures that it was necessary for some friend to travel with him in order to keep him from throwing his money away. He would throw a ten-dollar bill to the porter who carried his trunk up stairs, or to the boy who blacked his boots. A year's travel in Europe ultimately restored him to a measure of health, and, at last accounts, he was fully capable of managing his affairs.

THE BRIDAL.

THE darkest day of all the year,
And yet the sky is bright!
A funeral from the quiet church,
With coaches decked with white!

A group of mourners sore at heart,
Who studied smiles bestow;
A bridal that a burial seems,
And better far were so!

The pride and idol of the town—
A shrew, with evil eyes—
Oh Love will go where Love is sent:
'Tis folly to be wise!

He might have won whom'er he would
Of all the maids in town;
Not one among the train had met
His wooing with a frown.

But, free of will and light of heart,
Rare forms of queenly grace,
And cheeks like Eden's rose, he passed
To win a gipsy face.

No spell of beauty has his bride
A manly heart to stir;
But Love will go where Love is sent,
And he was sent to her.

He did not seek her for her gold—
She has a beggar's hand;
She has no station to bestow,
No influence to command.

He must have known his choice was blamed
By friends beloved for years;
His mother sobbed upon his neck,
His sister prayed with tears.

He must have heard the gossips' tales,
He knew her tarnished name,
The license of her fiery tongue
His presence could not tame.

A dimmer sight than his had seen
The witchcraft in her eyes;
But Love will go where Love is sent—
'Tis folly to be wise!

Oh village oracles renowned!
Oh prophets never dumb!
When you henceforth with fateful lips
Shall speak of days to come,

Say what spring mornings will be gray,
What evening skies be red,
But never venture to foretell
Who man or maid shall wed.

In vain alike are hope and fear,
We waste our weary sighs;
For Love will go where Love is sent—
'Tis folly to be wise!

"BUTTERED BACON."

LAMOILE CLAREMONT kept his heart wrapped in a napkin.

A very large and a very thick napkin. And he kept it, besides, hidden in a remarkably secret spot, nobody knew where. A great many people had looked for it in a great many places; but only one person had had so much as a glimpse of it.

This person had once skittered stones, and sailed chips freighted with pebbles on the pond with him. A little later in life they had fished for pickerel together, and spelled each other down in the long lines of boys and girls at the red school-house under the hill.

But for several years they had hardly met, and in this time John Handiford had turned into a well-preserved householder, with a regular orchard of olive-plants about him, while Lamoile Claremont had not so much as a tame mouse by way of family ties.

"What is the reason your friend Lamoile Claremont doesn't marry?" said Mrs. John Handiford, time and again.

"I can not tell you," replied Mr. John Handiford, time and again. "I have given him both my advice and my example, but he is blind to the one and deaf to the other."

"I do not understand it," returned Mrs. Handiford, who was a bit metaphysical, and felt obliged to go to the root of every matter. "He seems like a man of very domestic tastes. Has he ever had any love affair?"

"He hasn't, that I know of. I have seen plenty of girls who have had concerning him, at one time and another, but he has never seemed especially interested in the matter," answered Mr. Handiford upon one of those times when he was a good deal engrossed in mending a toy-pump for his youngest but two, who stood watching him with an eager face.

"Here, Willy, here it is, all right," he added, tossing down the pump, and tossing up the boy. At the same time tossing his old friend entirely out of his thoughts; for one has never but half a place in the heart of a friend who is parent of a child.

But, as it happened, Mrs. Handiford, not having a case of measles or immediate teething on hand, gave poor Lamoile more attention, musing upon the unsatisfactory problem of his life all day at intervals.

"Such a waste!" she meditated. "There are so many girls who need a home, a husband, and love. I don't know really but he is guilty of neglect of duty as well as neglect of opportunity. Now, there is Kate Landon. She ought to be married; she would make the nicest kind of a wife, and she hasn't a very pleasant home. If I could only bring them together!"

But dear me! Little Mrs. Handiford might as well have thought of bringing the Southern Cross to shine beside the Polar Star.

"Where is Lamoile Claremont now?" she asked her husband that evening. "We haven't seen him in a long time."

"He is at Bolton for aught I know. He was book-keeper in that same paper-mill where he has been for so long the last I heard from him. He seems to have got over his wanderings and settled down, and I suppose he is making money. He owns a good deal of stock in the mill, and paper has been very profitable, though it seems to be a little down now."

"Do you ever write?" queried Mrs. Handiford.

"Well, no, not often. Why?"

"Nothing," replied the lady, not minded to take the cover off her broth till it had begun to boil. "Only you used to think so much of each other it seems a pity not to keep up at least a correspondence."

"That is so!" returned Mr. Handiford, who was very ready to see when his wife held a candle. "I will write him a letter to-night."

Which accordingly he did, and Lamoile replying at once cordially, Mrs. Handiford felt that kid had begun to go.

But what isn't to be will not be.

"Why don't you ask Claremont to come and make us a visit?" suggested Mrs. Handiford at last.

"Oh, he is coming next week. Didn't I tell you? Yes, I had a letter from him last night. Going to be this way on business," returned Mr. Handiford.

"Well, I am glad of it," replied his wife, secretly proceeding to examine and set her traps, which was not an easy bit of work, her bait being as shy as her game.

"If Kate has the least hint of what I am thinking I can't get her within a hundred miles; and if I invite her up to spend the day when Claremont is here it will look suspicious, I suppose," thought the little lady, drawing herself up on the corner of the sofa, and slowly plucking the hairs, one by one, from the crown of her head; which was her habit when she wished to stir her brain into action. "Let me think—oh! a picnic! an impromptu picnic to the beach! That will do. I will get it up all of a sudden the day Claremont comes. Oh yes!" she said to herself, jumping off the sofa and running to the brine-barrel to see how many cold boiled tongues she could furnish forth.

But "woman proposes and man disposes."

In the first place, Claremont didn't come; and in the next place, Kate Landon's brother fell sick, and she had to stay and nurse him. Of course, nobody had so much as a toothache in the Landon family but Kate was looked to to bring the anodyne and cotton.

"Yes, they tell me," said old Aunt Betty, who lived where four ways met, and kept a carrier-pigeon, "that Morton Landon has got the real typhoid fever, and if that is the case Kate will have a stent of it with him, for the typhoid is a bad complaint if it sets pretty hard."

Aunt Betty was right, as she usually was, in her inferences, and for a long, long while Kate Landon might as well have been out of the body as in it for any thing that the world saw of her.

But nothing ever lasted forever, not even the impeachment trial; and so at last Morton Landon slowly crept into fretful, fidgety convalescence, and Kate drew a long breath, and appeared again at Sunday services and Friday evening prayer-meetings, meek and pale as a white violet.

"I declare! It is a brutal shame the way that girl has to slave for her family; and if I had the ordering of events she should have a taste of the land of Beulah before she leaves the world. Kate would make a most excellent wife," said Mrs. John Handiford one day, going off in a fit of musing.

Which was broken into by her husband. "Are you thinking of naming your successor, Kitty?" said he, in a hopeless hope of making an acceptable joke.

"Why, John! How can you speak in that coarse way?" returned his wife, in a tone both grieved and indignant.

John repented at once, and wondered he could have mistaken such foolish levity for wit; while his wife relapsed into her puzzle over the obstinacy of events.

At last, however, a second letter came from Lamoile Claremont, making a second appointment for his visit; but alas! by the same mail came a letter telling of the dangerous illness of a half-sister of John Handiford's: a simple-minded, inopportune invalid, who meant well enough, but who always blundered.

"It is too bad, there! that Celia should take this very time to—to get worse, after being sick all her life; just when every thing was beginning to work around right," thought Mrs. Handiford, as she folded her best black silk. "I wonder if I can not get Kate Landon to stay here while we are gone. Then if Claremont comes the house will be open," she said aloud, in a gush of inspiration.

"I have telegraphed to Lamoile, telling him we should be off, and not to come," replied her husband, with the comfortable air of having been equal to the emergency.

A useful capability for a man to possess, but sometimes terribly in the way, as now.

"What a bungler a man is!" thought Mrs. Handiford, feeling as discomforted as a child whose castle of cards has been tumbled down by an awkward playmate just as it is ready for the last turret.

"But there are changes and chances helping the hopeful;" and in time Lamoile Claremont made another more fortunate appointment for the deferred visit.

"The last of the week," he writes, and today is Thursday: Friday—Saturday," mused she. "Likely he will come Friday. I wonder if it isn't my best way to invite Kate up to tea to-morrow, and go from here to meeting with us. But then he may not come before Saturday. We can't tell. And I dare say I can't keep her so long. Dear me! how I wish I knew the day he is coming! Well, any how I will invite her."

So the first thing after breakfast the next morning Mrs. Handiford put on her bonnet and went down the street to the mouldy brick hive where the Landon brothers and sisters lived in one overgrown swarm. Then she came back, and put on her apron and went to making cake.

"Not to have it look marked I had to invite Sarah as well as Kate, and then while I am about it I thought I would ask May Hanson. I have been owing her an invitation for this ever so long," said she to herself, confidentially, as she whisked away at a pan of eggs and sugar. "Well, there!" she continued, still in the secrecy of her own thoughts, "why not have Tibby Jones and Toney Skenon? Make a comfortable little party, and then there will be nothing awkward or stiff about it."

So she sent off the children with these fresh invitations and broke another dozen eggs into her pan, dipped into another bowl of sugar, and whisked away again, every beat of her egg-spoon keeping time to some new detail in her plan of action. But "The best-laid schemes of mice and men Gang aft agley."

And just as she had poured out half her batter into pans for plain cake and was sifting raisins and citron and Zante currants into the remainder, she heard the outer door shut with an ominous bang. By which token she knew that her husband, who always did every thing with an emphasis, had come home untimely.

A moment after he put his head in the pantry. "Lamoile Claremont is here," said he, with the assurance of good tidings in his tone. "Can't you hurry dinner a little? He is going to leave on the first train."

"Not to-day!" gasped Mrs. Handiford, dropping a spoonful of mustard instead of cinnamon in the cake-batter.

"Yes, to-day. He says he must be back home to-morrow afternoon and will have to ride half the night in order to stop at all."

"Oh, you mustn't listen to his going off to-day when he hasn't been here for so long!" answered Mrs. Handiford, with returning courage, as she took off her wide kitchen-apron.

But she might as well have kept it on. Claremont had the exaggerated notion, so common to male creatures, of the importance of his own business in comparison with the plans and wishes of every body and every thing else, and of the importance of himself to his business.

So he whistled out of one end of the town on the express train, as Kate Landon came down her door-steps at the other end; which was as near as Mrs. Handiford could bring the quarry and the snare.

But her tea was strong and her cake was sweet, so she comforted herself with her guests while she cast about in her thoughts for some more efficient way of bringing the spark and train together.

"What spice did you use to give your cake such a pungent flavor?" asked Tibby Jones, who happened to have "Benjamin's portion" of mustard in her slice, and who had a weakness for recipes.

"Only bring them together," answered Mrs. Handiford, absently.

Her guests looked up astonished and she recovered herself.

"Oh, the cake, yes," said she, quickly, tasting it and then laughing. "Well, to tell the plain truth my husband and I had some words just while I was making this cake, and I think it got an extra tang of sharpness then."

Tibby Jones was so literal a person that she could hardly manage the Bible parables without stumbling, and was entirely at sea in Aesop's fables; so upon this speech she stared till, as Bridget Vance—who happened to be coming in with a fresh pot of tea at the moment—said, "Ye'd thought the two eyes of her would le'p out of her head."

If her eyes did not her tongue evidently did, for

"They tell me," said Aunt Betty, the next morning, "that Handiford and his wife don't get along so smoothly as might be; but I guess it isn't so."

The year hurried on past its Thanksgiving-day, its Christmas, and New-Year's. Past St. Valentine's, All-Fools', and May day. Still Lamoile Claremont went his ways and Kate Landon went hers. And still little Mrs. Handiford plucked at her hair and schemed.

So at last the year, having brought every thing else, prepared to bring Midsummer-night. And a little before the sun took himself good-naturedly out of the way that it might come Mrs. Handiford and Kate Landon went down to the beach at turn of tide for the first bath of the season.

"The water is just delicious to-night. Let's take one run more into it," said Mrs. Handiford, holding out her hand to Kate, as two men, turning a corner, came down upon the sand behind them.

But Kate, looking back, like Lot's wife, turned away and ran into the bathing-house.

"Well, perhaps we have been in long enough for once," returned Mrs. Handiford, surprised at her abruptness, and turning back herself: thus facing the two men, who were her husband and his friend, Lamoile Claremont.

"What idiots men are! Didn't John know any better than to let Claremont have his first sight of Kate in that horribly unbecoming black-and-white check?" cried she, in her heart, forgetting John was not in the secret of her hopes and fears.

Then she made a little smile and bow to the gentlemen, and disappeared into her own section of the bathing-house to dress herself, in a great flutter of vexation.

"After I have tried so long to bring them together! And Claremont is so distressingly fastidious! I never did see! I am thoroughly annoyed! John all over! Why couldn't he know better?"

She came out at last, minded to make the best of a decidedly bad matter, just as Kate emerged from her bathing-house shell—like a bright-winged butterfly from a brown chrysalis.

"Well, there! I never did see her looking prettier than she does this minute. What a sweet color, and how her eyes shine!" thought Mrs. Handiford, with gratified surprise, coming forward to shake hands with Mr. Claremont and make the long-attempted introduction.

When, to her amazement, Claremont, without seeing her outstretched hand, went quickly up to Kate Landon and kissed her.

"What do you mean? When did it happen?" gasped Mrs. Handiford, sitting down helplessly on the wet sand.

"I believe it began while Kate was dropping medicine into a spoon for Morton, when he had that typhoid fever; didn't it, Kate?" replied Lamoile.

Kate smiled and blushed.

"It could not have begun before that," said she.

"Why, what! How! Do tell me! How came you there, any way?" asked Mrs. Handiford, staring like Tibby Jones.

"Morton's testimony was needed in a law-case that couldn't go on without it, and I came to get it. It was the week I first wrote of going to your house, but found I couldn't make the two calls before the train left. It might have come to nothing, though, if John's sister Celia hadn't taken that fidget about making her will and thinking she was going to die. But I didn't, luckily, get John's dispatch in time to prevent my coming, and when I found your house shut up I went home with Morton Landon, as I happened to meet him and he happened to invite me."

"How much better things arrange themselves than we can arrange them!" sighed Mrs. Handiford, thankfully. "And then I suppose you went to see Kate again the time you were here before?" said she, "when I wanted so bad that you should stay to my tea-party and meet her?"

"Why, yes; I suppose I did. Spent the night before at the Landons, didn't I, Kate?" replied Claremont, complacently, drawing Kate's hand over his arm. "She would have worn her engagement ring to your party, only I couldn't believe any woman had such a little set of fingers, and had to take it back to exchange for a smaller one," he continued, looking down with the admiration of a possessor at the little pink fingers.

"They tell me," said Aunt Betty, some months after this, on the day of their wedding, "that Mrs. Handiford had something to do with making the match between Mr. Claremont and Kate Landon; but I don't make out what."

COLORS AND COMPLEXIONS.

THERE is an old story familiar to every lady of an old and ugly and spiteful queen who played a sorry trick on one of the most beautiful blondes of her court by inviting her, at a time when she was magnificently attired in white, to sit beside her brunette majesty in a chair trimmed with yellow and with yellow tapestry surroundings. The poor blonde blushed at divining the motive of the queen but dared not decline the honor. She had no sooner taken her seat, it will be remembered, than she changed to a faded, sallow, dirty-yellow complexion, while the queen, who was a brunette, looked all the better in her yellow surroundings for the contrast with her rival. The maid of honor appeared to such disadvantage beside the queen that the beauty of the latter and the ugly complexion of the former were the court gossip for weeks. That queen understood better than most modern ladies the philosophy of colors, and she owed her triumphs to that knowledge.

If portrait painters were ever practical fellows they could and would give their lady friends and patrons a wise suggestion or two in regard to colors and how to blend them; but we may learn of them if not from them. We may learn a lesson or two from the different colored screens which are found in their rooms, and which many ladies imagine are kept to conceal the artist's toilette arrangements. They are really used for "backing up"—that is, to form the back-ground which is to relieve the figure of the model or subject which is being painted. The lighter colored ones are for brunettes; the dark ones are placed behind blondes when they are being painted, the effect being to more clearly mark the outlines of face and figure, and to improve the complexion.

Again, every artist if asked will tell you why the colors on his pallet appear so inferior to the same when put on the canvas, by explaining that they are placed on the pallet at random and as is most convenient, while they are arranged on the canvas with careful study of effect. Certain colors, side by side on the pallet, appear dull and dirty, though they came from the tube a moment before in all their purity and brilliancy of tone. Yellow beside white makes the white look yellowish, and the yellow becomes paler; so red beside orange reddens the orange; green gives a greenish tinge to white, yellow, and orange. The colors thus placed appear dull and dirty, not because they are really dirty or inferior in color, but because of their arrangement. Thus white and yellow, placed side by side, injure the tone of each other, because there is not sufficient contrast, and appear to the eye as if really run together, just as the faded colors that do not wash look. But if the artist places red between yellow and blue the tone of each will be heightened and improved; for red, yellow, and blue, as any tasteful lady knows, or red, white, and blue, as every patriotic lady knows, blend most harmoniously.

The beautifully blended colors of the Gobelin tapestries have long been admired, and it is common to hear the colors, as well as the material, spoken of as of a superior quality. This is not the case. The beauty and magnificence of the Gobelin carpets are due less to the richness of the colors than to the skill and taste which has directed their blending. They are the result of years of study of the effect of colors. Many years ago black tints used to be employed as shadows to the popular blue draperies and carpets of the Gobelin make, until it was discovered by the manager that black not only did not wear well, but that it never had its deep glossy appearance when blended with blue, but took a dirty, brownish hue. The latter fact discovered the cause was sought for, and it was found that the black was spoiled by contrast with the blue. Further experiments resulted in its disuse in that connection, and hence you seldom see black in carpets of modern make.

Many of the beautiful India shawls which are imported into this country contain black in large quantities, but it is not a popular color; and hence American importers find it to their advantage to change the black for more agreeable colors. The changing of the colors in India shawls for the purpose of increasing the effect is as much a branch of needle-work as the repairing of shawls.

Upon the same plan, and guided by the same rules which influence the artist and the needle-woman in the choice of colors, a lady should compound or arrange and blend the colors which compose her dress, furnish her room, plant her flowers, and arrange her bouquets. The same principle applies to one as to all. All that is necessary to success is a slight knowledge of the grand laws of colors.

The effect of each color or tint in one's dress is increased or modified by its neighbor. Every lady can test this by arranging a bouquet, or, better still, by making a pieced quilt. To do the latter she will, in the first place, have previously gathered together a large quantity of scraps or pieces left from her own and her friends' dresses, and these she will have cut into diamond or hexagon squares, or some other shape, according to her taste and design. Before beginning let her discard all figured pieces, so that each of those to be used shall be of one uniform tint. Then in arranging them in the quilt, let her form a regular scale, beginning with the lightest tinted piece and ending with the darkest, or vice versa. The result will be that every square will be modified by those on either side of it. The border next a darker square will be lightened in effect; the border next a light square will be darkened in effect. The whole row or circle of squares, seen from a little distance, will be made in this way to appear not flat but fluted. Such is the effect of tints upon each other.

The same effects can be produced in dressing, in arranging a bouquet, and in furnishing your house, if the same plain fact is observed in relation to the laws of color. The main laws of color to be borne in mind are as follows: Blue, yellow, and red, principal or primary colors, when mixed together produce white; but when either two of them are mixed, another shade is produced which is naturally the opposite of the one which does not combine to produce it. Thus blue and yellow mixed create green, and hence green is the opposite of red. Green will, if placed beside blue, yellow, orange, violet, or white appear to redden them; while red placed beside either of the same colors gives it a greenish tinge. But green and red when placed side by side set off each other, not "making the green one red," but greener by the contrast, and the red is also heightened in color. Red and yellow produce orange; hence orange should always go with blue, and not with the other primary colors. In the same way red and blue produce violet; and for the reason before given, violet goes best with the color that does not aid to form it. Hence green and red are contrasting colors; so are yellow and violet, and blue and orange. In the same way the shades of these primary colors may be contrasted to advantage. Yellow tints of green contrast with violet, yellow tints of orange with blue, and orange tints of red with bluish-green.

Blondes should wear blue or green. Blue imparts orange to the blonde, thereby enriching the white complexion and light flesh tint, and improves their yellow hair. Green is becoming to blondes who have little color, because it heightens the pink of the cheeks and the crimson of the lips, but it should be a delicate green. If the blonde has much color she should indulge most in blue; but if she wears green it should be very dark. If the complexion is, as is often the case with blondes, of a brownish-orange hue, the green should be very dark, or else it will impart to the countenance of the wearer a brick-red hue. Yellow imparts violet to the pale complexion of the blonde, and this hue is not desirable to the Circassian race. Orange makes a blonde look still paler or yellow. In fact, it becomes neither light nor dark beauties, and should not be worn near the skin. Red increases the effect of whiteness in the blonde, and suggests a greenish hue to the pink of the face. Rose-red destroys all the freshness of a good complexion.

Brunettes should wear yellow or red. Yellow has the effect of neutralizing the yellow in the orange complexion of the brunette, and at the same time increases the red, thus giving freshness to the black-haired beauty. Red is chiefly to be used to increase the whiteness of the brunette's skin, and it should be used sparingly even by the darkest ladies. Blue should be carefully avoided by all brunettes with much orange in their face, as it imparts orange. Orange, of course, does not suit an orange complexion, nor any other for that matter. It gives a brunette a dull, whitish, bluish, pallid appearance, without increasing her red as does yellow. It has the same objections for brunettes that red has, and in a still greater degree. Violet imparts yellow, which, in a brunette, is not highly desirable.

In the same way these facts may be applied in furnishing one's house. The drapery of a room should be blue, green, amber, or yellow. Blue and green drapery tends to increase the color in the face of all standing near it. Hence the popularity of blue and green reps with blondes. Amber and yellow hangings and furniture are suitable only for brunettes. Rose-red, wine-red, and light crimson curtains give a green tint to a lady standing near them, and are therefore objectionable. Dark crimson draperies tend to whiten all faces, and to neutralize the natural color; hence they are objectionable for blonde and brunette.

Wall-paper should be yellow, light green, or blue. The same reasons which are given with regard to drapery apply to colors in wall-paper. Yellow combines well with mahogany, though damaging to the effect of gilding. Light green goes well with both mahogany and gilding. Light blue does not suit mahogany quite so well as yellow, but is admirable for gilding; and is the color for rooms with yellow and orange furniture.

It should be remembered that the color of the furniture should be in proper contrast to that of the drapery and wall-paper. Thus, yellow hangings should accompany blue furniture, crimson hangings should accompany green furniture, and vice versa.

The carpet should be chosen by the same rule, which each lady can apply for herself.

LIFE IN MAURITIUS.

AN Englishman, journeying in Mauritius, gives some interesting glimpses, in the Cornhill Magazine, about the modes of life in that island, whose inhabitants are not as others are in many respects. They eat differently, and drink differently. There is novelty in the way they dress, and in the manner of their lying down. The climate of Port Louis is that of a half-heated oven; and the state of nature, were it permissible, would be the nearest approach to bodily comfort. Here, however, extremes meet, and we have people clad, in the height of tropical summer, as though they were shivering under an Arctic winter. Their fondness for black garments at noontime is inscrutable. From the hats that cover their locks, to the polished boots that encase their feet, they are black entirely. No creole seems to think himself a man while in Port Louis, or at least a gentleman, unless he is dressed like an undertaker. Some of these sable-clad gentry half starve, and in other ways pinch themselves, in order to wear a black surt-out. This vision of black coats affects a stranger most uncomfortably. Another paradox is the assumption of white garments in many creole families as correct evening dress. One gentleman of my acquaintance received the earnest apologies of his host for the tailor's inability to supply his guest with a white coat fit to dine in. Herein the islanders are truly wise in their generation; it would be well for them were they to begin the custom earlier in the day.

Mauritius ought certainly, if the nursery rhyme has any truth in it, to be "healthy, wealthy, and wise," as it goes to bed early and rises early. At six in the morning every body seems up and enjoying the best hours of the day. Now it is that the marketing is done, and the papers are read, and the shops are opened, and the strolls are taken. Having sipped his cup of coffee—strong, aromatic, and inspiring; having laved his feet in the foot-pan, misnamed a bath; having rubbed his face with a small excuse for a towel, and dipped his fingers in the apology for a basin; having attired his languid person à la mode, and scanned it in a mirror of generous area, the creole will handle his dandy bit of a cane, and descend to the pavé, whose intricacies he will traverse for the next hour, while the sun is scarcely yet above the huge hinder hills, and the dew still clings to the leaves. Or, perchance, he will call his carriage and take a drive, or, if more lazily disposed, may lounge away the early morn in the shade of his veranda. If he be a man of business he will go to the Exchange rooms, and have a prefatory gossip over the latest journal as he sits beneath the trees that adjoin that institution. Then comes breakfast; and thereafter, toward eleven o'clock, the inactively active duties of the day begin. About four, or earlier, maybe, he returns to the bosom of his family, who occupy the interval between noon and sunset either in drives about the town, or in dreary siestas in the garden or piazza. Thus may be seen many households, from paterfamilias and his spouse down through the gradations of youths and damsels to the little infant in arms, smoking cigars on the male part, or chatting on the feminine part, until the dinner hour arrives; when the whole of this happy family gather round the common board and eat curry and conserves for the next hour. There will be no exodus of the fair sex. Those gentle beings abide at the table until coffee has been served; then there is a general adjournment to the veranda, where cigars, gossip, and music are the order of the evening. Not for long though. Rarely after nine is a respectable household out of bed. Before ten o'clock most of the lights are extinguished, and the family sleeping, or courting sleep under their solitary sheets, and inevitable mosquito curtains.

As illustrative of Mauritian hospitality, I may state that to most planters' residences a "strangers' house" is attached, where accommodation of the most comfortable character awaits any passing friend or stranger. In no country can a visitor meet with kinder treatment than in the populous Isle of France.

LONDON CORRESPONDENCE.

I AM going to ask you, my readers, to follow me now to one of the most charming country houses in the eastern part of England, where for the last few weeks I have been sojourning. Imagine, then, a large, square-built house, with a row of fine Corinthian columns at the entrance, to which you ascend by a flight of steps. On either side of the portico is a bank of red geraniums, which has a very bright and pretty effect against the white stone-work. Passing through the doorway, you find yourself in a spacious entrance-hall, used also for a billiard-room, a billiard-table occupying the centre. Round the room, in the several corners, are sets of croquet, and stands for billiard-cues, interspersed with flower-stands well filled and blooming. Opposite the door, on the other side of the hall, is the principal staircase of the house: pretty pictures line the walls as you ascend, groups of statuary occupy the niches which the winding of the stairs create, and on the landings pieces of fine old china worth a king's ransom are displayed to admiring eyes on inlaid tables, brackets, or any ledge, or shelf, or window-sill that can be made available. Various corridors and landing-places on the first-floor lead to the numerous bedrooms appropriated to the guests—bachelor quarters being mostly a story higher. The reception-rooms are all on the ground-floor. A well-stocked library, a double drawing-room, and a dining-room where about five-and-twenty people dine pretty well every day from the 1st September until Christmas time is over. One other room must not be forgotten, viz., the smoking-room, used also as a gun-room, where nightly, after the ladies have left the drawing-room, a good many pipes and cigars are smoked, with the help of a fair supply of hot spirits-and-water.

This house, which I have been thus slightly sketching, stands in a well-wooded park, separated from the entrance only by a slight wire fence and carriage-drive, which stretches far away to one or two distant lodges. You can see nothing beyond it. Fine trees and pretty pasture land are on all sides of you; and many pleasant rambles under those wide-spreading trees are undertaken daily in search of mushrooms, or health, or pleasure, or whatever else they may afford. How charming it was in that late intensely hot weather to sit on the gnarled root of that ancient oak, just on the left there, with an engrossing novel and a pleasant companion or two, and to forget in this dolce far niente the heat and bustle of the great metropolis we had left so recently! Then at about half past four a footman in the full glory of powder and red inexpressibles would appear, bearing that most charming of all inventions, the five-o'clock tea-tray, which was herewith deposited on a round rustic table in the centre of the group. Such a dainty silver tray! Such a pretty silver tea-pot, coffee-pot, sugar-basin, and cream-jug, all of the Queen Anne period, which we reckon almost worth its weight in gold. Pretty china cups, and a china plate filled with a good supply of bread-and-butter, and you have the full description of the whole affair, save and except the red tea-pot cozy, which gives a little touch of coloring to it. Doubtless you have these in America; in England they are pretty universally adopted, at these al fresco entertainments at all events, having come to us from Scotland. It is the fashion here to bestow a great deal of care on the paraphernalia of five-o'clock tea just now, and housekeepers are not a little proud, many of them, at their success on this head.

Flower-gardens, orchards, hot-houses for grapes and flowers, the archery ground, and kitchen-garden are at the back of the house. You reach them across the green, level croquet ground, gathering a flower as you go, or maybe a tempting apple near your hand. The estate is a large one, the shooting excellent.

The possessor of this enviable domain is not a nobleman, merely a good, substantial country squire, who has inherited it from a race of forefathers, of whom he is not a little proud. He spends what he has liberally, and his doors seem ever hospitably open to his friends. From the time the shooting season begins some one is sure to be staying there, and mostly a large party. The programme of one day is very like another. The breakfast hour is at nine, but breakfast can be had any time up to half past ten, or you can partake of it in your room if you please; but it is a pleasant, sociable meal; and it is worth the trouble of getting up to be present when most of the party assemble for it. The side-board groans with game pies, raised pies, and cold meats of all kinds; one end of the long table is occupied by the hostess, busy at tea and coffee making. It is much the fashion now to have this done on a side-table by the butler; but it is by no means so pleasant a fashion, and has never been adopted at the house of which I am speaking. I have staid at places, too, where each guest had his separate tea or coffee equipage to himself—a very independent mode of doing things. At the opposite end of the table is, of course, the host. A couple of silver raised dishes are before him, with hot cutlet or kidneys, perhaps; and on each side of the middle of the table are others with sausages, fish, etc. Scattered about are silver egg-stands, toast-racks, plates of hot rolls and of various kinds of bread, and white glass dishes full of sweet things, honey, preserves, and jam. While partaking of this sumptuous fare the fun and repartee never fails, save perhaps in the momentary lull which follows the entrance of the post-bag, when, the letters having been delivered to their respective owners, various little items of news they contain are quickly circulated for the public benefit. "Dear me, Mr. Allen is going to be opposed at Brentwith by an out-and-out Radical." "That match is made up at last; Miss Dorrington, the girl with the three thousand a year, you know, has accepted John Ferguson, Sir Edward's eldest son. She refused him twice. It's a capital thing for both of them; he has a good estate and a baronetcy in prospect, and is not a bad fellow into the bargain, though he hasn't too much money. Her income will do wonders for the old place when he gets it." "Charles is still in Scotland, having fine sport; he's killed seven stags, two of them Royals; had some fine grouse-shooting notwithstanding all the grumbling at the decrease; and has hooked a good salmon or two," and so on.

Breakfast over, the shooting party soon make a start, and the ladies watch them mustering with the dogs and keepers ere they bid farewell. Old coats are the order of the day; swell costumes are considered cockneyfied, and the best sportsmen often look more like farmers than anything else, in well-worn, rusty coats which have seen good service. You watch them disappearing down the avenue maybe, waving their farewells as they go, and then for the morning, at all events, you are mostly left to your own devices. One or two of the gentlemen may perhaps forswear sport for once, and make themselves useful as cavaliers for a ride, or pick up the arrows as they are shot on the archery ground, or play a well-contested game of croquet; but shooting is generally the most overwhelming attraction, especially in the eastern counties, and there is rarely a man left to console the fair sex. Sometimes the ladies meet the shooters in the woods at mid-day, and have a picnic lunch with them, or sometimes they walk to meet them as they return in the evening. The arrangements for horses and carriages are announced at breakfast-time, but these are not generally called into requisition until after lunch; till then you are left to yourself. The hostess is very often invisible; busy with her housekeeper, or with her letters, or with the hundred-and-one occupations which fall to the lot of the mistress of a great house; and a good, healthy, busy life hers is. There is always some kind of mania rife in the country. Just now it is poultry; and the ladies among country folks know the breed of every cock and hen in their yard, and bestow no little thought and attention upon them. The great charm of country house visiting is the freedom from restraint which characterizes it. You find yourself luxuriously housed and fed, and you have nothing to do but "enjoy the goods the gods provide you."

At lunch, after a morning spent as pleases you most—writing, reading, playing croquet, or whatever else it may be, the lady part of the community in the shooting season meet for a meal by themselves. After that riding, driving, or walking follows, and a little before the dressing-bell rings the gentlemen come back. At dinner, when there is a large party, every body appears in full evening dress, though lately, in the height of summer time, square-bodied dresses and high white muslins have been a good deal adopted. After dinner is perhaps the merriest part of the day; dancing, music, whist, and games of all kinds, impromptu charades, etc., are often indulged in. You get to know people more in a few days so than in years of formal visiting in town, and a great deal of love-making and many happy marriages originate here. If I have failed in drawing a very tempting picture of a very happy kind of life I have failed to give you a real notion of what I have attempted to describe just now.

The Times is filled every day with letters on the much-vexed question of fees to servants, and the disclosures which have arisen from these letters prove that country-house visiting is certainly not an economical process. The game-keeper, butler, coachman, footman—to say nothing of women-servants—all expect heavy fees, and you must, of course, dress well. Most people take their own maid to assist in this; many a man his own valet, and, perhaps, a couple of horses and a groom to boot. I have only slightly sketched the house of an ordinary squire; in some of the ducal mansions things are, of course, done on a grander scale; but then the visit extends over a few days only, and now that the Prince and Princess of Wales have taken to visiting about among their subjects things are assuming even a more luxurious aspect. In their case a whole suite of rooms have to be specially appropriated to them, and a vast number of attendants invited as well as they.

My budget of general news is not large. General M'Clellan, after a two years' residence in England, left with his family a short time since for New York. The woman-question is more rife among us now than ever, for women are claiming the right of voting for Members of Parliament wherever the revising barristers are completing the registrations. In nearly every case the claim has been disallowed, notwithstanding a very determined fight for it on the part of some of the more energetic members of the fair sex. In a solitary case or so, however, it has been allowed, in one instance on the plea that the word man is meant legally to include men and women unless the contrary is specially stated. One unlucky Quakeress was fined ten shillings for urging her request, the barrister present declaring that the claim of women to vote was not reasonable, but frivolous and vexatious. Women among our upper classes are doing more than they have ever done in many ways. When Lady Londonderry for years addressed her colliers in person, the case was looked upon as startling and unique, but her example is being largely followed; the Duchess of Beaufort erewhile made a capital speech to the farmers on the estate, and Lady Clifden addressed her tenants last week at Gowran, Kilkenny, in as able a speech as one could have desired. It was delivered in a clear, audible tone, with no superfluous matter whatever.

Among the recent obituary notices appear the names of Dean Milman, one of the most shining lights of our church, a voluminous writer, and a good man; and Mr. Higgins, the well-known "Jacob Omnium" of the Times celebrity; the tallest, broadest man ever seen in the ride or drive in Hyde Park. We shall miss him next year from his old haunts. He died quite suddenly at his pretty house at Kingston.

It was with a feeling of general regret that we read in the morning papers the other day in sensational type, "Great fire at Northumberland House;" but it was quite a relief to know, subsequently, that, though the fire attacked both the ball-room and picture-gallery, the mischief done was very slight. This gallery is very fine, about 106 feet long by 27 wide, and contains some first-rate copies of some of the best masters, with a few originals of value. The best pictures in the possession of the Northumberland family, however, are at Alnwick Castle. Northumberland House is quite one of the most notable houses in London; it was built in 1605 by Henry Howard, Earl of Northampton, on the site of the Hospital of St. Mary Brumeval. It was not until 1612, when Elizabeth, daughter of the Earl of Suffolk, married the then Earl of Northumberland, that it was called Northumberland House. The historical reminiscences connected with it are endless. It was here, in 1660, that General Monck proposed and planned the restoration of Charles II., here the proud Duke of Somerset resided in great state after his marriage with the heiress of the Percy estates. Now, after various changes and enlargements, it presents a fine stone façade to the Strand, the central gateway surmounted by a lion passant, the crest of the Percys. It is an old joke among Londoners to make a bet whether the said lion's tail points up the Strand or down. Within there are long ranges of private apartments as well as state ones worthy of the fine old edifice. Several entertainments have been given within its walls this year. The true cause of the fire, as it generally happens, has not yet transpired.

The Marquis of Bute, one of the richest noblemen of the day, came of age lately. He is the happy possessor of £300,000 a year, and the world is prepared to fall down and worship him accordingly. Columns of the daily papers have been filled with the accounts of the rejoicings at his coming of age. At Cardiff, where a great deal of his property lies, there was quite a week of gay doings, and the young Marquis was welcomed with almost regal honors. So busy have people been with him and his concerns that it has been circulated about that he had joined the Roman Catholic Church, an assertion which he has written to some of the papers to refute. It seems to be pretty certain that he is engaged to a daughter of the Marquis of Abercorn—a family so celebrated for their beauty that they are known by the name of "the handsome Hamiltons." It is to be hoped that he will not waste his substance in the way that some other young noblemen have done. Lord Hastings—the Marquis I mean, for there are several Lord Hastings—had, when he came of age, over and above a magnificent income, a large sum of ready money, which had accumulated during his minority; he has contrived to run through it all very nearly by gambling, and he is now described as much broken in health and spirits. What careful forefathers take centuries to accumulate a spendthrift can squander in as many months!

CHAPTER XIII.

THE CHARCOAL-BURNER.

THE afternoon sun was declining as Otto Hemmerich approached Horn. He had walked from Detmold, and had taken more time for his journey than would have been necessary had he kept steadily to the high-road. But he could not resist the temptation of turning aside into the thick woods that he knew and loved so well. They were not leafy and green at this time of year, but in Otto's eyes the winter forest had a beauty of its own. Here and there evergreens showed a mass of dark foliage, contrasting with the silver stem of the beech, or the long, delicate, drooping boughs of the birch. In many a tangled growth of thicket and underwood the dog-rose bushes put forth their crimson berries, and the plume-headed mountain-ash was studded with rich clusters of coral fruit. In the darkest and most shaded hollows patches of snow still lingered, sheltered as they were from the noontide sun. By-and-by lily-of-the-valley, crocus, violet, and primrose, would peer out in these woodland dingles, but now the white snow lay light and warm above the tender plants, like a coverlet of swan's-down on a sleeping infant.

Otto walked on briskly, drinking in the air and odor of the forest with intense enjoyment. Presently, with the scent of dead leaves and the aromatic breath of pine-trees, mingled the pungent smell of burning wood. "Charcoal-burners," thought Otto to himself; and as he thought so he came upon a space cleared in the heart of the woodland, where stood a pile of logs plastered over with earth and turf. From this pile an acrid smoke ascended. The grass was charred and blackened in a circle all around it. One long, half-decayed trunk of a tree lay on the ground, and served as a seat for a solitary man who was eating his supper there. He appeared to be the only living thing in the cleared space of land, and looked wild and strange enough with his blackened face and garments, and an unkempt shock of long hair that fell nearly to his shoulders. He held a formidable-looking clasp-knife in his hand, and kept cutting off huge lumps from a loaf and a sausage that lay on the tree-trunk across which he sat astride. Every now and then he took a draught from a flat stone bottle, and then began eating again.

"Good-evening, friend," said Otto, coming cheerily out of the forest path, checkered with sunlight, into the damp, desolate hollow. The man looked up without raising his head, and the whites of his eyes gleamed ghastly out of his black face. He surveyed Otto very leisurely and deliberately for a few moments, and then took another pull at the flat stone bottle without having uttered a word.

"Good-evening, friend," repeated Otto, in a louder tone, thinking that the man had not heard him.

"Good-evening, cousin," answered the charcoal-burner very slowly, and in a gruff voice.

"Cousin! Nay, how may that be?" said Otto, laughing, although there was something in the man's manner that impressed him in spite of himself. "All men are brethren, I've heard say, but cousin!—that's another matter."

"Ay, ay," said the grim stranger, nodding his

"Ach so! You stick to that? Well, first answer me one thing. Do you remember your mother?"

"Remember her! Remember my blessed mother! It's but little I shall remember when I've forgotten her."

"Your mother and I were first cousins—brothers' children. Ach, little Lotte Müller! How pretty she was, and how good! Yes, for all she was but a charcoal-burner's daughter, and your father was the Prince's head-ranger, I always said, and I say still, that Hemmerich got a prize when he got Lottchen to be his wife."

Otto came close up to his new-found relative and held out his hand. The charcoal-burner looked at it doubtfully for a moment, and then said, "Well, I shouldn't have thought that old Simon Schnarcher's grand-nephew would have gripped the hand of such a one as me."

"Try!" said Otto, and taking the other's grimy paw in his, he pressed it with all the force of his vigorous young muscles.

"Potztausend! You've a neat little fist of your own. And so you are not ashamed of your mother's kin, then?"

"Ashamed? That's the second time you have said something about being ashamed. Look ye, cousin—if cousin you be—if you go on in that way I shall begin to think that there is some special reason for being ashamed of you."

"GOOD-EVENING, FRIEND."

head once or twice, "you're ashamed to call kin with such as me. But you and I are cousins, my youngster, all the same."

"Ashamed!" cried Otto, in his clear, ringing tones, that made the woodland echo, "not I! Whether there's anything shameful about you, you best know. But, any way, it can't be my fault, seeing that I never set eyes on you until this moment."

"Don't be too sure of that. I've seen you many a time when you were a little toddling brat, and I carried you on my shoulder once up the Grotenberg to see a great hunting there was down in the valley, when your father, the head-ranger, was brave in his green and gold."

Otto passed his hand over his forehead and looked fixedly at the man.

"What you say seems to bring back something that I saw once. But it is like a dream. Who are you? And why do you call me cousin?"

"Humph! Who am I? Well, I should think you could see for yourself that I'm neither king nor kaiser, but only a poor charcoal-burner—unless you take me for the Black Huntsman that head-ranger Hemmerich used to tell so many stories about."

"I don't think any of his stories related that the Black Huntsman was ever seen to eat wedges of bread and sausage as big as my fist. But you haven't answered my question. Why do you call me cousin?"

"Well, so there is," answered the charcoal-burner, doggedly. "I'm poor. I have to work hard for my living—and scant living it is sometimes. I have neither land nor learning, nor—worse than all—money."

"Redet Geld, So schweigt die Welt."

When gold speaks the world holds its tongue. Ask the Herr Küster if it be not so. I'll warrant he'll tell you that that is good doctrine."

"So much the worse for the world then, that's all. And, at that rate, I am no better off than yourself, for I have not a kreutzer to call my own. But now tell me your name, cousin, and tell me, too, why I have lived all these years without hearing that there was any relative of my blessed mother's left alive."

The man hesitated for some time before replying, and gazed very searchingly into Otto's frank young face.

"Ah!" said he, at last, "you look honest and kind. But I've known as honest and kind-looking as you turn out hollow at heart than a rotten apple."

"You have been unfortunate, kinsman?"

"Unfortunate! Well, my misfortunes are neither here nor there. You asked me what my name was. I'm called Joachim Müller."

"Joachim! Joachim Müller!" repeated Otto, pondering. "I'm quite sure I have heard my father and mother speak of you, cousin Joachim."

"Like enough. But it must be many a long year ago. Umph! 'Cousin Joachim!' I never thought to be so called again. I don't know what bewitched me to speak to you as I did. I'd best have left it alone. There's neither pleasure nor profit to be got out of my acquaintance."

To appeal to Otto's pity was to appeal to a very soft place in his heart. And there was something that touched him in the downcast, drooping attitude of the solitary man, and in his half-sullen, half-melancholy manner. Otto seated himself beside the charcoal-burner on the tree-trunk, and spoke to him cheerily.

"Come, come, cousin Joachim, you'll have to get used to being called by the old name again. I haven't so many relations but what I'm glad enough to cling to any of my dead mother's kinsfolk. But tell me how it has happened that we have not made each other's acquaintance before now."

It was not easy to resist Otto's pleasant voice and open manner. There was the ring of sterling metal about all he said. He was utterly free from small suspicions, and seemed habitually to expect other people to be sincere and straightforward—not a bad method, by-the-way, of making them so.

Gradually Joachim thawed under his young cousin's influence, and began to relate his history—in a disjointed, rambling way, however, and with many suppressions and reservations. His father, he said, had been a charcoal-burner employed in the princely woods of Detmold. He and Lotte (Otto's mother) had been friends from childhood, and when his pretty cousin made the prosperous marriage with the head-ranger, Joachim—then a lad of sixteen—had been kindly treated by her and by her husband. But about three years after the date of Otto's birth, Joachim Müller's father removed with his family to Pymont. And the Hemmerichs lost sight of them altogether. About his subsequent life and adventures Joachim either could not or would not speak very explicitly.

At Pymont he had been employed as a donkey-boy, to guide the animals provided for the use of the fashionable visitors who came to drink the waters there. In this capacity he had attracted the notice of a noble family, and had been taken into their service as stable-boy. He had traveled with them. He had been south as far as Vienna. But this opening had not availed to bring him permanent prosperity. Ill-luck, he averred, had pursued him all his life. After many vicissitudes, he had returned to his own part of Germany to find all his kinsfolk dead, and his very name forgotten. With difficulty he had obtained employment in his father's old trade of charcoal-burning, and had now been for some months leading a lonely, half-savage life in the forests of Detmold.

"But," said Otto, who had listened attentively to the man's narrative, "if you have been so long absent from Detmold, how did you recognize me?"

"As to knowing you by sight, youngster, I have had my eyes on you more than once during the last three months, when you have been tramping through the woods about Detmold. There is never a jager in the Prince's service but could tell me who you were."

"Then why, in Gottes namen, didn't you hail me sooner, cousin Joachim?"

"Why, lad," cried Joachim, rising suddenly and standing before Otto, "you ask why? Could I suppose that you would care to have any thing to say to me when I was told that the miserly old sacristan had adopted you for his heir? He never loved any of my kith and kin, and 'twasn't likely that he would teach you to love them. Besides, there are some would tell you that it was a disgrace to shake me by the hand. Oh, you needn't be afraid, Otto Hemmerich! The worst that can happen to you will be a little charcoal-dust. There's no stain on my hand that can't be washed off. Believe that, Otto. I have met with so much injustice that I thought I had grown to care nothing for the opinion of man or woman. But I shouldn't like your father's son to think ill of me. I had made up my mind never to speak to you; to make no sign, but just to slink out of sight if you came in my way, like a wild beast of the forest. But you took me unawares, and something in the look of you, and in the tone of your voice, brought back the old times somehow. You have said the first kind words that have been spoken to me for this many a day, and I sha'n't forget them."

He made as though he were going away, turning in the direction of a narrow foot-path that led into the heart of the forest. Otto stopped him.

"Stay," said he; "halt a moment, kinsman! When and where can I see you again? Don't run off and disappear in that fashion, as though you were really the Black Huntsman in earnest."

Joachim Müller stood for a while with his eyes fixed moodily on the ground. Then he raised them to Otto's with a piercing glance, and answered, "You are a right good fellow, Otto Hemmerich, and I would not get you into trouble with your grand-uncle if I could help it. Take my advice, and keep your own counsel about having seen me. The sacristan, likely enough, has never heard my name, but any way he could hear nothing about me that would please him overmuch. If ever you wish to see and speak with me, chalk three white crosses on the bark of the hollow oak-tree that stands in the glade leading to the Denkmal, on the top of the Grotenberg. Within four-and-twenty hours afterward I will be there to meet you. Lebe wohl. Auf Wiedersehen."

With that he turned abruptly, leaped over the prostrate tree-trunk, and plunged into the fast deepening twilight of the thickest woodland.

SISTER PATROCINIO, "THE BLEEDING NUN."

ISABELLA THE SECOND OF SPAIN.

ON a raw, chilly, winter day in the year 1865, between eight and nine in the morning, a middle-aged gentleman of distinguished appearance, and dressed in the gorgeous costume of Spanish Minister of State, was seen hastening from the Puerta del Sol in Madrid toward the royal palace. Upon reaching the latter he entered the main portal, scarcely deigning to acknowledge the salute of the sentinels who presented arms to him, nor the greeting of the lackeys and courtiers, who, at that early hour, already were lounging in the vestibule and hall of the palace. Evidently a prey to the utmost agitation, the gentleman hurriedly ascended the broad staircase, turned on the first-floor into the corridor on the left, leading to the apartments occupied by the royal family, and entered the ante-chamber of the Queen's reception-room almost before the lackey in his gold-embroidered blue livery, who opened the door to him, had had time to shout, "His Excellency the Prime Minister, Duke de Tetuan, Marshal O'Donnell!"

In the ante-room the Marshal was met by the sleepy-looking Chamberlain in waiting, who had just jumped up from the easy-chair in which he had been dozing, and now fixed his eyes inquiringly on the flushed and agitated face of the then all-powerful soldier and statesman.

"I must see her Majesty immediately," said O'Donnell, imperatively. "Go and tell her that I must see her immediately."

"But your Excellency is aware," replied the Chamberlain, respectfully, "that her Majesty never rises at so early an hour, and that we have received stringent orders not to wake her up under any pretext whatever."

"I must see her Majesty," impatiently said the Minister, knitting his brow; "I have intelligence of the highest importance to communicate to her. You must have her waked up. Do so at my responsibility."

The Chamberlain hesitated for a moment, but the almost threatening scowl on the Prime Minister's face quickly overcame his scruples, and, with a bow, he disappeared by the door leading to her Majesty's reception-room. The Prime Minister meanwhile walked up and down in great agitation. When the door opened again a few minutes afterward the Chamberlain reappeared, accompanied by the royal Mistress of Ceremonies. Bowing deeply to the Prime Minister, who acknowledged her greeting merely by a slight nod of his head, she informed him that her Majesty had gone to bed at a very late hour last night, and that she could not venture to wake her up under any circumstances. Something like an imprecation burst from the lips of the Prime Minister, and for a moment it seemed as if he was determined to force his way into the Queen's apartments in spite of the Mistress of Ceremonies, the Chamberlain, and the rules of Court etiquette. But he thought better of it, hastened to the window, drew a memorandum-book from his pocket, tore a leaf from it, and with a lead-pencil dashed off a few lines on it. "There," he said, folding up the paper, and handing it to the Mistress of Ceremonies, "you will deliver this immediately to her Majesty, do you hear, immediately!"

The tone of the Prime Minister was so imperative that the Mistress of Ceremonies bowed in silence and left the room. When she returned, ten minutes afterward, something like a malicious smile played around her lips; and, bowing even more profoundly than before, she said, "Her Majesty instructs me to inform your Excellency that she will receive you at noon."

The Prime Minister, firmly compressing his lips, replied not a word, but, turning on his heel, rushed out of the room and slammed the door after him. Outside he turned at first toward the staircase in order to leave the palace; but he suddenly changed his mind, retraced his steps, and opened the door leading to the apartments of the King-Consort, Don Francis de Assis. He was instantly admitted to the presence of this distinguished man, whose habits and tastes were in every respect widely different from those of his royal wife, and who, while Isabella generally slept until noon and even longer, always rose at daybreak to work during the morning hours in his room, which looked more like a mechanic's work-shop than the apartment of a king, now as a mechanic, now as a wood-turner,

Nothing could be more striking than the contrast presented by these two men as they now met face to face; O'Donnell, tall, dignified, and bearing the stamp of his manly and resolute character in his every movement and feature; and the King-Consort with his by no means intellectual, pale face, his lustreless eyes, his slender figure, and awkward, shy bearing—the very embodiment of weakness and insignificance. Don Francis is naturally a well-meaning, kind-hearted man; but fifteen years of court-life, and, moreover, Spanish court-life, the false position in which he always found himself there, the contempt with which his consort treated him from the first day when her mother told her that Don Francis was to be her husband, the open disdain which he always met at the hands of his children, and the impertinence of the courtiers, who often made him the butt of practical jokes, and never spoke of him but in terms of derision—all this, coupled with his strange thin soprano voice, his awkward manners, and his timidity, made the King-Consort a downright caricature upon royalty.

On this occasion, as he stood before O'Donnell, he appeared to even greater disadvantage than usual. The Prime Minister told him, almost in the tone of a superior, what he had written before to Queen Isabella on the leaf torn from his memorandum-book; he told him that an insurrection had broken out; that General Juan Prim, Count de Reus, was at the head of the rising; that it was not a mere pronunciamento, but that the situation was grave; and that it was of the utmost importance for the Government to take quick and decisive steps: he complained bitterly of the Queen's refusal to admit him, and urged the King-Consort to procure him an interview with her Majesty at the earliest moment possible. Poor Don Francis was greatly frightened, and promised to do all he could; but the manner in which he shrugged his shoulders seemed to indicate that he himself did not think he could do much in that direction. A few words more passed between the two gentlemen, whereupon O'Donnell left the palace hurriedly.

Instead of accompanying him or remaining with the King-Consort, who went back to his work-shop, let us return to the Queen's apartments, and see how Isabella the Second passed that day on which both her Ministers and the people of Madrid believed that the fate of the Spanish Bourbons hung trembling in the balance. The "Open Letter to the Spanish Nation," which General Prim issued after his first attempt to overthrow the Government had failed, and in which he gives a somewhat minute account of the doings of Queen Isabella on that eventful day, enables us to follow Her Castilian Majesty from hour to hour, and almost step by step.

It is 12 o'clock. The Queen has just risen from her bed. The startling lines which Marshal O'Donnell had sent her a few hours ago, and which had not prevented her from continuing her repose, to all appearance had not filled her with the slightest uneasiness. She reclines with a most serene face in her sumptuous chaise-longue, chatting gayly with her three maids, who are engaged in dressing her. One of these maids is Pepita, the Queen's foster-sister, a tall, slender, handsome Basque woman, with dark hair and flashing black eyes. As she played with little Isabella thirty years ago on terms of perfect equality, so she treats Her Majesty now with the utmost familiarity. She is exceedingly talkative, and as she retails to her royal mistress little bits of palace gossip Isabella interrupts her every now and then with loud laughter. Nor is her bearing toward the other servants more dignified. The two other maids occasionally drop remarks in a scarcely less familiar tone, and the Queen never rebukes them for it, but rather seems to like it. Surely royal majesty never seemed less royal and majestic than in the person of this Spanish Queen as she appears to us at this moment. Her every movement is undignified, and a certain careless languor, not to say laziness, and, we may add, vulgarity, seem to be the principal traits of her character. She is only thirty-seven years old, but she looks like a woman of forty-five. Her face is broad and almost round; her features are not exactly irregular, but coarse and hard. Her nose is slightly retroussé, and the peculiar and rather unpleasant manner in which she every now and then draws down her upper lip seems greatly to enlarge her not very shapely nostrils. Fortunately she did not inherit the enormous nose of her father, Ferdinand, who was indebted to it for the unpleasant nickname Nazirota; but she did inherit his blue eyes, which, small as they are, seem still smaller in her large, fleshy face. Her hair is of a fine chestnut color, and still exceedingly luxuriant, though not so beautiful as that for which her mother, Maria Christina, was so much admired. To her mother the Queen bears no resemblance whatever, and no more striking contrast could be imagined than when the still graceful, slender, and refined-looking Maria Christina and the coarse and awkward Isabella were seen side by side.

The Mistress of Ceremonies opens the door and ushers in a tall, shriveled old lady with gray hair and small, twinkling eyes, in the unbecoming garb of a prioress of Ursulines. It is the famous nun Patrocinio, whom the Queen almost worships, and who, at that time, enjoyed alone in all Spain the privilege of entering the Queen's room without being announced to her. Isabella's acquaintance with her was not of very long standing. In 1860 one of her little daughters was dangerously sick, and the Queen, who—to her honor be it said—is a very affectionate mother, was overwhelmed with grief when the physicians told her that her child could not live for any length of time. Her attention was then called to the fact that the prioress of the Ursuline convent at Capistra in Aragon had for several years past performed a number of miraculous cures by allowing patients of all ages to wear shirts or underclothing that had touched her body, on which there were five running sores. The Queen instantly set out with her little daughter for the Ursuline convent at Capistra. Upon her arrival there Sister Patrocinio wrapped the little patient in one of her shirts, and it is said that the recovery of the Infanta began with the day on which the Queen reached the convent. In her gratitude toward and veneration for Sister Patrocinio, Isabella prevailed on the nun to accompany her to Madrid; and thenceforth the nun Patrocinio became the most influential personage at the Spanish court, the Queen treating her, not as an inferior, but as a mother and an adviser, to whose views ought to be paid more deference than to those of any body else. The nun, a woman of an intriguing turn of mind, thus became the soul of the court-camarilla; she was hated alike by the Ministers and the people, and, till her death, exercised a decisive influence upon the policy of Spain. As the people of Madrid used to say, she was the biggest nail in the coffin of the Bourbon dynasty.

Her appearance in the Queen's room immediately hushed the merry conversation of the Queen with Pepita and her other maids; and the Queen, rising respectfully from her chaise-longue, offered her lips to the nun, who kissed them as well as the Queen's hand. A chair was then placed beside that of the Queen, and the two ladies were soon engaged in an animated conversation, during which the maids continued dressing the Queen. At last Her Majesty's toilette was completed, and she prepared to leave her bedroom. Her toilette, as usual, was rather gorgeous, but by no means tasteful. She mostly wears dresses of heavy crimson velvet trimmed with golden fringes, and embroidered with the same material on the sleeves and breast. Massive golden bracelets, often three and even four at the same time, encircle her full, round arms; a small black lace cap adorns her head, and a large white lace collar fastened with a superb brooch covers her bust and neck, the broad ribbon of the Isabella order being wound round her waist and right shoulder.

The Mistress of Ceremonies has already informed Her Majesty once or twice that the Cabinet Ministers are waiting for her at the Council Chamber; but the Queen, forgetful of the maxim that punctuality is the politeness of kings, does not start for the Council Chamber until long after the appointed hour, and, to all appearance, with the greatest reluctance.

When she finally, preceded by the Mistress of Ceremonies, who is joined outside by two chamberlains, enters the corridor we are struck by the strange manner in which she walks. Nothing can be more ungraceful than her gait. It is slow, and the people of Madrid were justified in saying, rather irreverently, "Her Majesty does not walk, she waddles." In fact, Isabella moves to and fro at every step as she advances, owing to the shortness of her left leg, caused by a heavy fall in her early childhood.

At the Council Chamber she is received by her whole Cabinet. O'Donnell, Yzquierdo, Berolaz, and their colleagues, look exceedingly grave; but their care-worn and anxious expression seems not to disturb the serenity of the Queen at all. To all appearance she is utterly indifferent to the fact that the revolution is thundering at the gates of Madrid. She listens languidly to the reports of the Ministers; it is but rarely that she interrupts them with a monosyllabic remark, and she signs all documents that are laid before her, scarcely designing to glance at them. In justice to the Queen, however, we should bear in mind that she was then already accustomed to pronunciamientos and insurrections, and that she had been gradually led to believe that these risings, headed as they were by one or more of her ambitious generals, were directed, not against her dynasty, but against the Cabinet and party then in power. So her extreme indifference and nonchalance are not entirely inexplicable. In signing the documents laid before her the Queen never takes off the straw-colored kid gloves which she wears; for her hands are covered with a repulsive eruption, owing to a disease from which she has suffered from her earliest childhood, and of which she has never been cured in consequence of her unwillingness to confine herself to a spare diet. The Spaniards, as a general thing, care but very little for the pleasures of the table; but their Queen always was an epicure, as we shall see now that she leaves the Council Chamber and repairs to the dining-room to take luncheon. Having breakfasted in bed already on a cup of chocolate and a few cakes, she now lunches on pâté de foie gras, drinks Champagne and sweet Alicante to it, and, during the hour which she passes at the table, she scarcely finds time to exchange a few words with her sister, Donna Luisa, or the husband of the latter, Louis Philippe's fourth son; nor does she say any thing to her husband, Don Francis, who sits opposite to her. When luncheon is over she goes to the chapel to hear what is called early mass; but it is already between three and four in the afternoon, and the poor chaplains who officiate in the royal chapel, and who have had to fast entirely till that hour, do not think that it is so very early in the day. Although the Queen is exceedingly particular in the performance of her religious duties, it is said that she often dozes in the royal chapel, the close atmosphere of the gorgeous sanctuary, impregnated with incense, probably proving too much for her natural languor.

From the chapel Queen Isabella proceeds to the nursery. The nursery is a suite of four or five rooms in the western wing of the palace. It is here that her Majesty makes the most favorable impression upon us. As we said before she is an affectionate mother, and her small blue eyes beam with delight as she embraces her children, who are brought to her by their nurses and governesses. The Queen has seven children living, of whom, at the time of which we are speaking, the eldest, a beautiful dark-haired and dark-eyed girl of fourteen—now the wife of the Duke of Girgenti—was the Queen's darling. The young lady was noted at court for her somewhat petulant and self-willed character; but at the same time she was exceedingly kind-hearted, and, in consequence, her relatives and servants were much attached to her. She was at first decidedly opposed to her union with the brother of the ex-King of Naples; but when she made the acquaintance of the husband whom her mother had chosen for her, and who, though he is the son of King Bomba, is believed to be a very good young man. She told him at once with charming naïveté that she would be glad to take him, and the young couple are believed to live very happily together. As regards the rest of the Queen's children they are mostly pale and sickly, and by no means good-looking. Especially is this the case with the young Prince of the Asturias, a scrofulous boy of eleven, whose stubborn, peevish character has already driven a dozen governesses and tutors to despair, and who was already in his earliest boyhood so unpopular in Madrid that the people freely expressed the hope he might never ascend the Spanish throne. We can not wonder, therefore, that the recent attempt to proclaim him King of Spain under a liberal regency proved so utterly fruitless.

As usual the Queen went on that day with all her children to the Retiro—that quiet, charming promenade close to the royal palace, from which the general public was carefully excluded whenever the royal family intended to take a walk in it. On very fine days the Queen would appear in a carriage or on horseback on the public promenade; for, awkward as she is as a pedestrian, she is a very graceful and even intrepid horsewoman; and the people of Madrid say that she takes special and rather malicious delight in asking the King-Consort, who is known to be utterly averse to riding on horseback, and who can never find a charger gentle and quiet enough for him, to accompany her on such occasions.

From the promenade the Queen went to dinner, where she never staid less than between two and three hours. Isabella has always been a gourmande, and from her earliest youth her appetite has been enormous. In Madrid she is considered a glutton; and to the Spaniards, who are so abstemious, gluttony is even more repulsive than to other nations: so that Isabella's performance at the dinner-table have added as much to her unpopularity as her love-affairs. She seldom admits many guests to her table beside her relatives, and few of her Ministers or of the foreign ambassadors can boast of having often been invited to the royal table.

After dinner the Queen used to hold a short siesta, or chatted and played for half an hour with her children; and then the gala carriages were ordered, and the whole family drove to the opera. The Opera-house is situated very close to the royal palace, but the Queen never repaired thither but with the display of considerable pomp. Outriders heralded her coming on these occasions, and her equipage was escorted by half a squadron of dragoons of the guard. The regularity with which the Queen visited the opera, however, should not be taken as evidence of her musical taste; on the contrary, it is said that she never inquires for the name of any opera which she sees performed, and often falls asleep during the representation; at all events, she always left the opera shortly after 9 o'clock. Upon her return to the palace she used to receive her Ministers and distinguished foreigners, spend an hour or two at the supper-table, and then retired to her private apartments.

It was in this manner that the Queen spent nearly every day for many years past. Her mother, Maria Christina, was by no means destitute of accomplishments. She possessed great skill in all kinds of needle-work, took much interest in the new productions of belles-lettres, and was a very pleasant and entertaining conversationalist. Her daughter Isabella inherited none of these qualities. Her enemies say that she never read a book in her life, and that she seldom opens the newspapers which are laid before her. In needle-work and all other employments in which the royal ladies of Europe engage, she takes little or no interest. Listening to the gossip of her confidantes, most of whom are persons that would hardly be admitted to respectable families; extending the hours of repose until a very late hour; devoting five and often six hours daily to the pleasures of the table; playing with her children in the nursery, or walking with them in the Retiro; yawning at the opera, and paying very little attention to state affairs: such was the routine of the Queen's life. That a sovereign leading such a life, and constantly identifying herself with the most oppressive despotism, was thoroughly detested and despised by a people, despite all its faults, proud, ambitious, and high-spirited, can not surprise any one.

"OUR COMPANY."

A PASSAGE in Miss Austen's "Sense and Sensibility," one of those novels which still live, and deserve to live, were it only to remind us how writers of the pre-sensational school contrived to amuse and instruct the novel-reading public, has just revived my recollections of a somewhat interesting little chapter in my own family history.

John Dashwood, a husband of the Caudle style, suggests to his managing wife Fanny, that his sisters Elinor ("Sense") and Marianne ("Sensibility") are in London, and might very well be invited to spend a few days with them. Fanny did not like these young ladies, and was startled at the proposal.

"I do not see how it can be done," said she, "without affronting Lady Middleton, for they spend every day with her; otherwise I should be exceedingly glad to do it. You know I am always glad to pay them any attention in my power, but they are Lady Middleton's visitors. How can I ask them away from her?"

Her husband, but with great humility, did not see the force of her objection. "They have already spent a week in this manner in Conduit Street, and Lady Middleton could not be displeased at their giving the same number of days to such near relations," said he.

Perhaps John Dashwood, over-goodnatured himself, mistook the temper of Lady Middleton as much as I did that of Sister Sarah, and might, if his selfish and shrewd wife had not defeated his plan, have found himself in as much trouble as I did when I ventured, conformably to my wife Katy's hospitable wishes, to invite some of our near relations who were visiting Sister Sarah to come out into the suburbs and pass a few days with us.

"My dear," said Katy, as I was kissing her and the girls good-morning on the piazza of our cottage at Wildwood one lovely June morning, when starting for my office in the city—(my wife and children always prepared me in this way for my official labors, sometimes on the piazza, but oftener at the front gate under the woodbine)—"My dear, I wish you would call on Sister Sarah to-day or send her a note, and ask her to let Jessie and the Newport boys come out with you and stay here a few days. Tell her we all want to see them, and shall be glad to have her and Brother Jim drive out while they are here, and have a regular feast of strawberries."

"Oh do!" cried Dah-Dah; "do, father, and tell them about the new boat, and what capital fishing it is. The boys love fishing!"

"Yes, do, father," echoed Bel-bel; "and don't take 'no' for an answer. I wish you would see them yourself, and make them come."

I was delighted with the suggestion. We all loved Jessie, our niece, and the boys Ed and Sam, our Newport cousins, and felt that it would be a shame to let them go home to New Hampshire and Rhode Island, after a fortnight's visit with Aunt Sarah, as my girls called my smart Boston sister-in-law, without a taste of the Wildwood boating, fishing, and strawberries. Little did I foresee the excitement that would be created by my assenting to their proposition, and honestly endeavoring to carry it into execution. Unluckily I had not recently studied Sense and Sensibility, volume ii., chapter 14, and so, in a rash hour, I promised to do all that my darlings desired.

It does not need long to inform you that Jessie was a charming girl, tenderly loved by us all—that we saw her only once or twice a year, and every time we did see her wished to keep her as long as possible in our society. I might say substantially the same of the Newport boys—handsome, gay, and intelligent youngsters—the unspoiled pets of all who knew them. Nor need I linger long to state that while we—that is, my family—lived in the country in just the prettiest cottage that Gilman ever planned, Sister Sarah resided in the city, and occupied an elegant mansion in a stylish street. She was hospitable, generous, loving, but rather young and quick-tempered, and sometimes I fancied she put on city airs. Doubtless it was mere fancy.

I got to my office before nine o'clock, and, finding several clients waiting, determined to send a note to Sister Sarah, instead of calling on her in person with the invitation. Posterity will lament that I kept no copy of that note; but I remember that it was full of kind messages, and begged her to spare Jessie and the boys to us, her rustic relations, for a few days, and during that time to come out with Brother Jim and spend a long afternoon and evening.

My office boy, after a delay so long as to remind me of Dick Swiveller's loiterings on the Bevis Marks errands of Sampson Brass, Esq., returned with an answer to my untimely billet. That answer was inscribed on elegant note-paper, surmounted by an elaborate Gimbredé monogram, and inclosed in a superb envelope; but, oddly enough, the envelope was fastened by a pin—yes, a common brass pin half an inch long!

The contents were as follows:

"21st June, Thursday.
"MY DEAR BROTHER,—Jessie will not be able to visit you at present. We invited the young gentlemen from Newport particularly on her account, and we shall not consent to her leaving us while they are with us."

"Ed and Sam say they will try to call on you at Wildwood; but I doubt it—for they have an engagement for this evening, another for to-morrow, and for next week several others."

"Now, you see, we are very determined not to part with our company. I think you will have to wait till the next time they visit Boston."

Very truly,
SARAH —."

It is many years since I received that note; and as I read it now it does not seem charged with the electricity which snapped from it into my elbows as I read it then. Then it both vexed and amused me, and I resolved to answer it with a humility of penitence so elaborate that her elbows should, like mine, tingle a little.

In a few minutes my Swiveller was on his way back to Mount Vernon Street with the following reply, duly enveloped, and sealed with perfumed wax:

"21st June.
"From my benighted and obscure den in Court Street."

"ACCOMPLISHED AND DEARLY-BELOVED SISTER,—Many thanks for your note of this morning. I confess that I had not, until after the reception of that note, fully felt or understood how complete a monopoly you are entitled to hold and enjoy in those charming cousins, male and female, whom you have yourself imported, 'regardless of expense,' for your own special, individual, and peculiar use, comfort, and ornament, from Concord and Newport."

"But my eyes and my understanding are opened now, and my conscience pricked deep. I humbly beg pardon, feeling the full enormity of my error. My only excuse is that I sinned without malice. My only hope is in your extraordinary and enormous clemency. I ought, I now admit, to have reflected that if I myself had procured an elephant from Siam, a lion from Sierra Leone, and a boa-constrictor from Brazil they would have been my own exclusive luxury, not to be borrowed, nor even seen, without my being first consulted. Stupid mortal that I am! I had till now foolishly fancied that, when my Rhode Island and New Hampshire relatives came to Boston, even if specially invited by my hospitable friends in Mount Vernon Street, we 'outside barbarians' of Wildwood could properly come in, without invitation, to see them, and might, without sin, invite them to come and see us."

"It was a grievous mistake, I now perceive, and would fain expiate my offense. What can I do to atone for my transgression?"

"Dah-Dah was intending to call this very forenoon at your house, with the culpable, though ignorantly culpable, purpose of—trepanning—kidnapping—abducting—what shall I call it?—either one or all of your elephants and lions—pshaw! I mean guests—as well as some of your children, and carrying them captive to that terra incognita—Wildwood. But since receiving your note"—(this was true, and ought to have been mentioned before, but it had escaped my memory)—"I have forbidden her to perpetrate or attempt such an enormity. You see, I try to do right. Be merciful, therefore. We will wait penitently and patiently till we receive some gracious intimation of your forgiveness; and, in the mean time, we shall try not to be too envious of your good fortune in being the sole proprietor of so rich a collection, each one of whose members is a unique specimen."

"It is wonderful (not that living so long in the country should have made us forget that we have no right to a share in the society of friends who come into our neighborhood on other people's invitation; oh no! that is not strange; but it is, I submit to you, somewhat wonderful) that, after I have been rusticated so long, and so long shut out from that glorious gas-light of conventional civilization which shines only in the metropolis, I should still be able, within one minute after reading your brief note, to remember and feel so deeply how right you are, and how wrong I was! Is there not some hope of me, even now? At least, believe me anxious to be well-taught and grateful for all good lessons."

"Your affectionate though erring Brother,

"SISTER SARAH. NOEL."

"P.S.—Please don't let the young gentlemen invited from Newport, nor any other of the invited, know how great a mistake I was about to commit. Spare my 'feeling.' Excuse me, also, for reading instead of pinning my envelope. It would be rude, I suppose, to send back your pin, and, alas! I have no other, and so I must be content with obsolete wax."

Ever yours,
N."

This too elaborate reply was received with a good-nature that it did not wholly deserve. I would never have recorded it or its fate had it been the occasion of any unkind feeling or act.

Sarah answered it instantly in these words:

"DEARLY BELOVED,—I have just received your letter, and acknowledge myself completely used up. Of course I should not think of replying to it, but that I am really sorry that you feel a little wrath with me. Why not come and bring Dah-Dah to dinner? I will be dreadfully polite to you."

"I have taken the idea that I ought to have sent for Dah-Dah (she can come to-day or to-morrow) to come and see our elephant (Jessie), rhinoceros (Sam), and bore-constrictor (Ed); but it was thoughtlessness on my part, not willful neglect. Come."

"Your very affectionate Sister, SARAH."

Dear Sarah! We went, I and my child, and dined there, that very day, and a delightful dinner did we all have—menagerie, proprietors, and guests! We all laughed heartily over this correspondence, and then we all adjourned by an early train to Wildwood, and there, at eight in the evening, over our strawberries and ice-cream, did the two families and their three well-loved guests hear read these now almost ancient letters with infinite amusement, and unanimously vote that they should be preserved among the family archives of NOEL.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

IMPATIENCE.—As we have often said, it is impossible to answer questions the week after they are received. The replies to our correspondents exact much time and pains, and are given at the earliest possible moment; those who do not find this speedy enough must necessarily seek advice elsewhere. When their letters are received, the following Number of the paper is usually made up and nearly ready for publication.

MATRON.—All that are essential to a good poultry are heat and moisture, and, provided these are secured, its composition is of no moment, whether it be of bread and milk, or water, or flax-seed. A flannel, in fact a piece of woolen cloth, wrung out of hot water, will answer every purpose.

LESLIE.—"The glories of our earthly state Are shadows, not substantial things." These lines are not from Shakespeare, but from James Shirley, a poet of the same time.

ANNA.—Consult your parents; you should have no such intimacy with a gentleman who does not visit your father's house.

HÉLOISE.—Mlle. de Camargo, whose name is now being used so freely by the modistes of Paris to dignify their various frivolities of dress, was a celebrated dancer in the time of Louis XV. She was famous for her beauty, coquetry, and graceful audacity of costume. In her own day all the fashions were called after her. There were dresses à la Camargo, hair à la Camargo, and sleeves à la Camargo. Her biographer says: "All the ladies of the Court imitated her grace; there were not a few who would have liked to copy her face."

STUDENT.—The state of the stomach has a great deal to do with the activity of the mind. The great Napoleon was paralyzed in action at Dresden by an indigestion caused by eating of a shoulder of mutton "stuffed with onions." At Leipsic and Borodino, too, he would have done more if he had eaten less. His stomach on both occasions was suffering from a surfeit.

H.—Entremets is the name the French give to what we call the side dishes.

SUBSCRIBER.—We consider the practice decidedly a bad one. Children should not be put off in the middle of the day with a meagre luncheon of a crust of bread or a cake and an apple. The most solid meal should be taken, especially by the young, as early as one o'clock P.M. Regularity also is of the utmost importance. The stomach always digests best when food is eaten habitually at the same hour.

H. L.—Corduroy is a thick heavy ribbed material, three-fourths of a yard wide, worth $2 a yard; is entirely of cotton, and may be washed without injury to the pile. It is the same material, with a slightly broader rib, that hunters choose for pantaloons on account of its durability. Ladies' suits of corduroy are made in the plainest manner—merely a sort of gored skirt and sacque. We think it will answer your purpose.—Round capes are more worn than jackets. They are made of scarlet cashmere, trimmed with pinked ruffles of the same or of small Rob Roy check. These are worn both by young girls and ladies for home dress.

MAG E.—A braided chignon placed so high that it meets the front crêpes is worn by young ladies. If the forehead is high wear frizzed curls falling over it; if it is low, plain crêpes. A long tress of crimped hair takes the place of the flowing curl.

Mrs. J. A.—Lama or Angora fringe is not a suitable trimming for silk. Any of the many pleated trimmings described in our previous Numbers would be in better taste. Your idea of the black silk over-dress and striped skirt is good; but as you are fond of novelty, we suggest that black cashmere and ribbed poplin are stylish materials for over-garments, especially when the striped under-dress is of woolen poplin like your sample. Lama fringe trims these tastefully. If you wish to make a street costume, only use the Camargo cloak pattern given in this Number. It will complete your costume stylishly, and serve to wear with other skirts. If you adhere to the silk skirt, make the front and side widths gored, the back full, Loop with deep pleats at the side. Short tight sacque with a pointed hood or a berth. Silk should be wadded, only woolen goods are lined with flannel. We described at length the manner of making a panier in Bazar No. 52. While Gabrielles are no longer quoted in Fashion reports they are occasionally made and indeed imported. Shorten your dress and trim with brown military braid. Loop the large cape in the back with rosettes. The three-cornered hat you allude to is probably the new Deauville. You can order it from the milliners whose names appear at the end of the New York Fashion article on bonnets.

Back Numbers of the Bazar are supplied at ten cents each. The Number on the wrapper of the Bazar is that with which the subscription ends. The first year ends with No. 61. Covers for the Bazar can be obtained at the end of the year.

C. L. C.—By "French models" we mean the dresses imported by modistes as patterns. Different systems are used by different dress-makers.

Mrs. S. A. N.—An Astrakhan cloak and muff sold for $100, or a French Cashmere shawl at $75 would suit your age. Read the article on cloaks in this Number of the Bazar.

CHLOE.—Silver chimes is a very pretty parlor as well as field game. It may be played either on the floor or a board provided for the purpose. The latter is preferable, as the balls are apt to roll under the furniture. In this form it consists in driving the balls against the raised edge of the board so as to rebound through little wickets, to which a bell is attached. The tinkling of this bell announces the success of the stroke and gives the game its name. A carom game can be played with the balls without the wickets; a sort of ladies' billiards. It can be procured at almost any book and stationery store.

VERONICA.—Read Fashions in Cards in Bazar No. 53. The titles Miss and Mr. are not so generally used as formerly.

L.—Modistes are making the wadded polonaise of silk, satin, poplin, and cashmere sufficiently heavy to be worn throughout the winter. Read the article on cloaks on another page. The cloth wrapping you speak of is in good taste trimmed with pleated frills or ruffles of faille, fringe, or bands of Astrakhan, or bias velvet and satin are also used.

Mrs. H. B. J.—If you are very short and fleshy the double skirt will not be becoming. A single skirt and baschlik is better for you. If you prefer two skirts, make the upper-skirt without a front width, buttoning to the under-skirt on the seams of the front. Trim with a pleated silk frill three inches wide, the pleats all running one way. The material of the dress makes a very nice trimming.

NELLIE.—Cut your corsage heart-shaped and wear with a white chemisette. You can also make a kind of yoke of the same material, to be worn inside the dress when you do not wish to use a chemisette. Tapes at the corners, tied under the arms, will keep it in place. Trim with two bands of velvet, bias, an inch wide, edged with narrow crocheted passementerie. Put these around the heart-shaped opening, one band on the wrist, another slanting at the elbow. Belt and loops at the back are trimmed in the same way, and a pointed apron is outlined on the front width. Small tassels at the points. If you object to velvet, use ruffles of the material or of silk. Cut your green plaid poplin just to escape the floor, scallop it, and bind with black silk, piped with green merino.

M. F. P.—When you do not gore the skirt at all you must begin the gathers far forward, within about three inches of the front. The ends of the blouse pattern fall over the hips under the belt of the skirt. This is the chemise Russe fashion adopted by French modistes instead of sewing the body and skirt together.

A SUBSCRIBER.—It is always etiquette to express gratitude for any service or act of courtesy however slight. You need not fear to "thank a gentleman for taking you to the opera," etc. All laws of ceremony worth obeying are in conformity with common-sense and require no profound insight to understand.

HATTIE.—A safe rouge may be thus compounded:

Powdered talc or French chalk.... 1½ ounces.
Carmine..... 18 grains.

INTERESTED INQUIRER.—The lotion recommended is perfectly safe and will have probably the desired effect. Try it.

Mrs. F. V. N.—White is first used to lighten mourning, then purple or gray, but always in conjunction with black.

J. B. M'K., FORT BARANCOAS, FLORIDA.—As an honorable man you should inform your betrothed that since your engagement with her you have met with another woman whom you prefer. She will probably release you; if not, you will have nothing to do but to fulfill your pledge and abide the consequences, whatever they may be.

C. C. R.—Drawing, engraving on wood, music, and the natural sciences, are taught gratuitously at the "Cooper Union" of New York. The schools are day and evening, but not boarding. Pupils must furnish their own books and materials. For admission satisfactory references as to character are required; and for the School of Science and Art, applicants for admission to the class in algebra are required to be proficient in arithmetic, as far at least as square root. Those who desire to enter any of the higher classes must be able to present satisfactory proof of a sufficient knowledge of the preliminary studies.

HENRY H.—We do not know that there is any rule in regard to the time allowed to expire between the engagement and day of marriage. This is generally left to the convenience of the parties interested, and especially to that of the lady. It is better, however, not to make too protracted a trial of "love deferred."

BURNETT'S COCAINE is a perfect hair-dressing for preserving and beautifying the hair, and rendering it dark and glossy. No other compound possesses the peculiar properties which so exactly suit the various conditions of the human hair. It is the best and cheapest hair-dressing in the world. For sale by all druggists.

MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN.—Now is the time to clear the complexion for the winter from those disagreeable discolorations, by using PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Sold by all Druggists.

How often do you hear the complaint from mother and father that their son or daughter is not well; that they have no appetite; that they feel languid; that their head aches; that they are growing thin and feeble, and that they have no life or energy left; that they are low-spirited, and perfectly incapacitated to participate in any pleasures, or perform any mental or physical duty. And the question is often asked, What shall I do for them? or, What shall I give them? Our answer is, let them try PLANTATION BITTERS moderately three times a day, and our word for it they will recover. —Freside Companion.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

CAN ANY ONE BEAT THIS?

OLD SAYBROOK, CONN.,
Sept. 26, 1868.

Messrs. Wheeler & Wilson:

GENTLEMEN,—I wish to say that I have in my family a "Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine" that has been in almost daily use for the past ten (10) years, and not a thing has ever been done to it in way of repairing—not a screw loose, or any part of it out of order in all that time. It has been used in making coats, vests, and pants, of the thickest of woolen goods, besides doing all kinds of family sewing, and is now, this day, the best machine for work I ever saw.

Can any one beat this?

Respectfully, GILBERT PRATT.

Any one who can beat this (and we think many can) will please address

Messrs. WHEELER & WILSON,

OPINION OF RISTORI.

PEOPLE will have the best of many things; and, moreover, the lady community demand for their own use LAIRD'S "BLOOM OF YOUTH," who seem to appreciate its intrinsic virtues, the bland influence of an artistic combination of purity—a harmonious whole that realizes the highest desire; who, conscious of the dignity of American refinement, can transfer their sanction from foreign articles of mediocre quality to an American production of high intrinsic excellence and chastely beautiful exterior; and who have abandoned the conventional fashions of the Old World for truthful developments in the New. Use nothing else for discolorations of the skin, brown and yellow spots, disagreeable blemishes, and particularly where the skin has been ruined with chalk and bismuth. Ladies, remember! The proprietor defies all competition in the production of the "BLOOM OF YOUTH." For sale by all druggists and fancy-goods dealers generally. Office, No. 74 Fulton Street, New York City.

Be particular to see that you get the genuine. It has the name of G. W. LAIRD blown in the glass on the back of each bottle.

Worthless imitations are in circulation. Beware of them. Do not allow yourself to be persuaded into buying other preparations.

MISS KELLOGG'S RETURN.

WE give herewith a new portrait of the favorite American prima donna, Miss Kellogg, taken since her return from Europe, where she won so marked and deserved a success. Miss Kellogg's reappearance at a concert at the New York Academy on the evening of October 19 was a true ovation. The building was crowded in every part by the admirers of the young cantatrice. The concert itself was a secondary consideration; and the audience had evidently come to welcome Miss Kellogg home. Whenever she appeared the house rung with applause, and the stage was literally heaped with floral offerings of the rarest and most beautiful kind, prompted doubtless by the well-known determination of Miss Kellogg to accept no other gifts than flowers. Some of these devices were remarkably tasteful and unique; such as a floral temple surmounted by a dove, a parterre, ingeniously wrought baskets, etc. These were collected, by Miss Kellogg's desire, and photographed after the concert, that she might preserve a tangible souvenir of a welcome so grateful to her heart. The graceful picture thus obtained we are permitted to lay before the readers of the Bazar, who will doubtless gladly rejoice in the successes of their gifted countrywoman—successes which were chronicled a short time since in our columns. We are glad that she has wisely determined to return to her native land, which first recognized her genius, and where she has always been so signal a favorite.

CLANDESTINE RELATIONS.

THERE are no youth held with so loose a rein as the American. Boys and girls are allowed to have their head, as the jockeys say, and to take what course they will. We see them, in consequence, running a helter-skelter race through life, swaying from the straight road and overleaping its barriers. They possibly arrive at the goal at last in fair time and average condition, but only after some extraordinary and unnecessary risks by the way.

There is no doubt that the freedom from parental control is favorable to that self-reliance which is characteristic of our young people, and gives them the courage with which they prematurely begin the struggle with life. It also endows them with a vigor of resistance to evil unusual in those of their age. These are great benefits not to be lightly passed over; but this early emancipation of our youth has also its disadvantages. If it bestows strength to oppose, it also gives the audacity to provoke; and youth, with a characteristic overestimate of its powers, often engages itself in an unequal struggle.

It appears quite practicable to extend the parental authority over our American youth without any dangerous encroachment upon their freedom of will. The young male adult perhaps requires less tightening of the domestic curb than the female. He generally, on being let loose at home, is bound to some occupation, and thus only exchanges one subjection for another. The subordination is in his case continued, and though more voluntary, is still of sufficient force to sustain the habit. Our male youth, withal, could bear, without fear of injury to future strength of flight, some clipping of their superfluous spread of wing.

It is our young girls, however, strange to say, who are most in need of domestic restraint. Though still fed and housed in the parental dove-cot, these fledgelings are constantly essaying the most eccentric and dangerous flights.

At the early age of sixteen, seventeen, or so, our young girls of respectable parentage (which means nothing more than a father or mother who are well enough off to bring up their daughters in idleness) have nothing to do but to try to get married. They have left school, and have abandoned with the well-linked desk and thumbed geography all idea of study. They find themselves suddenly with the free control of youthful energies, caprices, and passions—for it is not customary with American parents to subject their "finished" daughters to any systematic discipline. Without any intellectual or moral guidance to direct their minds to study and to household and social duty, they are left in that state of mental weakness most favorable to the indulgence of excessive sentiment. This takes naturally, at that early age of womanly development, a matrimonial direction; and thus our young girls, looking for nobody else, see a prospective husband in every impudent good-looking fellow who passes. It is not surprising that these volatile damsels, unguarded by parental vigilance, and left for want of a sound education to the mercy of a capricious sentimentalism, should indulge, as we are told they do, in such vagaries as making acquaintances in omnibuses, appointing rendezvous in the streets, and keeping up a correspondence in the newspapers with the well-dressed Tom Jones of our day.

The best remedy unquestionably for this perverted sentiment is occupation and a continued mental and moral discipline. In the mean time it might be well for mothers to keep a sharper eye upon their girls. American parents certainly do not approve of their daughters showing off in the newspapers as "the young lady with green hat to whom her sincere admirer showed his card," or as "Violet who can not on Thursday evening," etc.; but they allow them a liberty of conduct which naturally leads to such a violation of female propriety. There is no other country but ours in the world where a respectable mother would allow her daughter to keep up an intimacy with a young man unknown to her parents. In our large cities unmarried girls are constantly meeting, walking, and conversing for hours together, day after day, with cavaliers who have never crossed the parental threshold. Far from us be the implication that these intimacies are absolutely improper, but we do say that the liberty of making and keeping them up is decidedly so. No child, boy or girl, should have a friend who is not admitted to the home of the father and mother; and a young girl should never be permitted to form clandestine relations of any kind.

DIPPING, dripping from a hand,
Some almighty hand half guessed,
Drops of light might hang as grand
As yon planet doth at rest.
While peering poised upon the rim
Of airy upper zones alight
With outlines delicately dim
And growing from their darkening height,
Far and fine a beaded cluster,
Mirroring themselves in hidden meres,
Proclaim with faintest points of lustre
The silent marshaling of the spheres—
Still shivering as the drapery of light
Dropping, leaves their snowy splendor
Golden-aureoled and bare,
Till stealing tremulous and tender
They palpitate upon the heart of the gray evening air.

HUMANITY OF SERVANTS.

"THERE is a great deal of human nature in the world," said Jacob Faithful, and it is to be presumed that servants have their fair share of it. Housekeepers, however, would seem unwilling to concede this; and we should judge from the manner in which many of them treat their domestics that they regarded them as of an organization entirely different from their own, with no portion of that abundant human nature of which Marryat's hero spoke.

Servants are ordinarily regarded by their employers as so many pieces of mechanism constructed to do a certain quantity of work of a particular kind, according to their especial functions, whether as cook, nurse, chamber-maid, or waiter. There are indispensable household results to be accomplished daily. The beef must be roasted and the potatoes boiled, the baby fed and dandled, the rooms swept and beds made, the hall-door opened and table served, and the Irish Bridgets and German Katerinas are the machines provided to execute these operations. Should they by chance show any tendency to rest from work or diverge from its object the ever-watchful superintendent infers that the machinery is imperfect, and rejects it. If Bridget, for example, should by hazard fancy that she was human, and fall in love with some stray Patrick, and Katerina, under a similar delusion, become conscious of a patriotic sentiment, and steal away with Hermann to the Schuetzenfest or some other festive reminder of the father-land, they would be sure to be condemned as worthless by many mistresses of the household.

It is astonishing how completely the human nature of the servant is ignored by her employer. The single pair of stairs which leads from the parlor to the kitchen would seem to separate, as it were, by an unfathomable abyss the woman above from the woman below. The former has no sympathy for the feminine instincts of the latter; she will not, in fact, admit of their existence. The mistress, however conscious of her own feminine tendencies and inclined to indulge them, will not recognize or give any scope to such in her servant. The former may coquet, love, and marry, and will complacently regard herself as fulfilling her vocation; the latter is forbidden the companionship of her male friends, and is denounced as a trollop if she is caught passing a stolen word to the baker or butcher at the back-door. In England a female servant is always asked before she is employed whether she has any "followers." By "followers" are meant suitors. If the poor creature confesses to this very natural result of a pretty face or some other female attraction she is condemned at once. This cruel exaction of the servant-woman that she should neither love nor be loved is also not unfrequently made in this country, though differently expressed. "No visitors allowed" is the usual form of the harsh ordinance of our task-mistresses.

The want of a due recognition of the claims of the servant to human sympathy is shown, moreover, in the habitual reserve of their mistresses. There is not only that cold formality of relation which forbids any warmth of attachment, but a studied avoidance on the part of the employer of all knowledge of the intimate and personal interests of the employed. Hence there is complete ignorance and a consequent want of mutual confidence. Fidelity can only come from love, and love implies intimacy. Mistresses, in fact, are not sufficiently intimate with their servants. If they have real dignity and a personal superiority of their own they need not fear any degradation from a closer contact with their subordinates, for the advantage of height will only become more apparent by the opportunity of comparison with lowness.

A closer sympathy of the employer with the employed is particularly important as regards the servant in relation to children. The education of the latter is greatly dependent upon the character of the domestic with whom the child must be necessarily in constant and close communion. By improving her servant the mother will find that she is indirectly but surely elevating her offspring.

A more complete recognition of the human element of the servant will be found not only advantageous, but may soon become absolutely necessary. The servant has her future in America as well as others. We can not always calculate upon the present supply of the raw material of Germany and Ireland, which requires only to be kept in working order by an abundance of beef, potatoes, and wages. Employers will be forced sooner or later to seek for their servants exclusively among civilized people, and to compensate them not only by a fair day's wages for a fair day's work, but by a treatment which will recognize to its fullest extent their human dignity.

THE HAIR.

THERE is no part of the human body with which the busy hand of Fashion has so much interfered as the hair, and especially that of woman. Female ingenuity seems exhaustless of device in twisting, plaiting, frizzing, knotting, heaping up, scattering, and torturing into every possible form and direction the flexible material which naturally covers the head. Now it has been built up by painful art into (h)airy castles (as a London cockney might say) of such superincumbent weight that our grandames could hardly make the effort to balance themselves on their high-heeled shoes without toppling over. Now it has been smoothed and plastered down with pomatum so tight to the head that our women, as we recollect them, seemed all to be doing penance in monks' cowls. Again it is stuffed out, as we now daily see it, into a tumor-like excrescence, disfiguring the top of the head with the appearance of a monstrous growth of disease, which would seem to call for the knife of the surgeon, did we not know that it could be placed and displaced at the will of the wearer—sufferer, we were about to say.

We are grateful to modern fashion for its tasteful rejection of the front of false hair, and the graceful submission of old age to its whitened locks. There is no severer trial of reverence than the sight of one of those ugly patches of black stuck over the eyes of a matron, and nothing can accord so ill as its positiveness of color and precision of outline with the mottled mellowness and wavy lines of an aged face.

Dyeing the hair is the most preposterous of all attempts at human deceit; for it deceives no one but the deceiver himself, whose vanity leads him to believe that his artifice is successful. There is no one who has once commenced this practice of giving an artificial color to her hair but must regret it. It is generally begun with the idea that a single application will be sufficient for all time, but when it is discovered that it must be continued, the constant repetition of the dirty and fatiguing process soon becomes wearisome and disgusting. Each application of the dye, whatever it may be, colors, or discolors rather, only that portion of the hair above the surface of the scalp. The new growth, which is constantly taking place from the roots, appears always with the natural tint.

There is a premature grayness which sometimes occurs in the young, chiefly in those of light complexions and light-colored hair, which is the consequence of weakness of the nervous power. This, as well as the loosening and falling out of the hair, which come often from the same cause, may be checked by increase of the general vigor and the use of proper local remedies. A useful practice, when the hair is sufficiently short to admit of it, is to plunge the head in cold water morning and night, and, after thoroughly drying, to brush it briskly until the scalp is warmed to a glow. A simple lotion composed of half an ounce of vinegar of cantharides, and an ounce each of Cologne and rose waters, rubbed on the scalp, will probably be found beneficial. The dandruff, which is a natural formation composed of the scales of the skin which are being constantly thrown off, requires only a proper cleanliness to prevent its too great accumulation, and a moderate use of oil or pomatum to moisten the scalp.

The depilatories of the nostrum vendors for the removal of superfluous hair are dangerous. If dame or damsel should be troubled by the show of a mustache or beard, we know of no means of checking this masculine encroachment but by the patient use of the tweezers.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Thumb-Screws.

MY DEAR CALVIN,—Have you read Longfellow's new volume, the "New England Tragedies?" I observe that the critics are severe with it. One finds in it nothing but elegant simplicity run into sheer rapidity and folly. Another can see nothing but the same tragedy as it appears in all the old school histories, and stoutly denies that there is any invention or any dramatic power whatever, or, indeed, any of the author's characteristic quality, although it concedes the evident and irrepressible quality of the man—a certain gracious sweetness and tenderness. I read some of these criticisms before I read the little book, so that my mind was, as it were, upon its guard. Perhaps—I say perhaps—that was the reason that I was not so bitterly disappointed as the critics seem to have been. Indeed, as a student and lover of the poet, I did not read them as dramas at all. They were to me merely the story of the Quaker and Witchcraft persecution told very simply in a dramatic form—a form adopted for the sake of convenience. They retouch the sombre lights and tragical shadows of that time, and for a purpose. I think that the poet makes very skillful use of Cotton Mather, whom he introduces. The reluctant assent of the old divine suggests that it is unfair to judge the Puritans by their Quaker hanging and witchcraft madness merely. Those tragedies were no more the whole of Puritanism, and no more exclusively characteristic of it, than the guillotine and the reign of terror exclusively represented the French Revolution. It is an exquisite stroke of art by which the poet suggests this in his treatment of Cotton Mather.

However, my dear Calvin, my purpose is not to write a criticism upon the poems. Read them for yourself, and don't let any critic read them for you. As I was reading them aloud to my sister, Mrs. Smith, I saw her eyes moisten, and she did not speak for a minute or two after I closed the book; and I confess that I too sat looking silently into the fire. Then she said, without raising her head, and busily stitching,

"How glad I am, Bachelor, that we live in an enlightened age, when Quakers are not hung, and when poor old women and honest men are not tortured and pressed to death with horrible weights!"

"And when they do not have their thumbs screwed, sister," answered I; "and when their feet are not crushed in boots; nor their limbs torn upon the rack; nor their flesh plucked out by red-hot pincers; nor their teeth wrenched away like those of poor old Isaac of York; when they are not burned at the stake," I added, my dear Calvin, "as Servetus was in Geneva, for a difference of opinion. No, dear sister Smith," said I; "we live in an age when every body is welcome to think and talk as he pleases."

Was it something in my tone, or what was it, that made my sister Smith raise her head and look at me? I smiled at the dear old lady, and said:

"Well?"

The answer she made was not direct. She said:

"Did you remark that part of the first tragedy in which John Endicott, who has condemned the Quakers to death, protests against the order of King Charles to release them as tyranny?"

"I certainly did."

"What did you think of it?"

"Dear sister Smith, I thought it was another delicate stroke of art. It was one of those unconscious inconsistencies that ought to make us all very humble."

We lapsed into silence again, and presently my sister remarked:

"Yes, I am very glad that we live in so enlightened an age that every body may hold and express his opinions unmolested."

This time I looked at her. She was stitching composedly, and did not raise her eyes. I lifted a weekly paper from the table and saw that it discussed various meetings that had been held and sermons that had been delivered and books that had been issued during the week. It denounced this preacher as an idolator of the Romish school, this author as an infidel, that speaker as an atheist.

"Hi! hi!" exclaimed Peter Paul Pry, who opened the door at that moment, "that's pretty talk! Who are these wretched sinners you are dealing with?"

"They are no sinners of ours," replied my sister Smith, her eyes laughing over her spectacles; "it's only Brother Hopkins hunting Quakers and witches, and squeezing them with the heaviest weights that the times allow."

Wasn't my sister Smith right? I fell into a really profound study, and the next day I consulted a file of the Christian Exterminator, and I found as pretty an arsenal of instruments of torture as I should have expected to find in any highly vigorous branch of the Inquisition. There was a carefully selected, a truly choice, collection of epithets which, upon investigation, I discovered did duty as thumb-screws. There were savage sentences that were substitutes for the antiquated boots, but the object of crushing was supposed to be just as fully but more dextrously accomplished. There were paragraphs in large capitals, and even whole columns of tremendous talk, that were designed as racks adapted to the times. There were innuendoes which were as neat and deadly as a pinch of poison in your plate or cup; denunciations that were to serve the same purpose as the huge stone under which Giles Corey's life was pressed away; declarations which were like the evidence of the bewitched; and conclusions that had all the horrible creak of the gibbet. I was never more confounded in my life, and I thought, as I had just read the "New England Tragedies," I would look into the matter a little and see whether actual suffering was inflicted by all this terrible enginery.

But upon the whole, reflecting that they were words merely, I began to smile, and took comfort as I looked at the soft autumn sun in the sky. Then a witch-like fancy came fluttering into my brain—"Are words never things?" So I resolved quietly that, without saying a word to sister Smith or to Peter Paul Pry, I would investigate the matter for myself.

The next week John Endicott sat in judgment upon the Quakers—I mean, of course, that the Exterminator put young Selah Simple to the torture. He is, as you know, or ought to know, just settled in Pumpkin Corner, and is a zealous, modest, sincere, clever young man. He is generous, manly, and sensible; and as he doesn't think that a clergyman ought to be a Miss Nancy, or belong to a third sex, or separate himself from the life that he is called upon to influence and improve, he takes care to know what it is; and as the human mind is infinitely various in its tendencies and range of sympathies, he seeks the society of all clever men, whatever their opinions may be.

This seems to me an extremely reasonable course for any man; and Simple does not spare himself. Wherever men go, there goes Selah. He is a friend of the Catholic priest, who is a man of superior mind and great accomplishment; he is the associate of the Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian, Unitarian, Universalist, Moravian, Congregationalist clergymen and deacons and members. He preaches in any pulpit that is honorably open to him, and he is the judge of what is honorable for himself. Meanwhile he has started the school system with new vigor, and he has been felt as a force and a power in the whole neighborhood of Pumpkin Corner. It seems to me a very Christian, a peculiarly Christian business. If the Master were among us now, I can not help feeling that he would still sit at meat with publicans and sinners; that he would still say what he said to those who would fain have stoned the woman.

The Christian Exterminator, I say, put the Reverend Selah Simple to the torture. It printed a letter from Pumpkin Corner in which the retrograde condition of that community was bewailed. The writer described the shock which all serious people had experienced in watching the course of a young pastor whose name was not mentioned, but who was described so that no one could help knowing who was meant. He was consorting so indiscriminately with every body—he was present at such questionable places—he had even been seen bowling lustily in a bowling-alley—he was upon such suspiciously familiar terms with a certain Campbellite of the vicinity, that the scandal was enormous, and the church members were very much disturbed, and would probably take some kind of action. There was a stout adjuration to the faithful in Pumpkin Corner to beware of wolves in sheep's clothing, and not to be swept away in any current of false doctrine however speciously urged, but to mark the first approaches of Belial, and to clear their skirts of atheism and infidelity.

Well, it was only a volley of words, as you say, my dear Calvin; it was certainly better than an actual rope around your neck and an actual stone upon your breast; words only, which are wind merely. Let us see. The Exterminator came down to Pumpkin Corner by the weekly mail, and every body fell to reading it. It made a scandal, if there had been none before. It planted suspicion where there had been chiefly confidence. It was a veritable hornet's nest about somebody's ears. Give a dog a bad name, says the proverb, and it ends him. The old ladies and the gossips of the other sex began to shake their heads. "I thought so," and "Did you see?" and "Did you hear?" and "Well, well, I suspected," and "It certainly is very strange;" and suddenly every eye in Pumpkin Corner had become a watcher of Selah Simple, and every word, movement, act, was so closely scrutinized and so shrewdly suspected that the young man was confounded. Then the Campbellite and the rest, with the best purpose in the world—that is, lest he should be compromised by too much association with them—kept a little aloof, and Simple thought that they distrusted him. The serious people, as they were called, began to frown in good earnest, and hoped they had been warned in time. Indeed, by the end of a week the town of Pumpkin Corner was in such a bubble and a trouble that Selah Simple was conscious that he had lost the confidence of many good but foolish people, that he had become something of an outcast, and that he had been put upon his defense, and was somehow called upon to establish that he was not an infidel nor an atheist. He became indignant, and indignant men do foolish things sometimes; and presently the tea-kettle was so ridiculously tempestuous that the Reverend Selah Simple resigned his charge, and last week departed from Pumpkin Corner.

John Endicott sat in judgment and banished the Quakers from Boston. If the Christian Exterminator did not banish Selah Simple from Pumpkin Corner I am an unvarnished historian. The truth is, my dear Calvin, there are other ways of being tortured than the actual breaking of thumbs and crushing of feet. The spirit of intolerance is as unmanly and wicked now as it always was. The times do not allow it to gratify itself with actual blood and strangulation, hereabouts, at least. But when a man's ecclesiastical sympathies are permitted to decide the question whether he is a good teacher of mechanics, or of chemistry, or of the Latin grammar, a post upon which his bread and butter may depend, you see precisely the kind of intolerance which wrenched out poor old Isaac's teeth because he was a Jew, and which hung the Quakers upon Boston Common.

I think now I understand what the tone in my voice and in my sister Smith's voice meant. It was that we have enough of the Witch-burning and Quaker-hanging spirit left to understand the "New England Tragedies." And don't you think so, my dear Calvin?

Yours, in no doubt,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

WINTER BONNETS.

SOME additional novelties are found among late importations of winter bonnets. A new and improved Marie Antoinette has a flaring front pointed over the forehead, and a sharp half crown edged with a cape or curtain of bias velvet two inches wide, forming two waved scallops and also pointed in the centre. It will be seen that this new style approaches the real bonnet of long ago. A stylish feature of its trimming is a satin rosette of numerous loops placed on the point of the crown. For elderly ladies this bonnet is made in black velvet, purple, or brown, trimmed with rich black lace and satin, at a cost of $52.

For younger ladies the flaring fronts of black velvet Marie Antoinettes are shirred and lined with green satin, or gold, or royal pink. A gay model is of scarlet velvet thickly gathered over the expanded front. A spray of jet leaves half concealed in a black lace ruche forms the diadem. Black aigrette and scarlet ostrich tuft low down on the left. Black satin rosette over the crown. The cape is lined with satin. Strings of bias velvet, satin lined, and trimmed with black lace held slightly full and waved across the velvet. Narrow ties behind. Price $40.

A Marie Antoinette for evening is of pink velvet, with a diadem ruche of white blonde lace, in which are half-opened rose-buds of shaded satin, with brown autumn foliage. Pink satin rosette on the top, and an oblong rosette of lace behind.

Another shape admired by young and petite ladies has a narrow, rolling front that frames the face, then curves away from it. High diadems are not becoming to diminutive faces. The crown, or head-piece, is deeply indented in the centre, displaying the chignon to advantage. A reception bonnet is of lavender velvet closely covering the frame. A coiffure of blonde lace in a forget-me-not pattern covers the velvet. White aigrette tipped with pearl leaves. A china blue velvet of similar shape has a rouleau front, with a blue feather in the point on the forehead and an aigrette at the side. Narrow black lace edges the bonnet and strings.

A novel fastening for velvet strings is a slip-knot made to resemble the sailor's tie. It confines the strings at the throat, or can be moved lower down, as the wearer chooses. It is prettily made of carelessly folded satin, or of velvet in narrow pleats. Many bonnets have long satin strings fringed at the ends, one slightly longer than the other, so that they may be tied at the side. Strings entirely of lace are easily crushed, and are too light for street use in winter, hence they are confined to full dress bonnets. Velvet strings lined with satin and bordered with lace are more suitable for promenade hats.

A pretty diadem is formed by ostrich tips arranged against the front of the bonnet, to fall on the forehead with that becoming effect ladies seek when permitting frizzed curls to escape from the front of the coiffure. Long ostrich feathers are curled by the application of heat, giving them a downy, light, and wavy appearance. These are used as diadems and as fringe, taking the place of the lace fall at the back of the bonnet.

La Seville, a peculiarly Spanish bonnet, black, without an atom of color, is something between a hat and a bonnet, like the stylish pouf introduced early in the season. It is straight and high over the forehead, made of black velvet in careless puffs over a half crown, with a bandeau of jet Marguerites. A mantilla veil of black embroidered blonde, half a yard deep, covers the shoulders like a round pelerine, and is fastened in front by a jet ornament. An aigrette and pompon of feathers at the side.

We commend these black hats on the score of economy, as they are suitable for every costume, and all black is no longer restricted to mourning, or all white to brides. Jet, lace, and the spirited little aigrettes relieve the hat of the accusation of sombreness; and fair young faces adopt this Spanish head-dress with impunity, depending on their own natural color for warmth and beauty, without the aid of foreign hues.

A stylish little fanchonnette, just imported from a leading French house, does not even require a frame. Two box-pleated quillings, or ruches of black velvet lined with orange satin, the lining showing at the edges, are mounted on cap-wire, and extended across the head from ear to ear. The ruches are two inches and a half wide in the centre, narrowing toward the cheeks. Narrow black lace edges the back and front of the bonnet. A black ostrich tuft curls at the side from beneath a large tea-rose. Strings of poult de soie ribbon, thickly ribbed, tie either front or back.

This simple little fancy is easily imitated by ladies who make their own bonnets, as many must do now that a bonnet of a bright color can only be worn with a suit of that color, or with black. Lapis lazuli blue velvet, the deepest blue imaginable, is faced with white satin, or with pale amber. Evening bonnets are of white royal velvet, the golden-green Florence, rose-pink, or lavender, with satin linings of self color, or of white. Shaded satin roses with autumnal foliage, feather tufts, aigrettes, and blonde lace complete the trimming.

The Pompadour colors were shown in an elegant opera coiffure, for such it was, though called a bonnet. Three broad pipings of china blue velvet on cap-wire were separated as they crossed the head to display Pompadour rolls of hair. A white ostrich feather was curled over the front. Pink and white eglantine, with dark foliage, clustered low on the left. White blonde lace behind. Blue velvet strings edged with blonde, and fastened with a pink eglantine spray. Price $40. Another of the faintest shade of gray royal velvet had large moss roses in a rosette of blonde, with a drooping spray of mossy buds at the back.

At another house, where only French bonnets are seen, the prevalent diadem is the high round pouf with lace drapery. A claret-colored velvet, marked $38, has a diadem of the velvet pleated to form five hollow shells or leaves, and in each of these a tiny humming-bird rests, as if in a nest. The chameleon hues of the breast-feathers—green, gold, and crimson, as lustrous as jewels—are in vivid contrast with the velvet. This diadem, with a black lace drapery fastened with velvet bows, completes the trimming. An antique red velvet has a Marie Stuart point. A jet ornament is in each shell or coquille. Lace drapery behind, and an aigrette of red herons' feathers at the side, held by a jet butterfly. A French gray velvet is in high puffs, with a diadem wreath of purple lilacs. Price $22.

The few straws shown are trimmed with a toisade, or twist of velvet, over the front, a many-looped rosette of thickly-ribbed ribbon on the back, and an erect ostrich tuft at the side. Sultan red ribbon, with black feathers, trim the black straws tastefully. Gray and the yellowish Italian straws are trimmed in the same manner, with green or lapis blue.

Mourning bonnets are of pleated crape, arranged in the styles we have described for colors, and trimmed with a little dull jet.

Round hats are more worn than ever. Many ladies who considered round hats unbecoming to them have had their minds disabused of this idea by wearing the new bonnets, which have the same effect as a hat, and they are rapidly resuming the graceful and convenient hat. High-crowned hats of velvet and felt, with turned-up side-rims, are most in favor. The round fez in scarlet or black, and the Louis XVI. toque, made of dark crimson velvet, are trimmed with black lace and small green humming-birds. Gray felt is trimmed with maroon velvet and ostrich feathers, or with the brown garnet.

HOUSE JACKETS.

Serviceable breakfast jackets are of corduroy, cashmere, and opera cloth, made half-fitting with points at the front and back. A gayer fancy is a white velvet cloth with polka dots of blue or scarlet, bound and piped with velvet. The wide sailor collar and the front revers are also of velvet with tassels at the points.

Elbow capes looped at the back are newer than jackets. They are of blue or scarlet cashmere or merino, trimmed with pink ruches of the material. Rob Roy check, and the small blue-and-white plaid are made in the same way. The ruche is of silk. Pretty pelerine capes of split zephyr, overcast with white silk floss, take the place of clumsy breakfast-shawls. Garnet centres with black frilled borders, black bordered with orange, or blue with white, are among the prettiest.

HEAD-DRESSES.

Evening head-dresses are full garlands across the front hair with trailing vines over the chignon. The same flower in different colors is in each coiffure. Sweet-pea wreaths and small honey-suckles, prettier than one could imagine, pink, white, and scarlet on the same vine, are large and full in front with a long spray at the side. Price from $10 to $12. Mossy vines and tendrils have large half-opened roses over the forehead, with small buds on the trailing branches at the side or back. Price $12.

A diadem of garnet velvet and frosted grape leaves, with curled tendrils, has a bouquet to match for the corsage. Price $15. A lovely wreath was formed of the tiny white elder blossoms and dark green ivy leaves. Price $12. A cluster and spray of eglantine, the beautiful wild rose, has crystallized leaves. $10 is the price. A satin rose-bud just bursting from its mossy calyx and a drooping spray of mossy foliage is worn on the side crêpés.

A stylish ornament for the hair is a feather and gilt aigrette, the gilt tipped with turquoise. This is attached by a hair-pin to the chignon. Price $8. In others each strand of the gilt is tipped with stones of a different color. Real humming-birds with gold beaks and gilded wings are beside aigrettes of heron feathers tipped with colored stones. Price $14. Butterflies, with pins to fasten them on, are made of transparent mother-of-pearl. Price $8.

Tortoise-shell combs, the top held on by hinges, form a short bandeau in front of the chignon. The plain, straight headings, or those ornamented with carving heavier than the light perforated carving used long ago, cost from $9 to $16. Plain tortoise-shell bands large enough to clasp under the chignon are also worn. Price $3 50. Jet vines for surrounding the chignon, made of balls, leaves, and the favorite Marguerite pattern, are large in the centre, smaller toward the sides.

CHIGNONS.

Crimped and braided chignons for the street are worn very large and high, and are surrounded with a crimped tress, or else a plait. The boiled chignon, permanently crimped, can be bought for $16. Two long strands of small, light curls form a handsome coiffure for evening. There is no chignon necessary. The natural hair is formed into finger-puffs at the side, with the curls floating between. One strand of curls attached to a comb is worn in the street between wide braids. Two strands cost $12. A single strand $6. Short curls to be worn under the chignon are $4. Artificial crimps for the front hair are $4.

PERSONAL.

ONE of the most beautiful tributes to the memory of Madame VICTOR HUGO is from the pen of GEORGE SAND, who says that, despite the numerous calamities and disappointments which fell to her share during her wedded life, she was one of the happiest women she ever knew. And she adds that, but for the influence which this sweet-tempered, yet spirited and talented little woman exercised on VICTOR HUGO, he would have never reached the exalted place which he now occupies in French literature. GEORGE SAND says that VICTOR HUGO's literary nature is too sensitive. Rebuffs and obstacles, which every author has to encounter, often disgust him so that, in a paroxysm of despair and indignation, he resolves never to write another line in a certain style; and whenever he did so he was dissuaded by the low, sweet voice that whispered into his ear, "Persevere!"

The descriptions of Queen ISABELLA have been for the most part so adverse to her personal manners and beauty that a favorable paragraph ought to be received with the courtesy due to a lady of her position. A French newspaper correspondent who saw the Queen when she alighted from the Bayonne train, at Hendoez in France, writes: "I have often heard the expression of her face described, and I must confess I did not expect to find as much nobility as I saw in it. Had she lived under other influences she would have wielded her sceptre in a very different manner. Her eyes, red with watching the preceding night, and with the tears which must have flowed the last few days, could not be judged; but despite the marked sensuality of the lower lip, the features express rare energy. Queen ISABELLA is afflicted with baldness. Her two evil geniuses were Father CLARET, her confessor, and MARFORI.

Newspaper men are looking up in Spain. The present President of the Junta started in life as a journalist. Born in 1806, he was taken prisoner by the French in 1823 as one of the defenders of Castle Monzon, and ever since he has been foremost in the contest for the liberties of Spain as jurist, as member of the Cortes, as journalist, as tribune of the people, and as Minister of Finance. He is also author of the best work on the Geography, Statistics, and History of Spain; it appeared in Madrid from 1848 to 1850 in eighteen quarto volumes. He is a native of Catalonia, and has probably a more intimate knowledge of the character and wishes of his countrymen than any one of his colleagues.

The estate of the late NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, in Concord, New Hampshire, is offered for sale. Mrs. H. is off for Europe again, where Mr. JULIAN HAWTHORNE, the only son of the novelist, is expected to pursue his studies. Mrs. HAWTHORNE has edited the journal of her husband, which will be soon published. She is the sister of Mrs. HORACE MANN and Miss ELIZABETH PEABODY, the latter of whom has just returned from a tour in Europe.

The young KING OF BAVARIA raves on the subject of music, and does the most extraordinary things. Twice a week he has a concert at the palace. The orchestra consists of seventy performers, among whom are frequently some of the most celebrated musicians; and frequently cantatrices of world-wide reputation sing airs from operas. But the odd part of it all is, that the whole audience consists of the King and his aid-de-camp, who, like his sovereign, is a passionate lover of WAGNER's music. Even the King's mother and the royal princes and princesses are not allowed to be present at these concerts, for the King says that he never enjoys them so well as when alone. True, probably, but selfish.

The young daughter of the Emperor of Russia, who will next year be Queen of Bavaria, is a slender young girl of medium height, with a very sweet and regular face, beautiful hands and feet, and long, dark brown ringlets. She and her betrothed will be the handsomest royal couple in Europe.

FELICITAS JUAREZ, daughter of the Mexican President, and a favorite in Washington society last winter, was married a few days since to a merchant of her own city of Mexico.

The following are the seals used by some noted French authors:

Victor Hugo: Make and Remake.
Dumas: Tout vasse, tout passe, tout casse.
Balzac: The right compels me.
Soulie: Marking time, not marching.
Karr: I fear only my friends.
Souvestre: Nor Hope nor Fear.
Sue: A hedgehog—I stab to defend.
Trelat: Reeds in a gale: Shaken, but not felled.
Joliet: I move alone.
Michelet: Oh, for wings!
Gavarni: Autenil (his country residence).
St. Beuve: Truth.

Royalty has not altogether gone out in Spain, if we assent to the statement of a Spanish paper, which says that the revolutionists have exchanged one queen for two, viz.: the beautiful DUCHESS DE LA TORRE, wife of SERRANO, and the COUNTESS DE REUSS, wife of PRIM, creoles both, the first a Mexican, the latter a Havaneese.

That dear old Admiral of ours, FARRAGUT, continues to be principal lion among the crowned heads of Europe. The honors paid to him have been more numerous and distinguished than were ever conferred on a naval hero. Not long since his ship was visited by the King of Greece and the Grand-Duchess CONSTANTINE. The Grand-Duchess came over first, conducted by the Admiral, and then the King and the other visitors. The Grand-Duchess is a noble-looking lady, and is said to be the most regal-looking woman in Europe. There was royalty in her very look and action. She is pretty, but not handsome. Her complexion is not very clear; but at a distance she looks quite attractive. She was dressed in white satin. On the skirt of her dress were rosettes, and she wore American colors as a tie—a red, white, and blue ribbon with stars. After being shown all over the ship, they went into the cabin to do justice to a "spread" given by the Admiral, and from the length of time they staid there they must have been pleased with it. They were on board fully two hours, and when they left the same honors were paid to them throughout the fleet. As they passed by on the quarter-deck, La Grande Duchesse said "Good-by." They all talk English very well.

An enthusiastic admirer of CHRISTINA NILSSON favors the public with an estimate that she receives a franc for every note she sings in Paris. She refuses to warble at a private concert for less than five thousand francs, which is about double the price STRAKOSCH demanded for private singing by ADELINA PATTI. NILSSON has no manager, but attends herself to all her financial affairs. IRMA DE MURSKA, the rising star at the Paris Grand Opera, it is believed will soon eclipse NILSSON. She is a fair-haired, robust beauty, and goes about accompanied by an enormous Newfoundland dog.

JULIUS JANIN, certainly one of the cleverest French writers of the day, in one of his late feuilletons expresses the opinion that Mlle. CASTRI, of the Italian opera in Paris, is a better singer and better actress than the Marquise de CAUX; that the proverbially shrewd management of M. STRAKOSCH had much to do with the popularity of the latter, and that Mlle. CASTRI will still be admired when PATTI and NILSSON are forgotten. That is what he says; but he is probably prejudiced.

Dr. RICHMOND was a man who had "views." He once lived in Rhode Island, but removed himself to Connecticut to "shuffle off," etc. This event occurred in Stonington, and upon a white marble monument there is this inscription: "When Rhode Island, by her Legislature from 1844 to 1850, repudiated her Revolutionary debt, Dr. RICHMOND removed from that State to this borough, and selected this as his family burial-place, resolving that the remains of himself and family should not be disgraced by being a part of the common earth of a repudiating State." On the reverse of the monument is the following: "A trust fund is given to the town of Stonington to keep this ground, walls, etc., in good repair forever. See town record." The cemetery is triangular in shape, and is cared for faithfully by the authorities of the town. He did not love Rhode Island.

EMMA, Dowager Queen of the Sandwich Islands, who was quietly but nicely lionized in New York last year, is now at home devoting her energies to the civilization of the little nation in the North Pacific Ocean—at home, happily, at Honolulu, the capital, which has not been affected by the late earthquake. Queen EMMA's husband, KAMEHAMEHA the Good, was the Hawaiian King who invited the planting in his dominions of a branch of the English Church, the King who himself translated the English Prayer-Book into the native language, and wrote the preface to it, which the Society for the Promotion of Christian Knowledge have published as one of their own tracts. The Queen is partly of Hawaiian and partly of European race: her father was one of the native chieftains, and her mother was a grand-daughter of JOHN YOUNG, one of the companions of VANCOUVER. She was married to the late King in 1856, but her only child died in 1862, and the throne is now filled by her husband's brother, with the title of KAMEHAMEHA V., who has upheld the constitutional government which was instituted in 1848.

"TIMOTHY TITCOMB," after noting carefully the English girl, is of opinion that her cousin across the water is more beautiful. She matures earlier and probably fades earlier. The English girl, under the usages of English society, is a suppressed creature without the freedom that favors vivacity. The American girl is perfectly at home in society before the English girl sees society at all, or has ever been permitted to escape the eye of her governess or her mother. Female education in the two countries differs greatly, and, singular as it may seem, the education of the English girl is more showy than that of the American. As a general thing, the English girl knows little or nothing of mathematics and the natural sciences. These branches in America absorb a great deal of time, as you know; and you will find multitudes of American girls who are adepts in them. That, in the education of the English girl, which strikes an American, is her knowledge of language, of literature, of music, and of drawing. Every thing which contributes to show in society is acquired by the English girl. I can not recall among my English traveling acquaintances a lady who could not speak French, and several of them have spoken French, Italian, and German with entire facility. With these languages at command, with a wide acquaintance with history and belles-lettres, and with the accomplishments of sketching and playing the piano, it must be acknowledged that the English girl shows for all that she is, and that for social purposes her acquisitions are greatly superior to those of the American girl.

Little Miss HENRIETTA MARKSTEIN, only thirteen, a pupil of Mr. S. B. MILLS, is soon to make her appearance as a pianist. She is said to be quite remarkable—in fact a genius for the difficult things of that instrument.

Dr. LEMERCIER, of Paris, a distinguished professor of anatomy and physiology, is coming over this winter to deliver in New York a popular course of lectures, accompanied by a large collection of elastic models.

There has not been much in the papers of late relative to Mrs. YELVERTON, but a St. Louis person, an enthusiast in millinery, thus describes the lady's costume on a recent public occasion: "She was magnificently dressed, her robe being of blue moiré antique silk—an exhibition dress at the Paris Exposition. The trail was long, the corsage low, coming under her arms, and fringed around the top with delicate gold-lace. In her hair she wore delicate sprigs of green and silver-lace belt. Her shoes were of white satin, and her stockings of white silk. She came in with the confidence of a lady of fashion, walking with easy grace a little to the left of the reading table, and making a low courtesy, which gave the audience a full view of her snowy bosom, which was but partially concealed by the delicate lace ornamenting her bodice. Her arms were bare to the shoulder, and rather small."

Pattern in Appliqué for Lambrequin, Curtain, etc.
White Embroidery.

This design is on lace with muslin application, and is worked in half-polka, button-hole, and satin stitch. Lace-work stitch is also used in a few figures. Having completed the embroidery, cut away the muslin, following the outlines of the figures as shown in the pattern. This border may be worked on either lace or muslin curtains, embroidering on the curtain material instead of on a separate strip, which would afterward need to be set on. If the curtains be of muslin place under the edge a piece of lace of the width of the border; if of lace, a piece of muslin on the upper side of the border. In the lace curtains small figures must be worked, either the six or eight leaved rosette shown in the lambrequin pattern will be found suitable. Muslin curtains need no such figures.

for the shape of the handle. Next dle, crochet on the upper end a small rosette of chain-stitch scallops and single crochet, and bronze the work as follows: apply several coats of copal varnish, after this is absorbed, put on the bronze with a dry brush, taking care to make it regular. Lastly, cover the handle with a sort of net of fine beads in brown and gold. First make a ring of gold beads, which must fit closely around the wire under the edge of the handle, and after this work as follows: 1st round.—Run the thread through the first two employed for using up short pieces of sealing-wax. For making the holder take a brass wire five inches long, cover two-thirds of the length with a coat of thick glue and wind it with coarse knitting-cotton, repeating this till the handle assumes the form shown by the illustration. Next crochet a cover for the handle in single crochet. Begin on the edge with a foundation of eight stitches, which must be joined in a ring; in the first round crochet over a small metal ring, after this widen fasten the cover on the han-beads of the ring, string on 3 g. b. (gold beads), 4 b. b. In order to increase the width around the larger part of the handle, string on four b. b. instead of three. Work a small bead rosette over the crochet rosette.

Crocheted Rug.

See illustration on page 884.

THIS rug is worked in red and gray castor wool. The foundation is of gray wool in single crochet; in working this work at the same time the picots which form the gray and red stripes. The red stripes consist of three rounds of picots, and the gray of six rounds. Work the picots as follows: one single crochet in the front vein of a stitch of the foundation, then one picot (4 chain and 1 slip stitch in the first of the four), with a picot pass over a stitch of the foundation. Crochet the picot rounds in every second following round of the foundation.

Begin the rug with two rounds of the foundation, crochet the picots on the first round, work another round, then again a round of picots, etc. The picots must come regularly over each other. The illustration numbers eight red and seven gray stripes. The border is all gray, and consists of twelve rounds single crochet. On this is arranged crocheted rosettes as trimming. For each rosette work a circular piece in single crochet (about five rounds), and on this five rounds of picots, the two middle ones of red and the other three of gray wool. Sew the rosettes close together around the edge. The lining of the rug is of gray linen, and is intended to button on, as the rug can thus be more easily shaken. Make a wide hem on the edge of the lining and work button-holes in it. Sew buttons on the under side of the rug, and, in order to have a firm foundation, sew on previously a border of red woolen braid on the under side. The illustration shows only a section of the rug, which may be made of any size desired.

See illustrations on page 884.

THE foundation of this border is black cloth, the application flower-like figures are of green silk, and the leaves of green cloth, which are sewed down with fine green cord and silk to match on the outer edge. Half-polka stitch, satin stitch, and point russe are also used in working the design. These stitches are worked partly with light, and partly with dark green silk.

See illustration on page 885.

This pretty and effective lamp-shade is crocheted of green silk twist in an open-work double crochet pattern, with fish-scales crocheted therein instead of beads. A lining of several thicknesses of green crape completes the shade, after which it is arranged over a skeleton frame. The illustration gives one piece of the shade of two-thirds the full size. Make from this pattern six single pieces, which must be sewed together along the sides with the seam on the under side. Begin each piece on the upper edge with a foundation of 31 ch. (chain), and work backward and forward 41 rounds dc. (double crochet). Before working prepare fish-scales of equal size by washing them in warm salt-water, and rubbing them dry with a fine linen towel. The scales of perch are the best. Then string the scales on the silk by threading it in a coarse needle, and work as follows: 1st round.—Always 2 dc. separated by 3 ch. in a stitch of the foundation, and after these 4 ch., passing over four stitches. In each middle stitch of the 3 ch. string on a fish-scale in the manner shown by the illustration. 2d round.—Returning, always 2 dc. separated by 3 ch. in the next 3 ch. of the former round, and after this 4 ch., passing over four stitches. In this manner work the remaining rounds, but the number of stitches must always be increased after the 2 dc. separated by 3 ch., and in the lower part the form is produced by gradually shortening the rounds in the manner shown by the illustration. The scales are only crocheted in the rounds worked on the right side. Edge the bottom with a round of chain-stitch scallops, on which crochet a grolot fringe of the scales. For each grolot work 5 ch., and after this a scale, then six times alternately 4 ch. and a scale, and after this again 5 ch. Having joined the parts sew in a lining of green crape three double, or of green marcelline, then work the upper edge in button-hole stitch, and run in a wire ring.

See illustration on page 885.

THE back and handle of the crumb brush are of bead work. Cut a piece of canvas corresponding to the upper surface of the brush, allowing a sixth of an inch to turn in on each side, and sew on the beads, red, white, and black, after the design showed by the illustration. Turn the stuff down on each edge, and overseam thereon a covered wire, stringing on with each stitch a sufficient number of beads to completely cover the circumference of the wire. For the handle take a wire nine inches long, and bend the ends so as to form an eye a third of an inch long; wind the wire with untwisted cotton, and afterward with red, white, and black beads, leaving, however, the width of the brush without beads; after which fasten it on under the brush in the manner shown by the illustration. Glue the bead embroidery to the top of the brush. This brush can be made at home by substituting strips of cloth for bristles. For this take a long strip of black or colored cloth two inches wide, and cut it so as to form a fringe; wind this fringe around an oval piece of pasteboard, of the form given by the pattern, till it has reached the requisite width for the brush; after which paste it to a piece of pasteboard of the same width. For the tray, cut of canvas a piece six inches long and seven wide, slope it so that one end shall be only five and a half inches wide, and work on this the bead embroidery as shown by the illustration, and in the same design as the cover of the brush. This done, line with black percale and thick pasteboard. The edge of the tray is of bead mosaic. The illustration, page 885, shows the manner of working this. Sew the edges to the bottom, and edge with a wire covered with beads strung on while sewing on the wire with overcast stitches. The handle is also of wire wound with beads, and must be joined to the wire on the edges. For this, bend the wire out at the back of the tray, and bend it back in such a manner as to form the ring, after which wind both together with black cotton and beads. Secure the handle in the manner shown by the illustration, with three wire braces, also wound with beads.

Elastic Cord and Worsted Garter.

See illustration on page 885.

This garter consists of four black silk elastic cords, which are doubled in the middle and worked together, as shown by the illustration, in point de reprise, with blue twisted worsted. The worsted thread must run alternately over and under the two cords. Sew the ends together, and hide the seam with a rosette of blue ribbon as shown by Fig. 1. Instead of working the cords in point de reprise, they may be worked in button-hole stitch loops, as shown by Fig. 2.

Bead Napkin Ring.

See illustration on page 885.

MATERIALS: Coarse white knitting cotton, light green silk twist, crystal beads, white silk, a thin whalebone eight inches long and a quarter of an inch wide. This napkin ring consists of twelve rings made of crystal beads and green silk, which are joined, in the manner shown by the illustration, with a whalebone which has been wound with crystal beads. For making each of these rings, make first a foundation of coarse white cotton; this foundation must be of the size shown by Fig. 2, and is formed by winding the cotton around two fingers. Next fasten the threads with long button-hole stitches of fine thread, and fasten a thread of the green silk to some point of the foundation, wind it twice around, and button-hole stitch this with the green silk, stringing on a crystal bead before each stitch. Continue in this manner till the foundation is covered, but after the first round work always around the button-hole stitches of the former round. (See Fig. 2, which shows the manner of working.) In working the last round work also over the threads over which the first round was worked. Having finished twelve of these rings, cover the whalebone with white silk, wind it closely with crystal beads, which must be strung on a white thread, and run it through the rings in the manner shown by the illustration. Do this by first running the whalebone from underneath out through a ring, then push another ring half through this ring, also from underneath out, and then put the whalebone through the upper part of the second ring, then again push another ring half-way in, and continue in this manner. Having run the whalebone through all the rings, push the last ring half-way through the first, run the whalebone through, and sew the ends together, allowing them to lap over slightly. The rings for this napkin ring may also be made like that shown by Fig. 3, the manner of working which is shown by Fig. 2.

Knitted Cradle Cover.

See illustration on page 885.

MATERIALS: Gray and violet zephyr wool. This cover, of which Fig. 1 shows a section of reduced size, is made of rosettes and small squares, which are knitted singly on steel knitting-needles with gray and violet zephyr wool. In the centre of each rosette is a tatted ring of gray wool. The edge is finished with a fringe of gray wool. Make for each rosette a foundation of six stitches with violet wool, and knit backward and forward on this with the same wool twelve rounds in such a manner that the right side shall be entirely knitted and the under side entirely purled; the first of these twelve rounds is purled, the first stitch of each round is slipped; * then leave the working thread, and take up, on the same side where it hangs, the back veins of the first five stitches of the part just knitted, on another needle (the edge stitches which lie next the foundation remain unnoticed), and knit with these a new part, which must count thirteen rounds, and in the first round, which is knitted plain, make of the first stitch two stitches, one purled and one knitted, so that this new part is now also six stitches wide. From * repeat eight times. Of course the stitches of the several parts may be collected on one needle, so as not to be embarrassed by too many needles. Having completed the tenth part, take up the stitches at the left on a separate needle, cast them off, together with the foundation stitches of the first part, and fasten the working thread. Now take the six stitches at the right of one part on a needle, splice on the gray wool, and work with this backward and forward on the stitches thirteen rounds, the first of which is knitted plain, and in this, as in every round plain knitted, knit the last stitch with the following stitch of the first violet part. Having completed ten such gray parts (each of the nine remaining parts counts also thirteen rounds, and begins with one round knitted plain), collect the stitches and the edge stitches of these parts on four needles, and knit on these stitches, also with gray wool, one round plain, in which narrow every six edge stitches to three by always knitting two together; in each of the remaining stitches knit one stitch as usual. Then knit two rounds purled, with violet wool, and cast off. For the tatted ring in the centre of the rosette work with gray wool a ring composed of one ds. (double stitch), 11 times alternating 1 picot a quarter of an inch long, 2 ds., and 1 p., 1 ds. Sew the finished ring in the centre of the rosette with gray wool in the manner shown by the illustration. Fig. 2 shows a similar rosette in full size. The little square, Fig. 3, is begun with gray wool on a foundation of thirty-six stitches, which are joined in a round, and on which work two rounds purled. In order to form the corners knit together two stitches four times after every seven stitches in the first of these two rounds; in the second round knit together two stitches after every six stitches; the narrowing in this round, as also in the remaining rounds, must come on the same point as in the preceding round. Now splice on the violet wool and knit seven rounds plain, in the first of which knit two stitches together four times after every five stitches; in the 2d, 4th, and 6th rounds is no narrowing; but in the 3d knit four times three stitches as one, and in the 5th and 7th rounds four times two stitches as one. Having completed the 7th round knit the remaining stitches as one, after which fasten the thread. Lastly sew together the rosettes and squares in the manner shown by the illustration, and finish the edge with a fringe of gray wool. Harper's Bazar, No. 46, p. 724, shows the manner of making this fringe. Instead of the heading described there, crochet one round single crochet; or the fringe may be crocheted in the edge stitches of the rosettes.

See illustration on page 885.

This bag is made of black cloth, ornamented with application and point russe embroidery, and lined with red leather. The handle of an old bag may be used. The ground is of black cloth, while the bars, which are arranged so as to form a plaid, are of violet cloth stitched on with violet silk. The star in the squares is worked in point russe with light and dark violet silk twist. Fig. 2 shows a section in full size. Cut the outside and lining from the pattern furnished by a worn-out bag; work the outside, and join the pieces from the wrong side with overcast stitches. The seam may be covered on the right side either with a fine cord or a row in cross stitch, or a cord may be sewed into the seam. The handle may be made of plaited double strips of cloth, or an old steel handle, or even a whalebone covered with cloth.

THE SINGLE LADY.

In singleness I walk the vale of life,
Gathering some sweet-lipp'd flowers upon my way;
Though love at times may wake its tender strife,
Heart, once a tyrant, must resign its sway.

What though for me no husband smiles at morn,
Showing the path my duteous feet should tread,
My lot is freedom, on whose wings I'm borne,
Unchecked and happy as the lark o'erhead.

What though no children nestle on my breast,
Or sport around me 'mong the garden flowers,
Making, by Nature's law, the heart most blest,
And saundaling with gold the tripping hours:

Methinks I may escape full many a tear;
Those we love best and cherish ofttest die;
Sad, too, to leave on earth the prized and dear:
Then for a mother's joys I will not sigh.

Fancies, sweet fancies shall my children be,
And birds, and flowers, and all bright things around;
No discord reigns in Nature's family,
Pleasure in each fair scene and soothing sound.

But think not, though I journey on alone,
Unmated in the crowded human mart,
That my calm'd breast has frozen into stone,
Or that no fire lies dormant in my heart.

Yes, there is that within me which might love
With strong, enthralling passion; resting snow
Hides the volcano's peak all cool above,
The lava, close conceal'd, lies hot below.

If I have loved, or vainly love this hour,
It matters not—the dream will soon be o'er,
Man can pray, urge; poor woman hath no power,
Hiding her sorrow in her bosom's core.

Such is the law for womankind; we gaze,
We sigh, we love, then feign to feel no smart;
The loved love not; and so we pass our days,
And can not to some other yield our heart.

Yes, other eyes may smile, but naught to me
The smile I do not prize; flow on, ye years!
Untroubled singleness my lot will be,
I heal my wound, I dash away my tears.

I need no pity—that my soul would scorn;
Strong, independent, I can walk alone:
Sorrows, if sorrows come, in patience borne;
Pleasures, with cares unmingled, all my own.

Call not my life a cold and barren waste,
Which naught but weeds of selfishness can bear;
Nay, with the flowers of feeling it is graced,
And love for human kind flows rill-like there.

Books, Nature, Art, unfold for me their store,
Music and song to time give silver wings,
Bee-like, life's varied sweets I wander o'er,
And in my breast content forever springs.

Then lone, unmated, let me onward go,
A faint-rayed star that singly still must shine,
An humble flower that by itself must blow:
Some sweets I miss, but countless joys are mine.

PLEASE THE DRESS-MAKERS.

THAT a lady, a strange lady, should ring at my door and ask for me was an unheard-of event! Mrs. Lumpkin has no conception of jealousy; but the corners of her mouth were rather primly drawn down as she informed me that a young lady, a stranger, desired to see me. For myself I do not deny that I was flattered. I am quite aware that under-sized, middle-aged gentlemen, who wear blue stockings and incline to baldness, are not objects of interest to the general female mind; but literary talent has its admirers. There are enthusiastic and sensitive natures who ask only for sympathy, and spurn the narrow calculations of the rules of beauty and the cold decrees of propriety. Should my visitor have been drawn by such an admiration, in what a difficult position was I placed! A writer's imagination is necessarily in a high state of development. There are barely a dozen steps from my den to our little drawing-room; but I had time to fancy the stranger (beautiful of course), her appeal and my answer, chivalric but loyal to Mrs. Lumpkin; and—I do not know how other people are thrilled by emotion, but my method is to have little unpleasant chills down my back! So that I entered the drawing-room in a positive agony of admiration at my own noble sentiments! Thrown away, alas! all of it. The lady was neither beautiful nor ugly, with that intelligent ugliness that works up so well in heroic positions; but simply pretty! with a mediocre prettiness. A dear little woman with a stylish air; one of those dainty dames who look as if their gloves had never touched any thing earthly, and as if they had never been separated from their gloves.

"Mr. Lumpkin?" said the little lady, inquiringly. "The Mr. Lumpkin who writes for the papers?"

And "the Mr. Lumpkin who writes for the papers" bowed assent and seated himself, I am afraid to say how much disappointed.

"Mr. Lumpkin," said my visitor, nervously, "I came to ask a favor. You seem to me, from your writings, a kind old gentleman" (think of that!), "and I thought—that—perhaps—"

"Very happy to be of any service, I am sure," mumbled I, trying to swallow my righteous indignation at being called an old gentleman.

"That perhaps," she continued, "you would write something for me. You see" (here the lilac-gloved hands got very nervous in her lap) "there is something I want to say to the Bazar, because it is a paper for women, you know. And I can not say it. I have tried, and I can not put it in words. If I could, some of those people who are always finding out something about women might do something or other; and I am sure other women are afraid besides me; and if you would let me tell you in my own way, and you would write it out in the newspaper way, you might help others besides me, you know."

[What the lady had to say, given in her own way, Mr. Lumpkin being quite incapable of putting it in "the newspaper way."]

"I am Mrs. Daisy, Frederick Daisy's wife; and no doubt you saw the marriage in the paper. I try to be a good wife. I brush my hair three times a day, and dress for dinner, as if he were a dozen young gentlemen coming in the evening. And he adores roast beef, and I hate it; and I order it four times a week, and pretend to like it; and if it were not for chocolate caramels I think I should starve on those days. But, as I told Ma when I married Fred, my husband shall never say that I drove him out of the house to stay till one and two o'clock at night, as some gentlemen do, though I wonder how they dare, for there is always some one being found drowned about thirty years of age, with a white muslin shirt and no eyes, you know.

"We have not very much money. Fred has just started in business, and needs to be very prudent; and we are anxious to make an umbrella for a rainy day; but we haven't a stick of it yet, not so much as the handle; and it is my fault, all my fault, Mr. Lumpkin. I hate myself for it, and call myself bad names. I say 'Mary Daisy, there are labor-saving machines, and there are money-spending machines, with eyes to spy what they want, and feet to go after it, and no conscience to hinder from buying, and you are one of them. You are a slow fire in your husband's goods. You are a leak in his ship. You are a dragon to swallow up all his pet plans and prospects.' And when that does me no good I get out the pictures about me, and look at them, and the newspaper articles about me, and read them; that is, I mean not literally about me, Mary Daisy, but about women like me. I read how I prevent young men from marrying. They see poor Fred growing mealy and flabby, and getting an anxious twist to the corners of his mouth, and going about in a coat worn on the shoulders and at the cuffs, and he is a sort of scarecrow in the matrimonial field, or a walking light-house. It is just like the picture of celibacy and marriage. The splendid bachelor on one side; and Benedict, with two puffy children blowing trumpets in his ear while he tries to read, on the other; and their side-board mirror is smashed; and if we should have children, I wonder if they will smash ours? Because it was a present, and I do not believe we could get another. We could never buy one; at least with a drag like me on the wheels.

"And that makes me remember the newspaper articles again. I read them, as the monks used to whip themselves, for penance; and while I read I am awfully guilty. But there is also a smart and tingle in my conscience that makes me feel virtuous after all. I think I will never wear long curls down my back, or trains, or paniers, like a woman of the period, any more, and that I have turned over that leaf, and done with it forever.

"But Mr. Lumpkin, when you make a good resolution and set your foot down on it, did you ever notice how many circumstances tug at your foot to lift it up? I begin to imagine that, as there is a demon of war and a demon of money, so there may be a French mantua-making demon on the watch for rebels like me. Only the other morning, after my last magazine whipping, I said to myself, 'Now, Mary Daisy, you shall be economical, and a help-meet, and not a help-cat.' That very night Fred came home, and pulling out his pocket-book handed me a fifty-dollar note.

"Indeed, Fred," said I, 'I had rather not take it. Put it in the bank, and I shall get on very well as I am.'

"And I would prefer that you did take it," answered Fred. 'Don't I know that you are on tip-toe for a fall bonnet and a new walking suit like other women, and that you have been the best of little wives, and have never so much as glanced at a bear's-ear poplin or a dying-frog something else? Take it and spend it, and look as pretty as ever you can for the money, my dear.'

"Now, you know, Mr. Lumpkin, that a wife is bound to obey her husband. And when Fred says 'I would rather' he means 'you must.' Of course, it became my duty to take the fifty dollars. So here, you see, was my plain duty flying in the face of my virtuous resolution. But when I took the money I thought, 'I will deposit this money in the bank myself. I will save all I can, and deposit that too; and then when Fred comes home, as they do in the stories, and says in a bass voice, and with his hair all wild, 'Mary, I am ruined, and we must starve,' I shall say, 'Nothing of the sort, my dear. We are rich. We have a thousand dollars in the bank;' or else I shall buy a house—a little one, with four rooms—somewhere in the country, and when Fred looks thin, and says with a sigh, 'If it were not for quarter-day we might get up the ladder,' I shall invite him to an excursion, and show him my little house, and when he says, 'I wish we had one like that,' I shall dance about him, and answer, 'My dear, darling Fred, we have one. This is our house'—just like that queer little black Professor in 'Villette,' only he did not dance, you know.

"But to deposit the money I must ask where to find a bank. I could not ask Fred, because it was to be a secret. So I ran over in the morning to ask Ma, and every new walking suit that I saw I bought with my fifty dollars till I did so wish that the earth had been constructed on such principles that you could have your cake and eat it too! And the moment that I told Ma she cried out, "Put it in the bank! Put it on your back, you little simpleton! Get yourself a walking suit, as your husband bids you. You must have been shabby when he discovered it' (Ma always will fling at Fred); 'and let me tell you, Mary, do you never begin the economical business or it will finish you. Live on little, and by-and-by your husband will grow like the man who leased a house for nothing, and complained that he must break his lease unless he could get it on easier terms. Take my advice. Buy yourself a new black silk dress; black silk is economical; it is never out of fashion, and will wear for years; and really, Mary, for Fred's own sake you should keep up a good appearance. If you look shabby people will at once conclude that he is pinched.'

"Mr. Lumpkin, what could I do? If you are to honor your father and mother how can you impudently do the thing they tell you not? Every thing urged me. My husband wished it; my mother advised it. I decided to buy a plain black silk, and have it made in sensible style. No paniers and no ruffles! I consoled myself for the bank project with the notion of setting a good example on Broadway; and a little comforted went to buy it of Hardware & Co.

"I dread shopping. I am so much afraid of the clerks. They look so scornful if you say that an article is too dear, and so fierce if you ask to see something else. But there is a civil clerk behind the silk counter of Hardware & Co. That is why I went there, and I fell in love at first sight with the piece on the very top.

"I think," said I, 'I prefer this.' "Yes," answers my civil clerk. 'That costs four dollars the yard, and is worth two of cheaper sort, I do assure you, ma'am.'

"Then he twitched it, and straightened it, and gathered it, and puffed it out with his hand, and held it in the light, and talked about Bonnet & Cie., and what he saw in Paris, and all the time I was doing a sum in my head. Twelve yards at four dollars a yard would cost forty-eight dollars. Forty-eight dollars from fifty dollars leaves two. Could I make my summer bonnet answer for fall? Could I scrimp the dress-maker's bill from the market money? I was so flurried and so guilty that I should have liked to go away, but I did not dare, for my civil clerk was getting snappish; so I said,

"Cut me twelve yards, if you please." "And there was I with a four-dollar silk, and the most wretched little woman in New York. Benedict Arnold could hardly have writhed under guiltier agonies than I did that night pouring tea for Fred, poor, unsuspicious fellow!

"There was only one consolation. A good quality wears better and is more effective than a cheaper article, and I might set a more striking example to the girls of the period. "Laure is my dress-maker; always has been. She is a perfect fit, and has the real 'sacred fire' of the modiste. As the Old Bachelor says about his Mr. Latour, I really believe that she meditates ruffles and puffs in the still watches of the night. She revels in wonderful and complicated trimmings, and, apart from her bills, has a natural and inborn preference for the trimming that takes the most stuff to the square inch. To carry my reforming dress to her was like taking the temperance pledge to a distillery.

"I knew that; but, on the other hand, if there is any real life in Truth, why should not my truth upset her false system, and my arguments convert her to a noble and severe style? Laure can do what she likes with her customers. She need only say to them, 'The latest thing from Paris is to wear on the promenade a straight black petticoat, untrimmed, and a short white night-gown, also untrimmed,' and Broadway would be convulsed by the spectacle of several hundred ladies of fashion in black petticoats and white night-gowns. Think of the gratitude of the husbands and fathers to the one who should introduce these reformed dresses, and those poor gentlemen who are all the time tearing the fashions and their hair in newspaper paragraphs—of the adulation and the national gratitude with which I should be overwhelmed if I could bring about a revolution where the best wits in the country have failed! I actually shrank at the thought; but it would be better than to deposit the money in the bank, and I am sure Fred would think so."

"Laure opened the bundle mightily coolly. She had no idea that she was handling the seeds of revolution done up in a packet, treasonable to the first principles of her establishment."

"Oh, a gros grain!" handling it with an indifference sacrilegious, positively, when I remembered the agonies it had cost me. "If you had more stuff I should recommend you a double skirt, but, as it is, I can make a panier possibly."

"But, Laure—"

"You must trim it with satin," she proceeded; "a flounce, an eighth in width, simulating a tunic; satin puffs on the sleeve, and frills of real thread; square neck, trimmed with satin folds and lace; sash ends and large bow of satin below the panier."

"But, Laure, I want a plain dress." (This is me, you are to understand, quivering already, and not one of my arguments on hand.)

"I beg your pardon, Mrs. Daisy; I call that a plain dress," answered Laure, with much dignity. "With more of the stuff I should propose to you a row of graduated puffs, say fifteen or twenty, on each side; satin folds between each puff, and fringe on the bottom; an apron-front and back scalloped and bound with satin, with a tiny button in each scallop; a Marie Antoinette flounce, bound with satin and laid in pleats, with ornaments between the pleats; or, instead, three rows of full satin frills bordering the puffs, and sweeping around the entire train, and the front breadth trimmed with a deep flounce and folds of satin, edged with lace. Mrs. Devine and Mrs. Love had each such a dress as I describe, and the effect was superb. They wanted puffs as a heading to the frills, but I could not consent. I am opposed to over-trimming. I like simplicity."

"As Laure talked she traced with her finger the pattern she was describing on a pattern on the wall. Her eyes lighted and her face glowed; but I can't see why I should have felt so weak and damp, and how she could put me out so entirely, unless—maybe—she was real and I am not. She was a Pythoness, devoted to puffs and ruffles! She burned with that enthusiasm, so mysteriously kindled by a monstrous waste of stuffs that cost the most money; and now that I was away from my magazines, I could not help thinking too that it would be really a glorious thing to be all puffs at the sides, and have yards and yards of satin sweeping around one's train. I believe there is something in atmospheres, and that one of you newspaper gentlemen in Laure's fitting-room would come to consider 'paniered hips,' a necessity, and noble and severe styles so much poverty and awkwardness."

"For myself, I could as easily have withstood a park of artillery as Laure. She crushed me with polite disdain, nipped my poor little projects with satirical force, and made me feel skimped and mean and poor and mistaken, all on the spot."

"Well, I may as well get to it. Here is my bill:

To making Dress	$20 00
For 5 yards Satin, at $3 50 per yard	10 50
For Linings	1 50
For 6 Buttons, at $1 the dozen	3 50
For 3 yards Thread Lace, at $2 the yard	6 00

There! Forty-one dollars! Just look at it! And when I remonstrated, Laure said, 'Why, think of your trimming, and the labor of putting it on! I should have charged some ladies forty dollars for the making alone,' which is true. But what am I to do? How long would it take me to scrimp forty-one dollars from the market money? I look just like a fashion-plate, and how can I tell Fred, after all his generosity! I am sure that I shall find myself in a magazine article; I am a fit subject for one! And yet, I neither bought the dress and ordered the trimmings to please myself, nor to displease any other woman, as people say. I am miserable in it, for how can I sit down on that great panier-puff and satin bow? and I should have been happier in a cheaper stuff. No! it was to please the clerk, and still more to please the dress-maker; and as wretched as I am, if I had another dress for Laure, and no one else can give it the style she can, I believe I should do it again. I can never say that my soul is my own with that woman."

"Now, Mr. Lumpkin, do, do ask the Bazar if it will consider my case; and if it will undertake some sort of a Ladies' Protective Union against such dress-makers as Laure before we are reduced to the point of buying the trimmings first and the dress afterward, if we have money enough left. Suppose each member of this Union should bind herself never to visit a mantua-maker alone; but always accompanied by two of the most courageous and sensible members of the Association to prop her rickety resolution, and argue down the dress-maker. Suppose a set of by-laws restricting trimmings for members, and prohibiting any costume that shall swamp the lady wearing it, and make her an advertisement simply for her dress-maker, like those men who go about Broadway in white coats with 'Remember Fox's Double Distilled Vermifuge, No. 90 Halifax Avenue!' in red letters all over them. Suppose, finally, a committee of wives and mothers, who shall find out by their wits whether young men are similarly bullied by their tailors, as a set-off to the articles about us! And oh! dear Mr. Lumpkin, when my story is printed will you send a copy to Fred marked, as the easiest way of presenting Laure's bill, you know?"

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE court has not yet returned to Paris, and it is said that the Emperor is seriously indisposed; but this did not prevent him from taking part in an excursion made by the Empress a short time since to her domains on the Amosy, where she wishes to found reformatory colonies. The whole court repaired thither on a pleasure-party in four large carriages drawn by four horses. The Emperor was dressed in a frock-coat and gray pantaloons; the Prince Imperial in a Breton suit, with a small hat turned up with scarlet. The Empress wore a very short chestnut delaine dress, disclosing her little boots of dead-lustre kid. A blue cloth mantle was thrown over her dress, and her simple white straw toque was encircled with a wreath of ivy with an aigrette of oats. The costume was rustic in the extreme. Her two nieces, the daughters of the Duchess d'Albe, wore Havana poplin dresses, with simple tunics, looped up, and sailor-hats tied with black ribbons with the word Nive—the name of her Majesty's bark—braided in gold letters thereon. The ladies of honor were dressed in the same style.

The projected reformatory colony is in a bright and beautiful spot near the Spanish frontiers. Wide expanses of land which now lie there uncultivated are to be laid out, the different soils prepared for the crops most suited to them, and the dwellings and farm buildings will be begun before the autumn is ended. At eight in the morning the imperial party had driven in char-à-bancs from the Villa Eugénie, and after walking over the ground, examining its advantages and deciding upon the arrangements, they breakfasted, seated on the grass in true picnic fashion, under the shade of an old ruined chapel which stood solitary and moss-grown by the road-side. When the repast was over a visit was decided to the grottoes of Sare and Zuguramudy. The only way there being impracticable except on horseback, the Empress, seconded by Mlle. Marion, her lectrice, arranged her dress en Amazone, and they then rode up the picturesque road. The grottoes are excessively wild in aspect, and total darkness reigns within them. To enable the visitors to enter Bengal fires were lighted and thrown in, illuminating the mysterious arched recesses, and chasing from them numbers of winged guests that their sombre shades had drawn there. The Empress and Prince showed so much courage and curiosity that the Emperor at last nervously interposed. It was nightfall before they returned from their long ramble. They returned to Biarritz at twelve o'clock, and in the twinkling of an eye the scene changed and the Empress presided at dinner in a pink silk dress covered with Valenciennes flounces and pink sash, with high corsage, however, for the Empress is rarely seen décolletée at Biarritz.

It was my good fortune to see Mlle. Nilsson at home a few days ago. She lives at No. 176 Rue de Rivoli, in a very modest suite of apartments on the fourth floor, in a magnificent house, however, and her little balcony looks out on the palace of the Tuileries, where she receives a hearty welcome whenever she is announced. It is a veritable bird's-nest that holds the Swedish nightingale—modest, elegant, and chaste. The little drawing-room has a single window; it is not papered, but is painted in wide panels with gilt frescoes. The white marble mantle is adorned with a nymph in gilt bronze, and two blue and gold Sèvres vases. The window is hung with white muslin embroidered with clusters of stars. The furniture is of sky-blue brocatelle. Over against the window stands a mahogany piano, the confidante and echo of that voice which is compared by its admirers to that of Malibran.

The bedroom is hung with pink chintz sprigged with gray; the bed is canopied with white curtains embroidered with clusters of stars; the bedstead is white threaded with pink; an arm-chair a glance to match is in front of the bed, beside which is a little fur rug with a white fox in the middle, a souvenir of some rural hunting excursion. The whole furniture seems the realization of a young girl's dreams. A few beautiful wreaths of fresh exotics hanging about the room alone indicate the recent triumphs of the songstress.

Mlle. Nilsson, the worthy successor of her countrywoman, Jenny Lind, bears little resemblance to her Swedish sister; she is thinner, taller, and of a prouder bearing. She has a very beautiful face, and large, brilliant eyes with a peculiar expression and of an undefinable shade. Her pale gold hair appears very abundant, and her mouth is grave and somewhat disdainful. Her complexion has not the brilliancy usual to brunettes, for which reason she looks far better at evening embellished by the artifices of the stage. The prevailing characteristic of her physiognomy is extreme purity, united to great will. If there be a secret in her artist-soul it is an honorable one, and will be religiously kept.

Mlle. Nilsson's home-life is a model of extreme simplicity. On the day that I saw her she wore a plain black dress, with linen collar and under-sleeves; not a jewel was seen, not even ear-rings. While I was there an invitation came for her to visit Brussels, where she was offered 5000 francs to appear in Ophelia. She refused. "Not," she said, "that the sum appears to me insufficient, but I do not like to displease myself."

The great songstress is known to all. It is not of her talent that I wish to speak, but of the individuality of the woman, who appears to me to realize the idea of calmness and purity united to culture in impassioned art. It is not yet decided whether she will sing Faust in the opera. The ex-director in the Lyric theatre, who, it appears, has sundry rights over the partition, refuses. It is said that M. Carvalho's claims will be disallowed; nevertheless, they form an obstacle at present. The public solaces itself by listening to Ophelia, for not having Marguerite; however it is impatient, for it has a presentiment that this will be an admirable incarnation of one of the most poetic figures created by genius.

ELIANE DE MARSEY.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE friends of Princeton College will long remember October 27, 1868, as a memorable day. The exercises in connection with the inauguration of the new President, Dr. McCosh, were highly interesting, and brought many distinguished visitors from various sections of the country. The old-fashioned church was crowded with eager listeners, who sympathized with the venerable institution, about to take, as it were, a new lease of life. The former President, Dr. McLean, having resigned on account of declining years, Dr. McCosh, a native of Ayrshire, Scotland, was invited to accept the vacant chair. His successful connection with Queen's College, Belfast, Ireland, and the valuable works which he has published, have secured him a reputation in this country, as well as in Great Britain. He is about fifty years of age, of prepossessing appearance, and seems well calculated to gain the respect and win the love of students. The inaugural address was long, occupying nearly two hours, yet contained so much vigor and good sense, so many happy allusions and wise suggestions, that the audience gave the closest attention to the end. In his address, Dr. McCosh made some reference to the necessity for a gymnasium, which was enthusiastically repounded to by the students. After the audience had separated, it was stated that two gentlemen of New York city had given $10,000 each toward the erection and furnishing of a suitable gymnasium.

A London journal states that about one thousand women will probably cast votes at the Parliamentary election. It appears that some of the barristers who have final supervision of the registry in England declined to strike out the names of women who have claimed that the word "men" in the act regulating suffrage includes them. Hence they will be allowed to vote.

The first quarterly report of the Brooklyn Eye and Ear Hospital indicates that this charity has been most successful in relieving those suffering with diseases of the eye and ear. Nine cases of blindness have been cured by surgical operations, numerous outdoor patients treated, and a number received into the hospital. Of the 400 patients 295 were afflicted with diseases of the eye, and 105 with diseases of the ear.

An exchange tells an extraordinary story of a young lady of Susquehanna, New York, who was recently found dead in her bed. It is stated that physicians have extracted from her body during the past ten years at least one thousand needles and pins. She would never give any account of the manner in which they were introduced, whether she swallowed them or thrust them directly into her flesh, nor did her friends by watching her ever find out. They were found at different times working on the surface of almost every part of her body, but chiefly on the limbs. A lady, who refused to believe the stories about their removal, states that she went to satisfy herself, and saw a physician extract nearly fifty from one arm.

The Evening Mail suggests as a matter for serious consideration, in view of the near completion of the Pacific Railroad, that when the two ends of this road meet, what will prevent an earthquake coming East from San Francisco at any time!

A young actress, daughter of Louisa Mühlbach, was recently hissed in a Berlin theatre. She had been severely criticised in the newspapers, and the audience, seeing the justice of the criticism, and that the young lady made no attempt to avoid errors which had been pointed out, hissed her. The actress burst into tears, and buried her face in her hands, whereupon the audience relented, and applauded as much as they had hissed before.

The Philharmonic Society is announced to give six concerts and eighteen public rehearsals this season, under the leadership of Mr. Carl Bergmann, and with the full force of one hundred instruments. The solo performers are to be Madame Rosa, Madame Camilla Urso, Ole Bull, and Mr. Mills. Some specialties are also promised.

Cincinnati is said to be more densely populated than any other Western city. Its area is much less than any other city approximating to it in point of population. Within the last fifteen years a large part of the people who do business in the city have removed their residences to the suburbs and along the railroads, for a distance of twenty miles. In laying out Cincinnati its future growth was not provided for, or it was not expected to grow very fast.

A week or two ago, at a theatre in Louisville, a young ballet-dancer approached too near the foot-lights, and her gauze dress took fire. Her companions were too much panic-stricken to afford assistance; indeed, from the light material of their attire, it would have been dangerous for them to have done so. A gentleman in the audience had the presence of mind to throw his over-coat about the unfortunate girl. She was removed to the green-room, and medical assistance was called into requisition. She had been dreadfully burned on all parts of her person, and was but a scorched and withered relic of her former youth and grace. It was thought impossible that she could survive till morning. It was scarcely a moment after the dreadful calamity before the audience had regained its composure, and the merry plays, light dances, and jolly buffoonery were continued as if nothing had happened. In one room lay the poor girl suffering the tortures of death, while in the next the music and revelry went on with undiminished ardor.

It has been proposed by some of the earnest women of this city, who understand the needs and sorrows of the lower classes, to establish a "Night Refuge for Homeless Women." They desire to make this a charity of protection as much as one of reformation. One definite object is to offer a shelter to the discharged women from the hospitals and other institutions on Blackwell's Island, who are otherwise thrown upon the station-houses, or back to their old and unprofitable haunts.

A Kentucky paper relates a very singular freak of lightning. Recently a severe thunder-storm passed over the village of Morgantown. A young lady was standing at the window of a private residence, looking out upon the contending elements, when suddenly a flash of lightning passed through the window, severely shocking the young lady, but otherwise doing no damage. Upon investigation it was ascertained that the likeness or photograph of a beautiful ailanthus-tree, which stood in the immediate front of the window, by the electric flash had been impressed upon the bosom of the young lady, where it still remains plainly visible.

The sugar crop in Louisiana is now reported to be better than it was expected to be earlier in the season. The present estimate is about 1,200,000 hogheads, which is a great increase over last year's crop.

Among the Scotch peasants courtship is curiously managed. For a young man to call on a young woman in the daytime, or to talk with her in the presence of other people, even though they may be her nearest relatives, is a grave offense against the conventionalities. The time for such intercourse is at midnight. The lad comes under the lassie's window and whistles, or in some other way informs her of his presence. She thereupon lets him into the house, or, oftener, goes out to him. The call lasts from one to two hours, and fathers and mothers do not consider it in any wise objectionable.

Among the Chinese the child who dies without having his head shaved, not being entitled to a coffin, is reckoned as a nobody—a nonentity; but if he lives to grow a tail he is entitled to respect after death. In Shanghai there is what is called the "Baby Tower"—the common mausoleum for all babies who die before they are old enough to have their heads shaved, and their hair long enough to be braided into a pigtail. It is a square brick structure, fifteen or twenty feet high, standing over a deep well. The tower is full now, the window bricked up, the whole structure whitewashed. It is well filled with the decaying dust of thousands of children. No greater insult can be given to a Chinaman than to cut off his braided hair, or to speak slightly of it. A common punishment for small offenses in the courts against criminals is the tying of two offenders by their tails; and a punishment still more severe is the cutting off of the tail altogether. It is a mortifying humiliation.

When the Czar visited Warsaw the most remarkable precautions for his safety were taken. The police entered all houses on the route of the imperial procession, and searched the premises for concealed arms and assassins. The owners of the houses and the principal tenants were notified that they would be held responsible for any attack on the Czar.

The basis of genuine Castile soap is olive-oil. But the pure oil costs more than the soap itself will bring. So the manufacturer takes the marc from which all the oil has been pressed that profitably can be, and washes out the remainder with a solution of soda. American Castile soap is a palm-oil soap that resembles the real article in color only.

An experienced Vermont dairyman states that butter made in winter is greatly improved by heating, almost to the boiling-point, about a pint of each milking, and adding it to the remainder. The effect of this is to prevent the cream from turning bitter.

What are the changes going on in the heavenly bodies, or in our atmosphere, or in the illimitable space which lies between us and the stars, whereby a change in their color is observed? Sirius was described as a fiery-red star by the ancients; some years ago it was a pure white, while it is now becoming of a decided green color. Capella was also called a red star by the ancients; it was afterward described as a yellow star, and is now bluish. Many other instances of change of color, though less decided, have been detected.

It is said that a French chemist has invented a new way of preparing glass for mirrors. It is coated with an exceedingly thin layer of platinum, and becomes, mysteriously, not only a perfect mirror, but also remains so transparent that it may still be used for windows.

A little village in Connecticut, Thomaston by name, contains a manufactory which turns out about thirty clocks a day. The movements for these clocks are finely finished, with pinions of steel, and made upon the French plan. They are warranted good time-keepers, and are put up in elegant cases of most beautiful design.

The Springfield Republican is responsible for the statement that there is a married couple in that city who have not spoken to each other for years, and are not dumb either. They are trying to see which will hold out the longest—and at present make their little son a medium of communication.

Winter Bonnets.

Fig. 1.—Bonnet of light yellow crape, bouillonnée. Diadem composed of two black feathers with a yellow poppy with black centre. Large mantilla veil of black tulle, trimmed with black lace, fastened on the bonnet and falling back in the form of a fichu.

Fig. 2.—Bonnet of gray velvet, almost entirely covered with loops of pink ribbon. On the left side two roses are placed above the ear. Pink strings, edged with pink lace, and attached to a pleated piece of gray velvet, which extends downward and forms the beginning of the string.

Fig. 3.—Round hat of deep orange velvet, encircled with leaves of the same shade, a trailing spray of which falls over a little black lace veil. Aigrette at the side. The crown of the hat is ornamented with two bias folds of satin.

Fig. 4.—Black velvet bonnet, with diadem of the same velvet pleated. Cluster of pansies in front. Strings of black velvet, bordered with lace and fastened by three little papillon bows of black satin.

Fig. 5.—Shirred bonnet of garnet velvet, trimmed with an aigrette of black lace and pomegranate. Satin flowers with leaves of yellow satin. A cluster of these flowers is set on the top of the bonnet, and sprays fall behind in the fashion of a cache-peigne.

INTO ETERNITY.

We were young and foolish, she and I,
As we roamed the summer woods,
Where the flowers grow and the breezes sigh,
And the pine-tree gravely nods;
And I told her of a promised home
Beyond a wide, troubled sea,
Where she and I together might roam
Into eternity.

And I held her hand in my burning hand,
As we stood 'neath the nodding pine,
While I spoke of that far-off golden land
Which flows with oil and wine;
And I saw her face, like an angel's face,
And her blue eyes turned on me—
"I would follow you, love, from place to place
Into eternity."

We were young and foolish, she and I,
As we roamed those summer woods;
And I think, with a weary, bitter sigh,
Of the place where the pine-tree nods;
For the distant home that I told her of,
Across a wide, troubled sea,
Is the land where angels dwell in love—
Into eternity.

In my dreams alone I am with her there,
And I hold her patient hand;
But I still keep looking for my share
Of that long-promised land—
Where once again, on her angel face,
That glad light I may see,
And by her side I shall take my place
Through all eternity.

THE LITTLE WOMAN IN THE RED CLOAK.

WHEN old Aunt Sally Stephens died, and it was found that she had left her nephew John the whole of her vast property, it must be confessed that his head was slightly turned by this unexpected good fortune. He, like every body else, had taken it for granted that pious Aunt Sally would bequeath the bulk of her property to the charitable institutions of which she had always been so generous a patron.

Mr. Stephens almost immediately resolved to abandon the dear old homestead, and build a splendid mansion to correspond with his new fortune.

Up to this time he had lived contentedly on the old homestead, in a commodious wooden dwelling built by his grandfather, and until the shower of Aunt Sally's gold fell around him had never dreamed that any place in the world could be half as pleasant as the dear old home, into which the sunshine fell so brightly in the summer, and which the great wood-fires lit up almost as brightly when winter winds howled and whistled and snow fell and drifted out of doors.

He was an intelligent and sensible man, but gold will blind the clearest eyes sometimes, before they get accustomed to its glitter. Mr. Stephens's eyes must have been dazzled in this way, or he would never have thought of removing his dear wife Bess and their sweet little children—Dick, Nell, Harry, Kitty, and "Baby"—from the dear house in which they had been so happy.

But of course his eyes were dazzled, and his head was turned, and so he engaged a fashionable architect to plan him a perfect palace of a house—a building which every body would be sure to call the handsomest mansion in the country, and an honor and ornament to the town in which it was built. Well pleased with his success in this preliminary step, he proceeded to select a site worthy of such an edifice, and to lay out grounds suitable for so splendid a residence. He purchased a large and lofty tract of land overlooking the river, the broad harbor, and the blue hills which encircled the bay.

The house was built of the handsomest and most expensive stone, and finished in the inside with the nicest of woods and the finest of marbles, while the surrounding grounds were laid out by a famous landscape gardener, who came from Europe for the express purpose of superintending this portion of the work.

At length the building was completed, and a very grand and imposing edifice it was, as unlike the dear old house as can well be imagined. And oh, how splendidly it was fitted up! All the furniture had been imported from the best manufacturers in France and England, and was of the most expensive description.

As you wandered through the gorgeous rooms you could almost fancy yourself in the abode of princes—so rich, beautiful, and luxurious was every thing around you.

Every one said that it was a perfect palace of a house, and of course every body envied the fortunate possessor of such a magnificent establishment. The grounds about the new house were worthy of the building which they inclosed. Lawns and groves, gardens and hot-houses, trees and shrubs, and flowers of every description delighted the senses and caused the visitor to exclaim: "Oh, what a Paradise it is!"

And yet when at last the day of removal came, Mr. Stephens and his sweet-faced wife and their little ones all hated to say good-by to the dear home, and shed many tears at leaving that silent witness of all their old joys and griefs; the dear old house which had for so many years folded them safely and warmly in its faithful embrace. There was the kitchen with its broad, hospitable fire-place, around whose hearth the children had cracked their nuts, and eaten their apples, and drank their cider, every winter since they could remember; the "sitting-room" where they had sewed, studied, and read those fairy-tales which, somehow or other, used to seem much nicer to mother and children than they did now that they had really come true. As for the parlor, it had been a parlor only in name in their day, for, as it opened into the sitting-room, it was considered and used as part of that room until it had completely lost its own identity.

Then the library and its sunny south windows hardly looked like the same place now, with its dismantled shelves; for even gold had not blinded the good man's eyes to the value of the well-worn and well-marked books; so that the faithful old friends took their place by the side of their gilded fellows in the new house with a look of bashful humility, as much as to say: "We beg your pardon, but we will try to take up as little room and be as unobtrusive as possible."

In like manner the two old chairs from the kitchen—one covered with leather, in which Mr. S. was wont to sit so comfortably, and the other a dear little calico-covered rocking-chair, which had been Mrs. S.'s pet seat in the long, cozy winter evenings when she mended the family stockings—were too precious to be left behind, and so, though looking out of place and almost scared to death, were carried over to the new house and deposited in its splendid kitchen.

At length the family were fairly installed in their new house, and the old one was rented, furniture and all, to a portly grocer with his noisy family of eight rude and turbulent boys, and very soon looked so little like its former self that Mrs. S. and the children hated to drive by it, and avoided it when they went out to ride; for it grieved them sadly to see the dear old place looking so unkept and strange.

Now of course you will suppose that Mr. S. and his wife and family were very happy when they were settled in the midst of such luxury, and courted and flattered by the wealthiest and most fashionable people, and that they grew more and more thankful for this unexpected gift of riches, which had come to them as if by a fairy's wand. I, too, might suppose so if I did not know the contrary; but I know that Mr. S. grew ungrateful, and more and more ungrateful and dissatisfied every day, until sometimes he gave his fortune such very hard names that, if it had had any spirit or power of indignation, it would have "taken to itself wings and flown away," as wealth has sometimes been known to do.

To tell the truth, after Mr. S. had resided in the new house a year he reluctantly confessed to himself that he was not half as happy as he used to be at the old homestead, and that he began to feel as though he should never be really happy again.

Let him open the windows of the great tall rooms as he would in summer, or heap up the coal in the furnaces as he would in winter, there was no longer that genial sunshine, that hearty warmth, which used to radiate through the dear old rooms, warming and gladdening their very hearts. There were no more family gatherings in the summer arbor, or by the winter hearth; for either the house was full of visitors, or part of the family were absent on visits or excursions, or, when they were at home, that home was crowded by nurse, governess, tutor, seamstress, and servants scattered about every where—"up stairs, down stairs, and in my lady's chamber." He had few of his old pleasures and occupations. The education of his children was given into the hands of others; and his wife, even, no longer had time to spend with him, entering into all his plans, assisting him in his perplexities, reading with him in the library, or administering to his wants with her own hands as in the old days.

Besides these things, the care of his great mansion and grounds, and the oversight of the large number of people whom he was obliged to employ, rendered it almost impossible for him to call any hour really his own, or to indulge in the quiet enjoyment of those literary tastes and habits which had heretofore been his chief enjoyment. His life seemed all at once aimless and useless. Even that he was no longer obliged to labor for the support of himself and family seemed to him at length a misfortune and grievance.

As for Mrs. Stephens, although she forbore to tell her husband that she was less happy than of old, she was, in reality, far more miserable than he. Domestic in her tastes and habits, the change had been a terrible one for her. Her first and greatest trial had been the necessity of giving up the care of her children, in order that she might perform the part which devolved upon her in her new station, and conform to the customs of the society in which she moved. Even her dear little baby, which she had been accustomed to keep almost wholly in her own charge, had been given up to a nurse, and was sometimes out of her sight for a whole day at a time, while she made calls, entertained visitors, or superintended the affairs of her large household. As regarded the older children, she was no longer their ever-present mentor and friend; and they, being thus deprived of her wise and loving counsels and control, became, of course, much less orderly, quiet, and pleasing in their manners, and their very dispositions and characters seemed to have undergone an unfortunate change. They were, however, the least conscious sufferers from their altered circumstances. If they were less happy than of old, as they undoubtedly were, the novelty and variety of their new life, the beauty of their clothes, and the splendor of their home, kept them constantly excited, and the thoughtlessness common to their years prevented their realizing the full extent of the losses which had attended their worldly gain.

Matters continued in this way for several years, with no changes except for the worse. Mr. S.'s face wore gradually less and less of its old kindly, composed expression, and his wife's grew more and more thin and pensive, while the children were so altered that one could scarcely have recognized in the pert, willful, conceited little boys and misses the modest, courteous, well-behaved children of a few years ago.

One cold winter's evening Mr. S. returned home from a long ride with hands and feet almost stiffened with cold. To his vexation he found that his family and the fires had all gone out. Not a soul greeted him as he came in. Even the servants seemed to have disappeared, and in vain did the poor man try every register in every room—all were cold, or nearly so.

"I must go and see to the furnaces myself," said he, rubbing his hands and making his way down stairs as fast as his benumbed feet would permit.

On his way to this underground region of furnaces he passed the open kitchen door, and oh! how his heart leaped! It was something like the old kitchen at home. The great range glowed red with heat, and through its bars the coals shone dazzlingly bright, the tea-kettle sang softly to itself, and the boiler bubbled and bubbled as if full of glee.

Glancing in, he found the kitchen empty; the cook, too, had evidently gone out.

He stole in as if he were an intruder, and softly seated himself in the great leather arm-chair—his own old familiar Sleepy Hollow—placed his benumbed feet on the hob, and looked around him.

The oaken floor was neat and bright, his wife's comfortable old rocking-chair, with its familiar calico cushion, stood on the opposite side of the range, and the large kitchen table bore bravely up under a huge array of breakfast preparations.

"This is the pleasantest part of the house that I have seen yet," he said to himself, musingly; and while he mused with bended head the whole scene seemed to fade softly away, and after a time, during which he seemed to have lost all consciousness, to reappear again, but with certain fantastic additions.

The kettle no longer sung and the boiler no longer bubbled like unconscious, inanimate things, but as though they were alive, and very bustling and talkative, and over the whole scene there seemed to rest a thin blue mist, which gave it all an appearance of vagueness and unreality. Soon, however, and most wonderful of all, the steam of the kettle began to mingle and take form and color—a color so bright that at first Mr. S. could not see what the form resembled. The apparition descended airily from its first position under the ceiling, and seated itself in the wooden rocking-chair opposite.

It was a little fat woman, in a bright flame-colored cloak and hood, with a happy, good-natured face, and a smile so bright that the blue mist turned to a kind of golden halo round about as soon as she began to part her rosy lips and show her pretty teeth, as she did as soon as she had fairly finished seating herself in her bustling little way, and had leaned back and folded her dimpled hands, as if she were fully contented with every thing in the world.

At first Mr. S. felt a little alarmed, but seeing that his companion had such a pleasant countenance, he soon became as much at ease as ever, and was inclined to feel very well disposed toward the merry, nice-looking woman.

"You are not the cook, I suppose?" said he, thinking that perhaps there was a new woman in Nancy's place.

"Oh no! I am Comfort!" and here the little woman smiled again, at which the room glowed more brightly than before.

"Comfort?" said Mr. S., interrogatively. "Did you come to see Nancy?"

"Nancy? No indeed! I see Nancy every day. I live here in the kitchen."

"Ah!" said her companion, not thinking at the time but what it was the most natural thing in the world that she should live there, "I didn't know that before."

"No; you haven't known much about me lately, I should think."

"You don't mean that I have ever been acquainted with you?" said the puzzled gentleman, scrutinizing her features in the endeavor to awaken some recollection of having seen them before.

"Oh, yes indeed!" and here the little woman fairly laughed—a silvery and very sweet laugh. "I used to be at your old house all the time, and I tried to follow you here, but I couldn't get any further than the kitchen. Your old home was a dear, familiar place to me. I had lived there ever since your grandfather's day. Ah! he was a nice man; but it was just as pleasant in your day, Sir—just as pleasant!" and the little woman shook her head, and for a moment you might have thought she was going to look grave; but, as though that were impossible for a person of her happy disposition, in the next moment you began to think you had made a mistake, and that her face had only been growing brighter.

It made Mr. S.'s heart warm toward her to know that she had lived with him in the old house, and with his father and grandfather before him; and he thought she was a cheery little body to be in any one's house, lighting it up so marvelously; and it occurred to him that even his new house would be a very different place if she would consent to go farther than the kitchen. He thought that even the two great parlors, which he always carefully avoided, might look homelike if she would only enter them. He began to believe that she was some good fairy, as indeed she was, and is.

"Why can't you go farther than the kitchen? I should like very much to have you occupy the whole house."

"Oh no!" said the little red woman, putting up her hands in horror at the idea. "I couldn't breathe in any room but this! I should die instantly! Don't speak of it!"

Ashamed at having asked any thing apparently so preposterous, Mr. S. proceeded more cautiously.

"Ah, Comfort," said he, "I wish we were back in the old house, you and all of us; but it's hardly fit to live in now. I am afraid that if we were to go there it would never seem like the old house again. But do you never live any where but in old brown houses and kitchens? for if you don't I think we had better go back and make the best of the changes."

"Oh yes! I live in a great many very handsome houses," replied Mrs. Red Cloak; "and I rather prefer them, all other things being equal; but they are seldom as large as this; yet I have lived in houses as large"—and here she leaned forward and spoke in a low, confidential tone—"yes, a few times, even, I have lived in kings' palaces; but seldom, very seldom. Kings usually sleep on thorny pillows, you know, and I never stay in houses where pillows are made of thorns—they may look ever so downy, but I am never deceived by appearances;" and she shook her head and leaned back in her chair again, and for a moment the golden haze changed back to the blue mist.

"Do you think this house could be rendered habitable for you?" said Mr. S., meekly.

"One—two," said she, counting that small number with her thumb laid on the little finger and its neighbor as if she were no great expert in figures, while her face took on a thoughtful air. "One—two; and none of the children will be grown up these seven years. Doubtful—doubtful! Two are not enough to work such complicated machinery noiselessly, and I can not endure noise and disorder any more than I can primness and silence. There are not enough of you, and there are none whom you love and trust who can assist you. No, it can not be done. You must concentrate—you must concentrate; that is the secret. And of all things," said Mrs. Red Cloak, lifting her hands impressively, "beware of vanity and fashion, for I never live in the same house with them long. Whatever you do, do it for convenience sake, or some sensible reason, and not merely because others do it. If you follow the customs of others without being assured of their excellence, some day you will find me missing. I shall be gone in a flash. I like sensible people who have minds of their own. You used to be twice as sensible as you are now, Mr. S. Who would have thought you could have been so misled by good, plain Aunt Sally's money? Why, don't you remember that, rich as she was, she always staid in that old square brick house of her father's, where she was born, and every one used to say that a turtle would as soon think of leaving its shell as she of deserting the old brick house? A happy old lady she was, too—always so cheerful and smiling. When she made her will I know how she said to herself: 'Now there's John—such a fine, sensible fellow!—yes, he takes after the Stephenses; and there was never one of the good old stock who was selfish or worldly or aped gentility—pah!—although they were all so thrifty that the poorest of them was well-to-do in the world. I'd trust John with any thing, even with a fortune, although that is about the hardest test to which you can put a man's good sense. Yes, and he shall have the management of this troublesome fortune of mine. It is a heavy load of care to put upon any one's shoulders; but if his poor, weak, old Aunt Sally has borne it so long, such a sturdy young fellow ought to carry it bravely. I believe he would do more good with it than all the good institutions. He is a noble man, a wise and good man.' You see I knew Aunt Sally well."

Mr. S.'s eyes had filled with tears during this discourse, and he visibly trembled with emotion.

"I am very fortunate in having caught a glimpse of you to-night, Comfort," said he, meekly. "I thought a little while ago that I should never be like my old self again, but now that I find what it is I have been missing I can try to regain it. Yes, Comfort, if I can make you live with us again it will be all right. I shall know when you come by every thing being so bright and cheerful once more. But shall I ever see you again as you are now?"

"No," said Comfort; "not unless something remarkable happens; but, as you say, you will always know when I am about. There is no place where I am so often found as by a warm blazing fire on a cold winter's night, when the grate is red and the biting wind whistles angrily around the house and down the chimney, vexed at being kept out so securely. Then, if you hear the fire snap and crackle, or the kettle sing, you may know that it is I humming and talking; and if you listen perhaps you may hear something that I say; and when the flames leap up, glowing and waving, it is I laughing to hear the wind rave and roar because I won't let him in."

Just then there came a gust of wind which blew Comfort out of her chair, and in a twinkling she rose and vanished in the warm steam from which she had at first emerged.

Mr. S. started too, and saw the door wide open, and Nancy standing in it wonder-struck, staring at him with expanded eyes.

"Don't be alarmed, Nancy," said he, rising; "it was rather cool up stairs, and I stepped in to warm my feet." With this explanation he retreated.

You may be sure that the very first thing Mr. S. did was to tell his wife all about Comfort; and you can imagine how delighted she was to think they were to try and have her back again, fully agreeing with her husband that it would be far better to give the new house up as a failure than attempt to change it, with the danger of failing in the end to make it pleasing to Comfort.

At first they imagined that the old house could not be repaired to advantage; but after they had dismissed the grocer, and the place was restored, indoors and out, to something of its former tidiness, it looked so sunny and cozy and inviting that even the children fell in love with it again, and thought, in spite of their first reluctance to give up their fairy palace, that this was the nicest, dearest home in the world after all.

They made quite a number of improvements about the dear old house, and at every alteration Mr. and Mrs. S. would say to each other: "I think Comfort will like that." "That will suit Comfort better."

But they did not remove the old-fashioned chimney in the kitchen, and they had open stoves and grates in the other rooms, so that the fire could be every where visible, and they could see Comfort laugh and hear her sing.

And this ancient dwelling, thus rejuvenated, is the pleasantest house in the world, summer or winter, fall or spring, and the grounds the loveliest that ever were seen; with the smooth lawns, the neatly cut, white-graveled walks, and the fine old rows of trees planted by Mr. S.'s grandfather.

The house does not look or seem like a palace, but it looks and seems like the residence of the very Genius of Home, and Comfort delights to dwell in it continually.

Once more under the entire control and instruction of their sensible and intelligent parents, the children became the most cultivated and engaging of young people, and were respected, admired, and beloved by all who knew them.

As for the great house, no private purchaser was found sufficiently wealthy, and correspondingly foolish, to buy it; and it was finally sold to the State, and fitted up for an insane asylum.

The neighbors, who naturally supposed that Mr. S. had left his house because he was unable to support so large an establishment, consoled with him, saying that he must have greatly lamented the necessity of leaving his beautiful mansion, and were invariably surprised at his apparently very cheerful resignation.

"And it must have been a still greater trial to see it used for such a melancholy purpose," said one sympathizing old lady.

"The most appropriate use to which it could have been put, ma'am," said Mr. S., emphatically. "I am very grateful at not having been confined there, as one of the first of its lunatic inmates, for having built it."

At which the old lady bade him a hasty good-morning, and inquired of the next acquaintance she met if he had ever heard it hinted that Mr. Stephens's recent losses had unsettled his mind.

But there were other changes than these. It was not long before the shade of Aunt Sally must have looked down upon her nephew with gratified approval.

When Mr. S. came to his senses he came to them at once and for good, and from that time there was no one who would not have indorsed Aunt Sally's confidence in him as described by Comfort. His wise and energetic stewardship of Aunt Sally's gold was something wonderful. If it dazzled his eyes no longer, its glitter gladdened the eyes of the poor for miles around.

The sudden and wonderful prosperity of the town of V—(in which the asylum was situated) soon attracted universal attention; manufacture, commerce, agriculture seemed all at once to have sprung into the greatest activity.

"What has given rise to these improvements?" said a stranger to one of the citizens. At which the latter pointed out to him a fine-looking man with a remarkably calm and pleasant expression of countenance.

"There, Sir, is the benefactor of V—, a gentleman of great intelligence and culture, who a number of years since inherited from his aunt an immense property, which he has not, apparently, touched on his own account, but has judiciously invested in means of public benefit and advancement. The rich, who are envious of his popularity, say that he is ambitious, but it is the general opinion that he disdains mere worldly applause as much as he disdains mere riches."

To which the other replied:

"It is not usually supposed that ambition conduces to happiness and contentment, from which I should judge that the gentleman is not ambitious, for I never saw a countenance before so indicative of perfect repose and cheerfulness."

MODERN AMERICAN WOMEN.

THE Nation, in an able criticism of the recent Saturday Review articles on women, makes the following sensible remarks on the adaptability of such strictures to American girls:

"What do you see when, on a clear autumn day, you measure the length of the Fifth Avenue, or ascend the sunny slope of Beacon Street? Do you encounter a train of youthful Jezebels with plastered faces and lascivious eyes and a general dévergondage of mien? You meet a large number of very pretty and, on the whole, very fresh-looking girls, dressed in various degrees of the prevailing fashion. It is obvious that their persons betray a very lively desire to be well dressed, and that the idea 'well dressed' has, to their minds, a peculiar significance. It has a sacred and absolute meaning. Their bonnets must be very small, their paniers very large, their heels very high, and all their appointments as elegant as possible. A young girl of fashion, dressed to suit her own taste, is undeniably a very artificial and composite creature, and doubtless not an especially edifying spectacle. She has largely compromised her natural freedom of movement. The most that you can say of her is that she is charming, with a quasi-corrupt arbitrary charm. She has, moreover, great composure and impenetrability of aspect. She practices a sort of half-cynical indifference to the beholder (we speak of the extreme cases). Accustomed to walk alone in the streets of a great city, and to be looked at by all sorts of people, she has acquired an unshrinking directness of gaze. She is the least bit hard. If she is more than this—if she is painted and touselled and wantonly chiffonnée—she is simply an exception, and the sisterhood of 'modern women' are in no way responsible for her. She would have been the same in the good old times of our great-grandmothers. The faults and follies that can be really fastened upon the younger women of the present day are, in our opinion, all caused and explained by the growing love of luxury and elegance. The standard in these matters is so much higher than it was thirty and forty years ago that a young girl—even when she has money—needs a great deal more time to maintain herself at the proper level. She has frequently no time left for any thing else—for study, for reflection, or sentiment. She is absorbed in the care of her person. A young girl given up to dress is certainly a very flimsy and empty creature, and there is something truly ignoble in the incessant effort to gratify and stimulate the idle taste of a host of possible 'admirers.' But between this sort of thing and the sort of thing described by the Saturday Reviewers there is a very wide gulf—a gulf made by that strong conservative element in the feminine nature of which the writer in question seems to have so little notion. Women turn themselves into painted courtesans for two reasons—as a means of gaining a subsistence which is impracticable in any other way, or because they have a natural taste for the business. The first motive is common, and the second is rare; so rare that where the first does not exist, the rap-prochement of the Saturday Reviewer is a wanton exaggeration in the interest of sensationalism. The whole indictment represented by this volume seems to us perfectly irrational. It is impossible to discuss and condemn the follies of 'modern women' apart from those of modern men. They are all part and parcel of the follies of modern civilization, which is working itself out through innumerable blunders. It seems to us supremely absurd to stand up in the high places and endeavor, with a long lash and a good deal of bad language, to drive women back into the ancient fold. Their extravagance is a part of their increased freedom, and their increased freedom a part of the growth of society. The lamentable results—the extremely uncomfortable 'wreck' society would be sure to incur from an attempt to fasten again upon womankind the tether which was sufficient unto the aspirations of Miss Hannah More and Miss Edgeworth, the authors of these papers would be the first to denounce. We are all of us extravagant, superficial, and luxurious together. It is a 'sign of the times.' Women share in the fault not as women, but as simple human beings. As women, they strike us as still remarkably patient, submissive, sympathetic—remarkably well-disposed to model themselves on the judgment and wishes of men. They reflect with great clearness the state of the heart and imagination of men. When they present an ugly picture, therefore, we think it the part of wisdom for men to cast a glance at their own internal economy. If there is any truth in the volume before us, they have a vast deal to answer for. They give the ton—they pitch the key."

THE DAY THAT HANNAH LONGED FOR.

LITTLE HANNAH sits on the door-step, and the scarlet-runners make a canopy over her head. She is sunning herself in the doorway on this July afternoon, and her head is as full of happy thoughts as the day is of brightness.

Would you think she hadn't much to make her happy? That little brown house, with its tangled bit of garden and its broken fence; a patched calico gown, a plain, sun-burnt face, and hard brown hands, with overgrown joints, that had too early become acquainted with the wash-tub and the broom. And then it seems so lonely there! So it is sometimes, but to-day Hannah's thoughts are company enough, and she smiles and looks over her shoulder through the low window toward the kitchen cupboard, wherein lie hidden two little wooden wagons with wheels that will turn, and brightly painted sides. You see to-morrow will be the twins' birthday; Tom and Aggie will be three years old, and these wagons are their beautiful birthday presents from Hannah. Dan made them, Hannah's brother Dan, a man grown, although she is but a child of ten years. And Dan has staid away from the tavern and his gay companions, and worked on these toys to give his little sister pleasure; for he has a kind heart when he can keep away from drink.

And the twins. Are they her little brother and sister? Oh no; they are Agnes Wilson's babies; Agnes who lives next door, and has been such a help and comfort to Hannah ever since she was left to be housekeeper all alone for her father and Dan.

It was no harder, perhaps, than before; for her mother's drunken fits came oftener and oftener at the last, and the poor little daughter lived in constant fear until her father came home at night from his work in the coal-mine, and protected his trembling child from the blows that were aimed at her. And so when, one night, her mother was found dead in the road, Hannah scarcely found life harder than before, although for a child of seven it was no light matter to take the burden of even their little housekeeping; and sometimes, in the midst of her work, she would hide her face and sob, and wish she could even hear her mother scold again. Then Agnes would come in and lighten all her cares with a helping hand and a word of advice. How many times Hannah had to run and ask Agnes if the bread was risen enough to bake, or how she must make the stew for her father's supper. She has learned it all now, and is a wise little housekeeper for one of her years.

And now about the twins. Hannah is thinking of the time when they were born. It was just such a July day as this; not too hot, but very bright and beautiful. It was only a few weeks after her mother died, and she was so lonely that she had wandered down the road to the great white house where Mrs. Leighton lived; for she wanted to look into the parlor window and see the picture of the angels that hangs over the fire-place; five little angels floating among the clouds; five sweet young faces, with shining hair and radiant eyes; a shadowy semblance of cherubic wings; and then the soft rolling clouds. Hannah knows that angels have no bodies, but she is sure they have faces and wings. She is satisfied with this picture, more than satisfied, for these angels are her ideal companions, and she loves them.

Well, she took a long, loving look at her angels, and then ran home to set out her father's supper, for she heard the foundry whistle, and knew that the mine hands would take it as a signal for coming up. How glad she was of the long daylight, for in winter time she never saw her father's face, excepting by candle-light; he was down so early, and up so late.

On this particular night Hannah went to bed thinking of her picture, and she dreamed a dream—a wonderful dream; the more so because it came true, as you will see. She dreamed that she went up into heaven, softly floating all the way on a great white cloud, and there she saw her dear angels, and many more like them—little heads and wings, smiling, fair faces that looked kindly at her, the little, dark stranger who had strayed up from earth, and had the burden of a body to carry about; and that while she looked at them with longing love, a voice of infinite tenderness said, "Hannah shall not be lonely any more." At that forth from the shining ranks came two bright, baby faces, and their wings faded away, and little bodies grew out instead, and their added weight drew the babies gently earthward; but as she held out her arms in an ecstasy to clasp them she woke, and the red light of sunrise was shining in her face. She gave a little sigh, half pleasure, half pain—joy for the loveliness of her dream, sorrow that it was only a dream, and then she went cheerfully to work to make the fire, and have her father's coffee ready by the time he should wake.

She had filled his dinner-can, and seen him start for his work; had watched Dan loiter down the road to his engine, which stood waiting in the engine-house, and then she went out to the well for some water, when, looking across to Agnes Wilson's window, she saw old Aunt Debby leaning from it, and beckoning to her.

How did Aunt Debby come there? She wasn't there last night. However, Hannah was willing enough to obey the summons, and as soon as she was within hearing Aunt Debby called out, "Hanny, come in a minute. Agnes has got something to show you here." In an instant Hannah was in the room, and there lay Agnes, smiling quietly, and beside her two tiny babies. Hannah couldn't speak. They had really come, then; come for her, as the voice said, only Agnes was to take care of them, because she would know how so much better.

Hannah bent down and laid her cheek against their little faces; she didn't dare to kiss them, so holy—she knew, you see, where they had come from. A choking feeling came in her throat; she turned and went out that she might breathe. I think she wanted to find a large enough place to be thankful in.

From that day Hannah's life brightened. No more devoted little nurse walked the earth than she; patient, tender, loving, she watched the babies—little Tom and Aggie.

And now three years of their little lives had passed; they had learned to walk, to talk, to play so prettily together, to pluck flowers in the meadow, to call the chickens and feed them, and to run and meet their father when he came from his work. And every new accomplishment made Hannah so happy. To-morrow would be their birthday; no wonder Hannah had pleasant thoughts. She fancied them in the new calico frocks their mother was even then finishing, pulling the little wagons up and down the lane, loading them with sand and stones, and laughing to see them tip over.

As she sat smiling at her own fancies a long, shrill whistle sounded from behind the hill. That is Dan coming round the curve. Hannah springs to her feet, puts her driest chips under the tea-kettle, and takes out the loaf of brown bread from the cupboard, stopping for one glance at the beautiful wagons. Then she sets out a basin of cool, fresh water, knowing that Dan will come smoky and hot from his engine; and in another minute his "Well, Sis!" greets her ear. It means as much to her as many tender words to some petted child, and it at least always assures her of one thing, that he has not been drinking.

Dan is tired and hungry. He eats huge slices of bread, and she fills his cup, keeping the teapot on the stove that it may be hot for her father.

The hours go slowly to-night. She is longing for to-morrow that she may see the delight of Tom and Aggie over their presents.

Her father comes, praises her hot tea, watches her quick, handy ways as she clears away the dishes; and although he does not say it, he thinks to himself, "Nobody has a better little girl than I have."

Then she goes in to help Agnes put the babies to bed; her nightly benediction as a blessing given returns upon the giver.

At last home and to bed, and night is only a happy instant that brings morning. Now all her pleasant fancies begin to be realized; the twins come trotting across the yard, hand in hand, to show Hannah the new pink frocks, and with an air of deepest mystery she says, "Now we will see if there is anything in this cupboard!" and the wagon wheels rattle on the floor, while the children scream with delight.

Twenty times in the course of that morning Hannah ran to the door to enjoy the sight of her pets with their new playthings. But at noon their mother called them in out of the heat, and it was not until the middle of the sultry afternoon that Hannah, thinking the children were taking an unusually long nap, ran over to ask Agnes what had become of them. "Become of them!" cried their mother, "why they went over to your house with their little wagons an hour ago."

In an instant the child has caught up her sun-bonnet and exclaiming, "They are lost!" has started down the road, calling right and left, looking over fences and stopping at houses to inquire, while Agnes hurries off in the opposite direction.

"I do believe that Hanny would give her life for them children," said old Aunt Debby, as, two hours later, she watched the child, heated, dusty and weary, still eager in her search. Suddenly she begins to run—the railroad track—why hadn't she thought of that before! It is most time too for Dan's train, but she will be sure to hear his whistle before he reaches the curve. He never failed but once, and then he had been drinking. It nearly cost him his place, and it was such a lesson that he couldn't forget it; although he did say that it was no use making such a fuss, for no harm came of it.

She runs till she is breathless; the houses are in the way and hide the track; she stumbles on through the dust, and there, in the very narrowest path of the new cut, right in the middle of the track, sit the pretty babies loading their little wagons with stones.

Hannah sinks down beside them too tired to move. Before she has time to recover her breath the rush and tumble of the train startle her. Can it be? and yet she has heard no whistle.

An empty gravel-car tilts against the bank beside the track; she springs into it. The engine appears round the curve. Tom and Aggie can't climb. She hadn't thought of that, poor child! She is down again in an instant, catching them up, first Aggie, then Tom, thrusting them into the slanting car. Aggie is safe; her arms tremble as she lifts the heavy little boy, and pushes him over the edge of the car; then the hot blast from the engine scorches her cheek. His little frock hangs outside; it may get caught in the wheels; she reaches to tuck it in, and that is the last she can do.

A strange jar goes through the train. The screams of two little children in a gravel-car make the bleary-eyed engineer start and look out. He has forgotten to sound the whistle.

When Hannah's father came up from the mine that night the men he met turned away their faces, and went by without speaking. How could they tell him?

It was Agnes, Agnes with her own children safe in her arms, who told the father that his little Hannah had given her life for theirs.

Was this the birthday she had longed for? A birthday for the twins upon earth—one for herself in heaven.

Do you think it terribly sad that she should have so short a life here? Who, in many years, has lived so well as she in that single day? Two little lives saved; and Dan saved from a far worse death; for how could he ever drink again? His little sister's face came between him and temptation.

GENTLEMEN'S PARIS WINTER FASHIONS.

Fig. 1.—We commit the anomaly of introducing this figure into a plate of gentlemen's fashions on account of the cloak, which is made of mixed cloth, and which needs the strength of the tailor rather than the taste of the dress-maker for its manufacture. Such, at least, is the opinion of the Parisian journal which furnishes us the present fashion plate. This cloak is warm and comfortable, and is an excellent substitute for the common water-proof cloak. It is cut in the sack shape, with large sleeves, and closed with four buttons in front.

Fig. 2.—Breton dress for boy from six to seven years old. This suit is of black velvet, and is extremely stylish and pretty. It is composed, first, of a little jacket trimmed with a row of brandenburgs on each side of the breast. A broad silk galloon is laid on flat around the edge of the jacket, pocket lapels, cuffs, and top of the sleeves. There is no collar. Simulated double-breasted vest front. Short, full trousers, trimmed down the sides and round the bottom with galloon like the jacket. Gaiters with leggings. Small black round hat, with feather.

Fig. 3.—Dress for lad fifteen or sixteen years old. Short double-breasted sack of light brown cloth, vest of the same material without collar, and rather full dark brown pantaloons.

Fig. 4.—Close-fitting English coat with short, scant skirt, bordered with silk galloon laid on flat. The collar is faced with velvet, and, consequently, has no galloon on the edge. Double-breasted vest without collar and buttoning high, edged with a galloon narrower than that of the coat. Pantaloons rather full.

Fig. 5.—Brown over-coat, somewhat short, straight behind without being cut up, and closed in front by an under strip so as to conceal the buttons. The edge is finished with stitching, and collar faced with velvet. Mixed pantaloons.

Fig. 6.—Double-breasted frock-coat, closed at the third button from the bottom. The illustration shows the length of the skirt and waist and the cut of the back. Olive pantaloons.

Fig. 7.—Double-breasted frock-coat with four buttons, three of which are used. Waist close fitting, skirt short and scant. Pocket lapels on the hips. Edge finished with galloon laid on flat; collar faced with velvet. Pantaloons of light figured cloth, straight, with a stripe down the side. Double-breasted vest, of the same material as the pantaloons.

THE SACRISTAN'S HOUSEHOLD.

A Story.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE DESERTED HUNTING-LODGE.

THE winter passed away, and the spring commenced without any very stirring event which affected our dramatis personæ. But during the whole of the winter several changes had been gradually taking place. These may be briefly summed up, and put into tangible shape, although in operation they were as imperceptible as the growth of a blade of grass.

Otto paid his visit to his uncle at Horn, and found the old sacristan sourer and more despotic than ever. As the substance of power over his nephew appeared likely to slip through his fingers, he grasped the more eagerly after its shadow. During the week that Otto remained at Horn his head was running a good deal upon his recent encounter with the charcoal-burner in the forest, but he did not mention it to his uncle. Simon Schnarcher's mood did not invite such a confidence. Indeed, at all times, the mention of Otto's mother, or of her family, was sufficient to irritate him, and Otto desired to avoid the risk of calling forth any bitter or contemptuous words, such as had once been spoken about his parents' marriage. Thus he returned to Detmold without having said anything to his uncle about Joachim Müller, and resumed his duties in Herr Schmitt's shop.

Owing to his employer's feeble health, Otto was kept pretty closely employed during the remainder of the winter. He was unable to prosecute any inquiries about his newly-found cousin. The one or two jägers whom he saw occasionally in the town professed complete ignorance of his name. A charcoal-burner! Well, how could they tell? There were dozens of charcoal-burners.

Neither did Otto see Liese very frequently. Indeed, it seemed strange that in so small a place as the capital of Lippe-Detmold it should be possible for two persons, desirous of meeting, to see each other so seldom. But so it was.

Liese, on her part, continued to satisfy even that exigent lady, Frau Mathilde von Schleppe, in the performance of her household duties. The girl's cheerful, modest sweetness of nature caused her mistress to conceive a real regard for her. Mathilde was not without native kindness of feeling, and the atmosphere of her kitchen was, of all others into which she ever came, the most favorable for the development of the best side of her character. The reason of this was simple. Almost every where else she was pretentious, overbearing, militant. In her kitchen alone she could afford to be thoroughly natural, for there she was mistress of the situation. Whether the Justizrath's wife was really well-born, well-bred, or in any way fitted to fill the place in society which she had assumed by sheer force of will, was—as none knew better than herself—open to question. But there was no judge of such matters in the Principality who would have disputed the excellence of her apple-compôte, bratwürste, or pastry. And as it is natural to like those who habitually see us under favorable circumstances, so it came to pass that the relations between the mistress and the maid grew to be pleasanter than Liese had at first hoped could ever be possible; and Frau von Schleppe proved to be really kind, albeit in the imperious despotic way that belonged to her.

Meanwhile the influence of the Justizrath over his chief, Von Groll, increased steadily. The latter acquired the habit of appealing to Von Schleppe for advice and guidance upon many points totally unconnected with the business of the land-stewardship. I have said that Major von Groll was an indolent-minded man; and it is, therefore, intelligible enough that he should have found it extremely agreeable to be saved, as far as possible, the trouble of thinking. But Major von Groll, although indolent-minded, had a conscience. And it was chiefly because his conscience was satisfied that the business of his office could best be performed under Von Schleppe's guidance that the Major allowed himself to indulge his natural indolence in the matter. And, moreover, it must not be supposed that he was at all aware how absolute was the power he thus gave into the hands of his subordinate. The Justizrath always deferred to him, and often referred to him, assuring him constantly that his—the ex-cavalry officer's—opinion on abstruse, technical points of law, or agriculture, or the tenure of houses and land, was invaluable; and, in fact, necessary for the due performance of the land-steward's duties.

To Ferdinand von Groll this appeared to be quite natural and probable, and, the opinions being put into his mouth, he uttered them with undoubting gravity and good faith. And so, as I have said, his conscience was satisfied.

Had the Justizrath's task been to endeavor to show the Major that the latter was profoundly ignorant of all that it most behooved a land-steward to know, and that since he was incapable of duly filling that office, it was his duty to resign it without more ado, then, it is possible, that the hochwohlgeborne gentleman's conscience might have been more difficult to convince and to satisfy. But the poor Major was not a consciously false man. He was simply very stupid.

There was, however, one branch of his duties which the Major knew something about, and in which he took a real interest. This was the preservation and improvement of the noble woods, and of the game that stocked them.

Von Groll was a hearty lover of the chase. He loved to mount his horse in the early morning and ride through the beautiful and far-spreading forests, noting the twinkle of horn and hoof as they flitted across an open glade, gazing with approving eye on some antlered monarch of the herd, or checking his spirited steed to keep pace with one of the Prince's jägers, who, rifle on shoulder, would walk by the Major's side, and answer his numerous questions as to the number of head of game, the advisability of making a clearing here or a plantation there—and so forth.

Often his rides took him past the solitary hunting-lodge that had been the Hemmerichs' home for many a year. And seeing the house shut up, and looking very neglected and desolate under the black shadow of the pine-trees, it was natural that the Major should make inquiries about it.

The first time he came upon the house, which lay high up on the Grotenberg, he was attended by a groom from the marshall in Detmold. The man was a young fellow who had been but a year or two in the Prince's service, and who could say nothing about the house or about its former occupants.

When the Major next saw Von Schleppe he requested to be informed why that substantial stone dwelling in the forest should be untenanted, and apparently allowed to fall into decay. The Justizrath knew all about it;—perhaps somewhat to the secret dissatisfaction of his chief, who would have liked to enjoy, for once, the honor of originating a discovery about his own business.

The house, said the Justizrath, was the dwelling appropriated to the use of the Prince's head-ranger. The late head-ranger had lived there with his family. The present one declined to occupy the lonely hunting-lodge amidst the woods. It was cold and dreary, he said, and he preferred to live at the foot of the mountain in a cottage which he rented at his own expense.

"It doesn't much matter to us, however," said the lawyer in conclusion. "There is the lodge, and if the head-ranger won't live in it, why he has to pay out of his own pocket to live somewhere else. The house might occasionally be used whenever his gracious highness chooses to have a hunting party in the Detmold woods. It would serve to dine in, or to sleep in, on occasion. Meanwhile it costs us nothing, for I don't waste any money in keeping it smart."

The Major, however, was not entirely satisfied. He would have liked to see more importance attached to the first observation he had ever made in a tone of fault-finding. So wary a personage as Puss-in-boots ought to have noted this shade of feeling in his chief. But he did not note it.

Perhaps his great original in the story-book entertained no suspicion that the miller's son, the most noble the Marquis of Carabas, felt at all hurt at the cavalier way in which that sagacious animal assumed the responsibility of his destiny. For my part, I can not help being afraid that "my lord marquis," being a slow-witted, lazy fellow, did in his heart bear poor puss a grudge for his superior cunning, although he had no objection to profit by it.

The Justizrath, it is true, generally flattered his Marquis of Carabas. But one peculiar disadvantage attached to the habitual payment of that kind of tribute is, that it can never be discontinued, or even abated, with safety.

It was not long before Major von Groll found himself again near the old hunting-lodge. This time he was accompanied by an old huntsman, who had been many years in the Prince's service, and who was not only able to answer the Major's questions, but seemed pleased to talk about the deceased head-ranger. The man who now filled that post had not inherited his predecessor's popularity.

"You see he's not rightly fit for the place, according to my notions, gnädiger Herr," said the huntsman, bluntly, to Von Groll. "All he knows about the chase is mainly got out of books. As to handling a rifle himself, I don't believe he would venture to touch one! Now the head-ranger, Hemmerich—rest his soul!—was the best shot in the Principality. I don't know that I should be saying too much if I said that he was as good a shot as any in Germany—Tyrolean marksmen and all. And so was his son, too. An eye like a hawk's, had Otto, and a hand as steady as a rock."

"Ha! The son, eh? and did he know any thing of woodcraft?"

"What, Otto Hemmerich! Ach, gnädiger Herr, I believe that lad could have told you the history of every bird and beast and tree in the forest. He was born and brought up here in the wood-lands. A rare fine boy was Otto Hemmerich."

They were now close to the deserted hunting-lodge, and as Von Groll checked his horse opposite to the doorway, he uttered an exclamation of surprise, and pointed with his riding-whip to an upper window.

"Look there, Albrecht," said he. "Do you see that open shutter?"

"Doubtless, gnädiger Herr—the crazy shutter that hangs by one hinge. It is broken."

"Yes, it is broken now. But it was not broken three days ago; or at least it was closed so that one could not see whether it had one hinge or two. Just look at the fastenings as it swings back. The shutter must have been opened from the inside."

The man stared at Von Groll with a scared expression. "D—do you think so, gnädiger Herr?" he stammered. "Mightn't the wind have blown it open? There's most days a plaguy stiff breeze up here on the Grotenberg."

"IN GOTTES NAMEN, GNÄDIGER HERR, DON'T GO ON!"

"That shutter has not been blown open, Albrecht. Examine the fastenings, and if your eyes are as good as mine, you will see that the bolt has been pushed back, not torn out of its socket."

"Ach, lieber Gott!" muttered the jäger, speaking under his breath, and glancing round uneasily. "Who knows what hand pushed that bolt, or what eyes may be watching us now!"

The Major was sitting very square and upright on his horse, thoughtfully stroking his flaxen mustache with the but-end of his riding-whip. He was revolving something in his mind, and did not glance down at old Albrecht's pale face. At last the Major said aloud, and with much deliberation: "Since the shutter was opened from the inside, somebody must have got into the house to do it. And since the house has been shut and locked, and the keys are at this moment in the land-steward's office in Detmold, that somebody must have got in secretly, and for no lawful purpose. Now the question is, how did he get in? We must look into this, Albrecht."

With that Von Groll dismounted, fastened his horse to a tree, and motioning to the huntsman to follow him, skirted a little piece of garden-ground fenced in from the forest, and proceeded toward the back part of the house.

When the Major had disappeared round the corner of the house, the old man heaved a great sigh, examined the lock of his rifle with a swift, practiced eye, and followed Von Groll, slowly shaking his head meanwhile with the air of a man who thinks he has entered upon a bad business.

The place looked very desolate. The little garden was overgrown with weeds, and its wooden fence, that had kept out the forest creatures, was broken down in many places, showing wide, unsightly gaps. Broad-faced dock leaves flourished with a damp greenness in the garden-paths. The rough stones of which the house was built were moss-grown. Dead leaves, plentifully scattered by the furious winds of winter, lay in dry, dusty heaps every where. All was still and silent as the grave;—silent with that strange, mournful silence that hangs over a place where man has once dwelt, but where he dwells no more. The sense of something lost—of a spirit departed—oppresses us painfully in such places. The very air seems heavy with mysterious whispers of we know not what bodiless voices. And the shadow of the past, of the life that was, and is not, darkens the daylight.

Major Ferdinand von Groll was, however, almost as little liable to such fanciful attainings of his mood to the aspect of his surroundings as the ox to which he has already been irreverently compared in these pages. But he saw that the deserted homestead was dreary, and he felt that it was damp.

He marched on with his swinging cavalry gait, and observed every thing with his long-sighted blue eyes; eyes professionally accustomed to take cognizance of details near at hand, as well as of masses at a distance. At his heels followed Albrecht, rifle in hand, glancing nervously from right to left, but stepping on stoutly, like a brave man who perfectly knows what fear means, but does not intend to yield to it.

All at once there was a whirl of wings, and a great owl, disturbed from its darkness haunt by the unwonted footsteps, flew across their path, almost brushing Von Groll's face as it passed into the depths of a neighboring thicket.

"In Gottes namen, gnädiger Herr," cried the old huntsman, stepping forward, and laying his hand on the Major's arm, "don't go on! Let us get back into the sunlight. This place is eerie, and we shall get no good by prying into it."

Major von Groll turned round and stared at his follower in blank astonishment. "Was zum Henker!" he exclaimed, in a tone of extreme perplexity, "why, I believe, on my word, that you are frightened!"

The huntsman answered with the resolution of one driven to bay.

"Well, gnädiger Herr, there's no use to deny it. Yes, I am frightened. And so would your lordship be, too, if you had heard all that I've heard."

"Why, man," returned the Major, contemptuously, "what is it you are afraid of? Do you think there is a band of robbers hidden inside the hunting-lodge? Or only some desperate poor devil of a poacher with a rusty flint-lock to his gun! If all the Prince's jägers are as stout-hearted as you, it is my opinion that the rogues and vagabonds will have a good time of it in the Detmold woods!"

The old huntsman flushed crimson, and shouldered his rifle resolutely.

"No, gnädiger Herr Major von Groll," said he, "I am not afraid of robbers or poachers or any thing made of flesh and blood like myself. Old Albrecht is no coward, and had served the Prince faithfully, many a long year before your lordship came into these parts. But"—and here the man dropped his voice and came close to Von Groll—"but—I don't like facing creatures that I know nothing of, and that may do me a mischief at any moment if I offend them."

"What the devil are you talking about?" demanded the Major, in utter bewilderment. "I insist upon your explaining what you mean; that is, if you mean any thing! For you seem to me to have lost your wits. Speak!"

Thus adjured, Albrecht narrated in a suppressed voice, and often pausing to glance over his shoulder, how there had been strange rumors afloat during the past few months among the jägers to the effect that the old hunting-lodge in the forest was haunted. Noises had been heard there by those who had had occasion to pass near the place after dusk. One man swore that he had seen a light gleaming through the chinks of the closed shutters; another, that he had seen a mysterious dark figure gliding about among the trees by moonlight. Some said it was the ghost of head-ranger Hemmerich hovering round his old home. But the generally-received opinion was that the Black Huntsman—a legendary personage well known to haunt certain solitary portions of the Detmold woods—had taken to making his unholy rounds in that neighborhood. Nay, for aught Albrecht knew, he might have chosen to take up his abode in the house itself. There was the door locked, and the windows fastened just as they had been left years ago; and yet that shutter had been opened—as the Herr Major himself pointed out—from the inside. Some weird, uncanny fingers must have been at work there—fingers against which mortal weapons availed nothing. And for his own part he (Albrecht) was strongly in favor of getting away from so goblin-haunted a neighborhood as quickly as possible.

The Major listened silently until the man had finished.

"Well, Albrecht," said he, then, "I am sorry to find a right brave huntsman like you giving heed to such old wives' tales. I don't believe in ghosts and goblins. I knew one once that used to haunt our stables when my regiment was quartered in Bohemia. The men were scared out of their wits, until we found out that the ghost came to steal the horses' forage. Then they caught him and gave him a sound drubbing. The stables were never haunted afterward."

"I don't know how it may be in Bohemia," retorted old Albrecht, doggedly, "but about the Black Huntsman—Lord deliver us!—there's no doubt in the world. My grandfather saw him with his own eyes. But as to Bohemia, why I can't speak. Of course, your lordship knows best about Bohemia."

"Well, ghost or no ghost, I mean to find out who it is that haunts this place. If you are afraid I'll give you leave to turn back toward Detmold, and I can make the search alone. But if you stay with me, you must hold your tongue and obey orders."

Albrecht's pride outweighed his superstition. "Where your lordship goes, I suppose I can go too," said he, briefly.

Von Groll wanted no more words, but set about commencing his investigation.

The hunting-lodge was built of stone, as I have said, stout and solid, to resist the great winds that came swooping over the land straight from the Baltic. It stood high up on the Grotenberg, at no great distance from the summit, crowned by the Hermann's Denkmal.

The slope of the hill at this spot was so rapid that the rooms which formed the upper story in the front of the house were not more than three feet from the ground at the back of it; and were, therefore, of course, easily accessible to any one approaching the house from that side.

The Major paused before one of these windows and scrutinized it.

"See," said he to his follower, "those bars which appear to be fixed in the wall can be moved in and out of their sockets." And suiting the action to the word, he removed two out of the four rusty iron bars that crossed the window.

Behind the bars was a diamond-paned lattice, in whose leaden frame-work but a few cracked fragments of glass remained. The hasp that had fastened the lattice inside was broken away. But even had it not been so, nothing would have been easier than to insert one's hand through a broken pane and undo the hasp.

"So!" exclaimed the Major, in a tone of satisfaction; "I don't think it would need a ghost to get in here, eh, Albrecht?"

The huntsman nodded. As he began to discern traces of human agency his courage rose perceptibly. It was true, as he had boasted, that old Albrecht was not afraid of any thing in the shape of flesh and blood.

In another minute the two men had scrambled in at the low window, and were standing on the floor of a room which seemed to have been the kitchen. It had a wide, flagged hearth, capable of holding a goodly pile of logs, that might bid defiance to the cold, even on the Grotenberg.

There was nothing there now but a heap of grayish-white wood ashes, and a broken pipe, scarcely discernible for a thick coating of dust.

Dust and cobwebs were every where. They heard a squeaking of mice and a rush of pattering feet behind the rotten wood-work that skirted the walls.

From this room they passed into the next, and found only the same desolation, dust, and decay. "Nothing here," said the Major. "Let us have a look at the front-room, where the shutter was hanging open."

Here a discovery awaited them.

In one corner of this room was heaped a rude bed of dried leaves and fern. There was no other indication of the place having been occupied; no fragment of food, no rag of clothing—nothing but the bed.

"Good!" grunted the Major. "The gentleman is not at home, it seems. But he has been here, and he will be again, no doubt. Now we will complete our examination of the house."

They did so, but found no further trace of its mysterious occupant. When they had thoroughly satisfied themselves that there was no person concealed within the dwelling, they departed by the same way by which they had come, Von Groll carefully closing the lattice, replacing the iron bars, and effacing, as far as possible, all trace of their having entered.

"Now, look you, Albrecht," said the Major, when they were both fairly outside again, "I forbid you to say one word to any one—to any one, you understand—about this business. I have begun it myself, and I intend to carry it through myself. Some rascally poacher has been making the old house his head-quarters, and I mean to catch him."

What the Major really had in his mind was his coming triumph over the Justizrath, when he should reveal to the latter the discovery he had made unassisted.

Albrecht promised discretion. "If it be a poacher," said he, "talking about it will only put the fellow on his guard. If it be—any thing else, why, least said soonest mended!"

The evening was rapidly closing in when Von Groll mounted his horse again, and, to the huntsman's evident relief, rode out of the gloomy pine grove which overshadowed the deserted lodge.

The way down toward Detmold was steep, and the Major kept his horse at a pace which enabled the old jäger to walk alongside of him. Sometimes, however, owing to the narrowness of the path, Albrecht fell back a few steps. On one of these occasions the Major heard a loud exclamation from his follower, and, looking back, saw him hurrying forward in a wild, scared manner.

"Hulloa!" said Von Groll, in his unmoved way, "what's the matter now?"

"Hush, gnädiger Herr, um Gottes Willen!" said Albrecht, in a hoarse whisper, putting his hand on the Major's bridle-rein. "Let us make haste out of this accursed neighborhood! As true as I am a living man, just as we passed the corpse there, I saw—the face of the Black Huntsman, with his eyes, all blazing and fiery, glaring at us out of the bushes!"

AMO.

WHEN he told me that he loved me,
'Twas the flowery time of May.
I put roses in my ringlets,
And went singing all the day—
When he told me that he loved me,
In the pleasant month of May!

Still, he told me that he loved me
In the summer time of June;
When the roses blushed the redder,
And the birds were all in tune—
And I blushed (because he loved me)
Redder than the rose of June!

Yes! because I knew he loved me,
I went singing with the birds.
All the day I listened to him—
All the night I heard his words.
Dreaming nightly that he loved me,
I was blither than the birds!

But—I didn't know I loved him!
Till I found one summer day,
That, in saying how he loved me,
He had wiled my heart away—
Only saying how he loved me
Through the long bright summer day!

Still, he told me that he loved me,
When the roses fading fell;
And the birds had all forgotten
That sweet tune I've learned too well—
For I love him, and he loves me,
More than any words can tell!

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A READER.—The general principles of treatment of frosted feet would not apply to your case if you have been a sufferer for three years. Your disease must be an exceptional one, and therefore requires special treatment, to be decided upon only after personal examination. Consult a doctor.

C. L. B.—Shirt-bosoms are polished by frequently passing over them an ordinary cold iron.—Pons asinorum means literally asses' bridge, and is the fanciful title given to the 5th proposition in Euclid, because when this is passed even asses or stupid people can proceed with ease in their mathematical course or journey.—Autumn leaves should be pressed under heavy weights till perfectly dry, and afterward carefully arranged in wreaths, bouquets, etc. A thin coating of varnish may be given them.

MRS. BLANK.—Brush the hair briskly with a hard brush until the scalp is reddened and tingles with a warmth, then apply this:

Vinegar of cantharides ½ ounce.
Eau de Cologne 1 ounce.
Rose-water 1 ounce.

Perseverance in this treatment often succeeds in checking the falling of the hair.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—Pillow-covers or hypocrites are perfectly square and an inch or two longer than the pillow. The size of the pillow depends on the width of the bed. The two pillows should extend across the bed with only a small space between. Under-skirts of walking dresses are quite narrow, measuring from three yards and a fourth to three and a half in width, and are frequently worn without crinoline.

NEOPHYTE.—The first Council of the Church was held at Jerusalem, and attended by the apostles, as related in the "Acts." The term "Ecumenical" is derived from a Greek word used by Demetrius, the leader of the multitude and orator at the popular disturbance caused by the preaching of Paul at Ephesus, and means the universal world.

MILLIE.—Information and patterns for over-garments were given in Bazar No. 55. We commend the Camargo to the inexperienced. As you talk of economy, yet want something stylish, we suggest that a velvet pelerine, looped at the back and on the shoulders, gives an air of style to any black wrapping, and is so small that it may be made of almost any old-fashioned velvet garment. You can have your cloak quilted at any of the Broadway sewing-machine houses, in a pattern of inch diamonds, for about five dollars. A quilted over-skirt would look clumsy.—Rachel's surname was Felix.

J. S. W. AND OTHERS.—A large snit of natural hair may be simply arranged by dividing the back hair in two parts, one of which makes a French twist, and the other forms a heavy plait of three strands, or else a rope coil, and surrounds the French twist. Front hair crépé. An inch wide ribbon passes under the chignon, and is tied in a bow among the crépés. A pretty coil may be formed of rope-twist of two strands rolled together, alternating with a heavy plait in successive rows. A plaited coronet surmounts the crépés. A more elaborate style requires the back hair to be tied high and divided in three parts. The tress in the centre makes a broad plait, the outer pieces each form a long puff over topseys. These are lengthwise of the chignon, which has an oblong appearance. A Pompadour cushion in front supports the hair rolled back from the forehead. Braided chignons with a tress of hair around them, to conceal the pins with which they are attached to the head, are worn. Short curls fall on the neck.

E. MAY.—Get a black poplin with heavy reps at $3 a yard, or a gros grain at $4. These materials are handsomely made up in cloaks that constitute the upper garment of suits. Satin is also used, but you will find it but little cheaper than velvet. A silky cashmere is new, and promises to be very popular. Silk ruches and llama fringe are the trimming.

MYRA.—It is a question which has been discussed by moral philosophers, and they differ, whether a man impelled by hunger is justified in stealing bread from his neighbor to save himself from starvation. Grotius, Puffendorf, and others, maintain the affirmative, Cicero and Blackstone hold it to be wrong, while Godwin and Paley have also written on the subject. Solomon, in the Proverbs (vi. 30), seems to consider it not sinful, but requires a return of sevenfold. This, of course, can be done only when the beggar gets the means.

ROMAN.—We can not now call to mind any passage from Scripture forbidding suicide. But we refer you to the best and most thorough work on that subject, viz., "Biathanatos," written by the celebrated Dr. Donne, wherein he attempted to prove "that self-homicide is not so naturally sin that it may never be otherwise." Madame de Staël wrote on the same subject; but she disapproved it, and considered it sin and error.

BIRDIE.—Read answer to J. S. W. Back numbers of the Bazar will suggest presents for gentlemen—such as cigar-cases, necessaires, etc.

MRS. GEORGE.—The blue brocaded over-skirt with black satin train will be very tasteful. Let the sash match the upper skirt. Why not make a low, square-necked corselet or peasant waist of the blue brocade? Trim the black sleeves with a large bow of bias velvet on the wrist and arm-hole. The panier you mention begins near the second side seam. See the fifth figure on the first page of Bazar No. 53. In this case the sash is over paniers. The apron is attached to the belt in front. Colored paniers are also worn sometimes with skirts of contrasting color, such as blue and gold, or garnet and gray.

WESTERN READER.—Make your calicoes sloped sacques, a seam behind and one under each arm. Body and skirt in one. By way of variety, you may cut them off at the knee, and add a flounce to the proper length, which is just to clear the floor. A belt and strings tied at the side confines it at the waist. Coat-sleeve and linen collar. Read directions to J. S. W. about arranging natural hair.

A PATRON.—You will find an illustration of the Watteau morning-dress on the first page of Bazar No. 53. Get black serge for your suit, the handsome all-wool goods sold at $2 50 a yard, and trim with the new bullion fringe used for mourning. The strands of this fringe are nearly as thick as your little finger. Make two skirts, the upper one draped by large pleats at the side. A short basquine with pelerine cape.

JULIA.—The policeman was wrong. He had no right to lay hands on your husband except for the purpose of an arrest, which must be done upon warrant, or for a wrong committed within view of the officer. Any citizen becomes a civil officer to arrest for a crime which he actually sees committed. If no serious injury happened to your husband by the outrage you complain of, we advise you to lay the matter before the Police Board, who are the proper authorities in such cases.

WINONA.—We regret that we can not promise the pattern you desire. It is impossible to give patterns in answer to special requests; but it will be found on examining a file of the Bazar that we have already given patterns of nearly every article of dress that is likely to be generally used.

MRS. H.—The only advice which we can give translators is this: Make a judicious selection, assure yourself that the work you propose to undertake has not been already translated; let your translation be faithful and elegant; and inspire some publisher with your own confidence that its publication will be a profitable investment. Above all, do not attempt to improve on your author, in your own opinion, by attributing to him words which he never uttered. Such a proceeding is absolute dishonesty.

FROM A LONG-ESTABLISHED AND WELL-KNOWN HOUSE.—"We have sold BURNETT'S EXTRACTS (for cooking purposes) for several years, and believe them equal to any we have had hitherto, and find them gradually growing in the public favor." ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, Grocers, NEW YORK, September 8, 1868.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS.—The imitative art can no further go than in these beautiful imitations of fine paintings. None but a connoisseur could pronounce them other than the productions of the brush. . . . To those who can not afford to purchase paintings, here is a chance to ornament their rooms at a very reasonable rate.—Godey's Lady's Book.

PROGRESS.—COLUMBUS sailed to the American coast in a four-hundred-ton ship, and first landed upon the Island of St. Domingo. Last week a vessel from St. Domingo unloaded in New York over four hundred tons of St. Croix Rum for P. H. DRAKE & Co., of that city. This is but a few weeks' supply of this article, which these gentlemen use in the manufacture of the celebrated PLANTATION BITTERS. We are informed by an exchange that Messrs. DRAKE & Co. have not advertised a dollar for a year, but that the sales of this article continue at the former enormous figure. In 1864 the receipts of the PLANTATION BITTERS were equal to those of the New York and New Haven Railroad.—Tribune.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the custom-house stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

N. B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the express charges) by sending directly to the

"GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

FACETIÆ.

A GENTLEMAN was trout-fishing on the sides of "Old Saddleback," a mountain in the interior of Maine, a hundred miles from the coast. Supposing himself ten miles from a village, and half as far from a house, he was surprised by hearing the blows of an axe. Soon he came to a small clearing, where the proprietor of the axe surveyed him with some curiosity. "Hallo, stranger!" said he. "How are you, Sir?" "Well, now, stranger, where be you from?" "I'm from New York." "From New York! Why, I should think you would hate to live so fur off."

A MATTER OF COURSE.—The ex-Queen of Spain fled from San Sebastian in the railway train; and not, as has been suggested by a correspondent, in a "Spanish fly!"

PHYSIOLOGICAL CHANGE.—A Professor was explaining, in a young ladies' school in France, the theory according to which the body is entirely renewed every six years. "Thus, Mademoiselle F.," said he, addressing a pretty blonde with a wide-awake face, "in six years you will be no longer Mademoiselle F." "I hope so," replied the unsophisticated, casting down her eyes.

Why is a married man like a tallow-candle?—Because he often goes out at night when he ought not to.

A STREAM OF MUSIC.—A little boy, on coming home from church, where he had seen a person performing on an organ, said to his mother, "Oh, mammy, I wish you had been at church to-day to see the fun! A man was pumping music out of an old cupboard!"

Why is a rhinoceros like one of the Indians of the Six Nation tribes?—Because he's a tusky-roarer (Tuscarora).

A Frenchman recently visiting New York was afflicted with a bad cold, and not being very good at English referred to his dictionary. Seeing that cough was English for his complaint, and that plough was pronounced plow, he supposed they were alike. Finding that box and chest were the same, he applied to the doctor: "Doctor, I haf vun cow on my pox, and I vant one chest of pills for to cure him!" We left just then.

FIRST EDITOR (in railroad car). "How's your Circulation?"
SECOND DITTO. "Oh! capital. How's yours?"
FIRST DITTO. "Well, not so good as it might be. The fact is, I want some good Fresh Blood; and I mean to have it, too. There's plenty to be got. Good-by!"
[Lady of full habit changes her seat.]

A Universalist once conversing with a divine, asked him how old he was. The doctor told him his age; and the Universalist replying that he was much older—was in the garden when Adam and Eve were, etc. "Yes," said the doctor, "I knew that there was a third person there, but I never knew it was you."

IMPORTANT TO AERONAUTS.—Who says that man will never have the power to fly? A scientific friend of ours has so far solved the problem as to be able with the greatest ease to "skim over"—a newspaper.

Wasps manufacture comb, but have never come into notice for their honey. Yet a man thinks he has only to make verses to be a poet.

LOW PEOPLE—Dwarfs.

A man of spirit can always keep his head out of water; but a coward in difficulties sinks in spirits and water.

"The divinity that hedges a king" must have great confidence to back any one to win in the Bourbon Race.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?—William Tell would never have come down to posterity without it.

Birds in their little nests agree that they do not reciprocate when they hear man "woulding he were a bird." They lay six eggs to one man would not know how to fly if he had wings.

HOW TO PREVENT A CONSPIRACY FROM LEAKING OUT.—Let the plot thicken.

boots the other day, observed a neighbor poring wisely over a newspaper, whereupon he addressed him thus: "Julius, what de debil you lookin' at dat paper fur? You can't read?" "Go 'way, fellah!" replied the other, indignantly. "Guess I can read. I see big 'nuff fur dat." "Big 'nuff!" retorted the first one, scornfully. "Dat ain't nuffin. A cow's big 'nuff to catch a mice, but she can't do it."

HOW TO TREAT A WIFE—Treat her to a new dress.

A very little boy, after giving every body a good-night kiss, kneeled at his mother's side to say his evening prayer. His mother had that day been teaching him the piece commencing "You'd scarce expect one of my age," etc., and it appears that these verses were running in his mind. He commenced the prayer as follows: "Now I lay me down to sleep, I pray the Lord my soul to keep; if I should chance to fall below Demostheues or Cicero, don't view me with a cricket's eye—" "Stop, stop!" said his mother; "that isn't a part of the prayer." "Yes, it is," the little fellow replied; "yes, it is, mamma; don't view me with a cricket's eye."

A friend of ours has two boys, aged respectively six and eight years. The youngest was partaking pretty largely of the good things of this life at the dinner-table, immediately on their return from Sabbath-school. The elder, after eying his brother for some time, said: "Charlie, if you were to eat much more, and it should kill you, you would weigh so much that the angels could not carry you to heaven."

Little six years old hesitated for a moment, and then, looking up, replied: "Well, if they couldn't do it alone, God would send Samson down to help them."

When is a candle likely to be enraged?—You say when it is put out. I should say rather when it's lighted.

A talented young African, of the boot-black persuasion, while dancing like St. Vitus over a customer's boots the other day, observed a neighbor poring wisely over a newspaper, whereupon he addressed him thus: "Julius, what de debil you lookin' at dat paper fur? You can't read?" "Go 'way, fellah!" replied the other, indignantly. "Guess I can read. I see big 'nuff fur dat." "Big 'nuff!" retorted the first one, scornfully. "Dat ain't nuffin. A cow's big 'nuff to catch a mice, but she can't do it."

HOW TO TREAT A WIFE—Treat her to a new dress.

GETTING WET.

ACCORDING to the Report of the Board of Commissioners of the Central Park, 132 days of the year 1867 were rainy. In spite, however, of this unusual prevalence of wet weather, there was, we are rejoiced to learn, an exceedingly large number of visitors to our famous New York resort. No less than 7,228,855 people visited the Park in the course of last year. Of these two-thirds were on foot, one-fourth in vehicles of some sort, and the rest on horseback.

This shows that we all are not such brown-paper folks as some affect to think, and that the fear of a wetting can not deter us from filling our lungs with the pure air of heaven when we can get it.

There are many yet, however, unnecessarily shy of a shower. This arises partly from the idea that a wetting is dangerous to health, but more from the flimsy and superfine dresses so generally worn in America. It is a vulgar error to suppose that any quantity of moisture applied to the body is necessarily hurtful. The human frame can endure the utmost soaking in water, short of drowning, provided the animal temperature is kept at its usual height. Thus we can expose ourselves with safety to a whole day of pouring showers, and be saturated with rain to the skin, if, in the mean time, we retain our natural warmth, either by brisk exercise, cheerful excitement of mind, or any other means. The only danger is from the chill which is apt to ensue when the body is in repose or free from excitement. This is to be prevented by the obvious means of changing the wet garments for dry, or sustaining the warmth of the body by continued movement. It is of great importance for all, and especially those who are much exposed to the weather, to wear woolen next to the skin, for this can absorb much moisture and not lose its power, which it possesses as a non-conductor, of retaining the animal heat. A great many more persons suffer from the want of that exercise of which they deprive themselves in order to avoid a wetting than are injured by exposure to the severest weather.

People, however, are not so careful of their health as of their clothes. It is their regard for these which keeps our dames and damsels so much out of doors in fine weather, and in doors in foul. They "consider the wind and look to the clouds" not to avoid the risks to their delicate frames, but to their superfine drapery. It is the spot on a ribbon, or the drooping of a feather, that they fear, and not any derangement of their health. Our women have the habit of dressing on all occasions so finely that they can not take the risk of the least uncertainty of weather, and are thus kept imprisoned in their houses the greater part of the year, manacled with kid and fettered with lace.

We are not disposed to quarrel with our dames for having fine dresses, if they or their husbands can afford to pay for them, but we insist upon their having clothes suitable for use, as well as show, and not being ashamed to wear them on occasion. The Duke of Wellington was said to have had a sufficient number and range of overcoats for almost each degree of the thermometer. Out of the numberless dresses of a fashionable woman's wardrobe there should be at least one set apart for a rainy day. Queen Victoria has given a good example, and by the introduction of the Balmoral petticoat and Balmoral boot has shown that the highest dame in her dominion has the good sense not to be too fashionable to curtail her skirts, clothe herself in woolen, and tramp in double soles.

THE FALL OF THE LEAF.

By C. D. GARDETTE.

THE northwest wind sweeps over the plain:

The air, like a draught of potent wine,
Flushes my cheek and stirs my brain
And quickens the pulse of this heart of mine,
As I listlessly stand on a hill-top tall
And watch the brown leaves as they quiver and fall.

Towering chestnut and stalwart oak,
Slender maple and supple ash,
Are bowed alike by the wind's keen stroke,
And their crisp leaves torn by its viewless lash—
Torn from the grasp of the parent bough;
Supple or strong avails not now!

Shivering, quivering, whirling round,
In the mad career of an elfin dance,
These waifs of the autumn touch the ground
To be caught again by the wind's wild chance,
And still again to be whipped and whirled
Till a summer rest comes back to the world.

So, as I stand on the hill-top tall,
Drinking the wine of the autumn air,
And watching the sere leaves quiver and fall,
It seems that this life is foreshadowed there—
That a lesson of truth, nor bald nor brief,
May be read, perchance, in the Fall of the Leaf.

For what are we but waifs like these,
Fluttering forth in a springtide clear,
Planting our bloom in a summer breeze,
In an autumn hour-frost, crisp and sere,
Swept by a death wind far and fast,
Till we rest in the "Summer Land" at last.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 28, 1868.

MANAGING MOTHERS.

THOSE prudent matrons who show a very natural anxiety and do their utmost to get their daughters married, are too often scorned under the contemptuous appellation of managing mothers. It is unquestionably a very desirable thing that a girl, on reaching the nubile age, should be paired with a suitable male partner for life; and a mother with her matrimonial experience would seem the proper person to make the selection.

If marriage were, as some rare sentimentalists pretend, an affair of love to which nubile youth are led by an instinct of mutual liking, we should protest against any interference with so charming and natural a process. The young single women and men too of our day are not such artless creatures as to trust themselves to an instinctive love which might perchance guide them to the arms of a coachman or a chambermaid. They are too worldly-minded to run any such risks, and in looking out for matrimonial partners never fail to calculate the chances of a prosperous establishment for life. As we can not have love, let us have prudence, and who so fit to exercise it as the experienced matron? She is able to distinguish between the tinsel and the genuine metal. Where the young daughter fancies wealth in expense, the mother recognizes its real existence in thrift. Where the former finds intelligence, the latter detects perverseness. Where the damsel sees beauty and grace, the matron discovers effeminacy and feebleness. The daughter and the mother are seeking the same object—a rich, passably intelligent, wholesome, and good-looking man, as a proper husband for the one, and a respectable son-in-law for the other. Love being out of the question, and the whole affair reduced to a problem of probabilities, we insist that the experienced mother is more likely to solve it than the inexperienced daughter. No woman who has not that knowledge of man acquired by matrimony has any knowledge of him at all. If, then, nature be rejected as a guide to the coupling of the sexes, let us avail ourselves of the most perfected art. And this, we can not doubt, as far as marriage is concerned, is to be found not in the single but the married woman. The ill-assorted matches which so often outrage nature and all conventional propriety are generally those which the parents have had nothing to do with or protested against. A young maiden's judgment is of little value in a matrimonial calculation. She is apt to choose her partner for life as she does her gown, for its showy and surface qualities. Her mother, on the contrary, is more likely to investigate their capabilities as to utility of service, length of wear, and permanence of complexion. Nature would probably be the best match-maker; but as her services are rejected, we should prefer to rely upon the parents rather than the children. So far, then, from treating with contempt those who are busying themselves with trying to get husbands for their daughters, we should, for the sake of coming generations, bid God-speed to all such "managing mothers."

MODERN WOMEN AND THEIR BROTHERS.

THE subject of the Girl of the Period being pretty well exhausted by this time, there is room for some inquiry about the habits of her brother, this young gentleman having been shamefully neglected. The heaviest charge brought against the lady in question has been the money she costs; her Grecian bend, panier, chignon, and shadowy bonnet being only accessories to fill up the picture. Now we are ready to admit that her furbelows are expensive luxuries. No doubt she tugs hard at her father's purse-strings. But what is Adolphus, the prospective head of the family, doing all the while? As figures are supposed, like the Father of our Country, never to lie, they may answer the question.

Adolphus, we will say, is a pearl of the best society, not given to excesses, and being simply a good fellow among his comrades. Of course he smokes, plays billiards, and scorns teetotalism. With cigars at a quarter of a dollar each, a dozen a day for himself and friends is a moderate allowance—total three dollars a day. With billiards at fifty cents a game, and the accompanying liquors, he would not be likely to spend less than five dollars every time he indulged in this pre-eminently healthful exercise; and the "drinks," which cement modern friendship, at every chance meeting, will fill up the remainder of the ten dollars per diem expended in these innocent pleasures. Dress, dinners, fast horses, and amusements, will certainly double this sum, and supply any blanks in the first calculation, making an expenditure of over seven thousand dollars a year for our fashionable youth—an estimate by no means overdrawn. If, in addition, Adolphus is addicted to betting, gambling, and kindred vices, there is no limit to his prodigality, any more than to the diamonds, laces, or camel's-hair shawls which are needed to eke out the meagre thousand a year wherewith his sister can barely clothe herself.

There is another class of modern women who might find comfort in comparing the cost of their wardrobe with that of their brothers; we mean those who are content to dress plainly and respectably. A gentleman of this class can not buy a complete dress suit for less than two hundred dollars. A black silk walking suit, made at home or by a reasonable dress-maker, together with bonnet, gaiters, and all toilette accessories, can be had for half that sum. Neither of these estimates includes winter wrappings; but the overcoat will be generally found to cost more than the cloak. Take into consideration, moreover, the fact that a large proportion of men spend from a dollar a day upward in tobacco, cigars, liquors, billiards, and other strictly masculine extravagances, and women's expenditure for their personal wants will be sadly dwarfed by the comparison. The difference between tweedledum and tweedledee is not so great after all.

"WHY SHOULD WE NOT VOTE?"

OUR serio-comic illustration presents sundry arguments on this question, which are evidently in favor of the ladies. The women of England seem to be asking it to good purpose, since a thousand or more, it is believed, will cast their votes at the coming election; and these are by no means irresponsible persons, but the highest ladies in the land, the Queen herself being a convert to the doctrine. It is said that courts of appeals will decide against them; but a suffrage once conferred is not easily taken away again, and the English women who have once voted will not readily relinquish the privilege. In this country, where suffrage is not regarded as a corollary of education, intelligence, or property, but as an inherent right, belonging to every person who is governed by the laws, and necessary for his protection—in this country, which is above all as just as it is gallant, who believes that it will be much longer withheld from women?

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of the Fountain of Youth.

MY DEAR ALONZO,—I like to drop in at my sister Smith's at "the children's hour," as Longfellow calls it—the hour before bedtime, when the children are playing their games, and are always willing that I should take a hand. They are the Smith grandchildren, but what then? I used to play with their parents in the same way, and our parents long ago used to play with us. Sometimes I tell the children that the game I teach them was taught to me by my grandfather or grand-uncle long and long ago, when I was a little red-cheeked, curly-haired child as they are, and they look at me with soft eyes of doubt and wonder, as if there were no fairy tale so strange as that old Uncle Bachelor were ever a boy. Put old Uncle Bachelor asks himself when he ceased to be one, and by what signs he knows that he is one no more? One thing, at least, is clear—that there is nothing so delusive as a bald head and gray hairs. Many of the youngest and blithest boys I know lost all their hair long ago, and white and gray-haired boys in plenty are my familiar companions.

Indeed, I smile now when I reflect how wise I was at twenty-three. I shall never be such a Solomon again; and I think the chief experience of my life since then has been the gradual discovery that we are all boys and girls together, whatever our age or the thickness of our thatch. There is my grand-nephew Augustus, who is just at the age when he is sure that there is no sorrow more poignant than an ill-fitting coat, or a cravat not in the mode. He is more solemn over his waistcoats than I am over Doctor Bump's sermons; and I am very sure that he gives much more thought to his tailor than I do to the good preacher, who, I hope, has his revenges in some other way—say by adding a thirteenthly and a fourteenthly to his lastly. But I am a mere child by the side of Augustus. I can see that he tolerates me, as it were—that he has a pitying air and tone when he explains to me some slang of the moment which I do not understand; and I have overheard him saying to some of his contemporaries, not less wise and experienced than himself, that, "Uncle Bachelor is a well-meaning old fellow, but he is a mere child."

Yet I remember very well, and not so very long ago, when the youngest looked at me as if I had come out of the ark, and he evidently thought that I began life at about the age of sixty. He used to put his little warm hand in mine and trust me as we trust the laws of nature. He turned to me to answer every question and solve every difficulty, from an eclipse of the moon to the water that dripped from the cover of the dish of hot potatoes. I must mend all the toys; I must explain all the tricks; I must invent fresh stories nightly; I must be the constant, visible Providence. And suddenly my scholar, my neophyte, my boy, has become a man; at twenty-three he is an octogenarian, and his Mentor is a mere amiable old fizzle. Old, my dear Augustus; but what is age? Wrinkles and white hair may batter this tenement of ours as they will, but they can not bring age to the fresh warm heart within, any more than the chill winds and the snow blowing and drifting around the house can make winter inside, where the great fires are blazing and the happy circle sits in the cheerful light.

Why, I have not forgotten to this day how incredulous, how amazed I was when I was first saluted as Sir. It was upon the street, as I was hurrying along to dancing-school or some such pleasant place, and a poor little voice piped feebly as I passed, "Please give me a penny to buy some bread!" And when I stopped, confounded to think that every body had not bread who wanted it, I said to the shivering child, "Are you hungry?" She simply answered, "Yes, Sir," as if I had been my father or any other man, and I felt so proud that I gave the girl all the money in my pocket, which was very little indeed. It is astonishing how old I felt. The sheer force of habit upon the part of the beggar-girl had all the effect of the most exquisite flattery; and I remember that my manners that afternoon to my partner, Melissa Marigold, aged eleven, were of so lofty and patronizing a character that she was evidently very glad to be rid of such an old gentleman for a partner, and to scamper away to romp with those who were still boys.

The next time the salutation was used it was not so inspiring, and I very soon began to perceive that I had ceased to seem to be a boy to those who spoke to me. But the mystery was that I felt as boyish as ever, and somehow I do so to this day. I know that the bloom and the round form and the spring in the step are gone; that in appearance and movement I am not a boy, and yet there is some horrible enchantment about it. I stop in the play-ground and toss the ball, and I am instantly aware that I have disturbed the circle. The boys say, "Thank you, Sir." I am an alien. My presence constrains them. They expect me to move on, and their expectation carries me forward as if it were a policeman. Yet I am not really older than the boys in feeling, perhaps in nothing but years. I have more experience, certainly. I have seen more persons and more events than they, but what then? Why should they grow silent and abashed? I want to cry to them, like a captive from his prison, "Here I am! the same old boy, shut up by some absurd magic in this elderly form. But don't let it deceive you. The magician may make me seem what he will. He may strip my head, and pinch my cheeks, and all the rest of it, but he can not touch me, the boy, who am what I always was, and whose heart leaps and bounds with yours as it always did."

I have been old, indeed, as I have already suggested. We are all of us oldest about twenty. At that age we have not discovered that we do not know a great deal; and as we gradually make that valuable discovery we become milder and gentler, and so pass on into a truly beautiful youth. Some years ago when I was in Germany I saw Karl Ritter, the great geographer. What a bland, sweet, modest, young old man! He had the immortal youth of modesty. In his special study he knew probably more than any other man; but that very knowledge revealed to him more than to any other man the vast extent of what he did not know in that direction. Or there was my old Quaker friend, the country neighbor of Mrs. Margery Honeysuckle—it seems to me that she was one of the truly young people, although it was plain that she had passed the threescore. Her house was not upholstered by that eminent artist, Marcotte; but it was so spacious, so neat, so utterly comfortable in its delightful simplicity, and it was always so well-ordered, the household wheels ran so silently and smoothly, that I think of it as the House Beautiful, and friend Sarah as the interpreter.

The first time that I went there was in the early spring; indeed, spring seems too pleasant and warm a word to describe that bleak season when the snow-patches still linger upon the dull, brown, sullen-looking ground; and the trees are stiff and leafless; and there is mud by day in the roads, and a chill, penetrating air. We turned in at the wide open gate and stopped at the horse-block with its little rail, and there we stepped out of the easy wagon and were close to the low, white porch. The old door opened, and the sweet face of friend Sarah welcomed me. It was the placid Quaker face, certainly, but not of the formal, regulation, sectarian placidity. It was a sweetness of soul that shone through. You know there is a great variety of sweetness: that of sugar, for instance, and that of fresh roses. It was not sugar that I thought of as I saw that welcoming face. And you may imagine what kind of a fire there was for a chilled traveler—whether it blazed generously, not with the thin crackle of fresh wood, but with a beaming core of heat; and whether there were a comfortable chair into which he naturally sank; and whether a universal tidiness, and even richness, or, I might perhaps say, a luxury of simplicity surrounded him.

But when I was taken to my room—well, it was going from glory to glory. There were spotless dimity curtains dropped over the windows, and with an ample fullness of fold. There were hangings of the same upon the spacious and lofty four-post bedstead. And it was rounded up so finely that I fancied possibly a feather-bed, but I found only the most pliable and delightful mattress. There were easy-chairs and lounges, and abundant furniture of every kind, and a bright fire sparkling and flaming in the fire-place; and there were quaint engravings upon the wall—a figure of George Fox, I remember, and the old meeting-house in Flushing; and there were a few books upon the table near the fire, by which the easiest chair was placed. I took up one; it was John Woolman's Journal.

By-and-by it was tea-time; and the eye and mind—yes, and the heart—of that traveler, ranging from the snowy damask to the beautiful glass and china, and to what they held—the clover honey, the sliced tongue, the jellied fruits, the milk-white, spongy bread—could not but recall the lines—it was not summer by the almanac, what then?

"In summer when the days were long,
On dainty chicken, snow-white bread,
We feasted, with no grace but song;
We plucked wild strawberries, ripe and red,
In summer when the days were long."

Why do I prolong these details? Only because what I describe were the outward signs of the youth of dear old friend Sarah. They merely continued the welcome that she gave, and diffused it throughout the house. When we sat late in the evening by that glowing fire, and read out of noble books, or looked into the flames and talked, she revealed all that unworn faith, that sensitive sympathy, that genial kindness, and true modesty of soul which are the elements of youth. If those who have them are not young, who are? To be made as a little child, or, in the ecclesiastical phrase, to be born again—that is, to be a child once more—what is all this but to have that soul of youth which shone in friend Sarah's face and in her dwelling, which made her character such a steady and lofty influence, and which makes us all now speak of her with living affection?

She had not sailed with Ponce de Leon, but she had found the fountain. And when I sit with the children at their hour, and play the merry games over which they laugh and chatter, I see in them what I remember in her; and as they grow a little tired of the play, and the Sandman begins his rounds, and they climb into my lap and cluster around my chair, and beg me to tell them a story, I tell them of a dear old friend, yet as young as they are, who made every body happy while she lived, and who makes every body happy who remembers her. And when they exclaim, "But, dear Uncle Bachelor, how can a little girl like us have children of her own to take care of, and a house to make comfortable?" I can only reply, "She had more years than you, but she was not older."

They look puzzled and drowsy at that. But little Bonni shakes back her curls and defies the Sandman, and says, as he waves his wand triumphantly over her again: "I suppose we shall all understand when we are older; sha'n't we, uncle?" Your young friend (I hope),

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

CHILDREN'S CLOAKS.

CHILDREN'S cloaks, like those described for adults, are the outer garments of suits, and are, therefore, shaped pelisses, with capes for full dress occasions, and loose paletots, or round mantles, for school and ordinary purposes. They are very simply trimmed, and are about two-thirds the length of the wearer. The dress skirt should be short enough to disclose two or three inches of the white stocking above the high Polish boot, and the cloak shows the six-inch flounce or border of the dress.

WHITE CLOTH.

White cloth is the favorite material for dress cloaks, not only for very small children, but for girls from ten to twelve years old. It is quick to show soil, but, if all wool, can be beautifully cleaned at the dyer's. White chinchilla, and a ribbed velvet cloth with scarlet or blue on the reverse side, is used for large girls; white lamb's-wool, the soft and silky pheasant's cloth, and the spotted ermine for smaller children. The pretty basket cloths are $6 a yard, and the other cloths mentioned range from this price to $16; but as they are a yard and a half wide only a small quantity is necessary for a cloak, the length of the paletot being sufficient for children under six years.

The cloth, cut in deeply indented scallops, and bound with satin or velvet of a gay color, is the prettiest trimming for white cloaks. An inch binding of bias velvet or plush is in vogue, or the wide military braid substantially sewed on with narrow soutache above it. Quillings and ruffles of satin or silk are dressy but perishable, and passementerie and the light fringes are decidedly too frail for children's use.

PLUSH AND VELVET.

Plush and velvet are made into short half-fitting jackets, or loose paletots thinly wadded, and confined by a sash of wide ribbon tied behind, or at the side near the front. The only trimming is the large, richly-cut pearl buttons with which they are fastened. The pocket flaps have buttons at each end. Blue, gray, and scarlet plush half a yard wide is sold for $4 a yard. The light German velvet in the three-quarter width, at $10, is bought for handsome sacques.

COLORED CLOTH.

Plainer and more useful garments are made of the soft, durable chinchilla—a thick cloth with short knotty pile. These rough surfaced cloths are prettier for children than the smooth beavers. A gray chinchilla with blue or scarlet bindings, or with revers of color, is tasteful and warm. The bright garnets and blue cloths have stitched bands of satin of the same shade for trimming, or a border of Astrakhan cloth or plush. A golden brown shade and a cinnamon-colored cloth are pretty, and do not fade or get dingy as soon as the high colors.

THE HIGHLAND CLOAK.

The prettiest school wrapping is the Highland cloak of the scarlet and black Rob Roy check, or the gay Stuart plaid, made into a belted pelisse long enough to conceal the dress, buttoned down the entire front, and a large cape caught up in the back with rosettes. Triple capes, or several in the Carrick style, becoming gradually shorter until the last is a mere collar, are new and admired. The capes are separate from the pelisse, and serve when less wrapping is required, while exercising at play or to throw on hastily in hurried school-girl fashion. If a single large cape is used it should be lined with red flannel, as are the sleeves and waist of the pelisse. The sleeve is slightly full in the sabot shape with a ruffle over the waist gathered into an India rubber band; through which the hand is passed. The trimming is a binding of braid or silk.

WATER-PROOF WRAPS.

Exposure to all kinds of weather makes a water-proof cloak a necessity for the school-girl. The best shape is a sleeved circular or sacque as long or longer than the dress, buttoned all the way down the front with rubber buttons, and instead of a cape a round hood to be drawn up over the head. Capes are added for warmth when under-wraps are not used. A pretty trimming is made of inch bands of scarlet cloth notched and sewed inside the edge of the cape with scarcely more than the pinked notches showing outside. Several rows of scarlet or yellow machine stitching also enliven these garments. The large substantial India rubber buttons with holes, not shanks, are the best. We have spoken before of the great improvement in water-proof cloths, both in the material and color. The hard usage given to this material suggests the propriety of buying the durable all-wool article at $1 75 a yard rather than the cotton mixture sold at $1. The Cheviot gray, brown, and black water-proof make serviceable school dresses. The skirts are scalloped and bound with alpaca braid, blue or scarlet, with three rows of the braid sewed on double, following the outlines of the scallop.

FRENCH GARMENTS FOR CHILDREN.

We must not omit to mention the walking dresses for children of three or four years. They are made of merino or cashmere lined with opera flannel. The waist is shirred behind with drawing-strings, the skirt pleated, coat-sleeves, and a large over-cape. One suit, rather more extravagant than we like to quote, is imported from Paris, and consists of a full costume of white corded silk for a four-year-old girl. The low-necked dress has a gored skirt lined with crinoline. A tunic is defined by three rows of white satin piping. A bertha of piping and fringe. The street coat to be worn over this is a gored pelisse, also of gros grain, lined with white silk, wadded, and beautifully quilted. A round cape, looped in the back. With a hat to match, the price is $140. Another glimpse of French extravagance is an infant's long robe made of white cashmere, beautifully braided, and edged with white satin quillings. The novelty consists in the material and in a tiny bertha and sash with loops. The long cloak of the same is made with a yoke and sleeves. The long skirt is pleated to the yoke. A large cape is added, and the whole garment is lined with soft white silk and quilted. The price is $150.

Sashes of clan tartan are greatly worn by children. They have fringed ends, and look especially well with white and black dresses. Aprons of bright plaid are also introduced.

READY-MADE CLOAKS.

Children's cloaks shown at the furnishing houses are beautifully made, and have an air of style that inexperienced fingers can not give; but they are very expensive. A pelisse with pelerine cape, for a girl of ten, is of white and scarlet reversible cloth. The waist simulates a short jacket with scallops bound with scarlet satin. The skirt is looped at the side by sashes from the waist. The cape falls to the elbow, is also scalloped, and a row of standing scallops is around the neck. $40 is asked for such a cloak.

For a girl of twelve is a brown plush sacque, with pointed hood with long tassels. It is lined with silk and wadded, and the only trimming is points of satin at the wrist and neck, yet this is also $40. A lamb's-wool sacque for a child of four years is $10. It is prettily trimmed with an inch-wide band of scarlet cloth notched at the edges and stitched on. A small paletot of blue plush is $24. A gray chinchilla lined with blue flannel and bound with blue plush is $16. Tan-colored cloth is trimmed with darker brown, and black with scarlet in different sizes and shapes, at prices ranging from $10 to $16.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

The latest extravagance in petticoats is thick satin, dark brown or black, embroidered to the knee with chenille in gay colors, representing humming-birds of life-size, grasshoppers, green-and-gold beetles, and the ever-changing chameleon. The price is $50. A peacock skirt at $100 has a muff and sash embroidered to match. An eccentric pattern at the same price is bordered with huge mastiff heads. Scotch velvet in the fashionable blue and green plaid, and satin striped with velvet, is sold for skirts at $4 a yard.

The flat sailor hat of black velvet is stylishly worn with Scotch plaid and serge suits. It is simple and inexpensive, as the only trimming is an inch band of black ribbed ribbon with short ends behind stamped with a silver anchor. Wider ribbon, either navy-blue or plaid, is also used, but should be merely crossed or knotted at the back. Bows and rosettes destroy the symmetry of this hat. The yachting hat of black glazed cloth in this shape is water-proof, and convenient for rainy days.

The veil of blue grenadine may be wound around the crown for trimming in a way that does not mar the well-defined outlines of the hats of the season, but this requires taste and skill. A square grenadine veil thrown over the hat has at each corner a tassel with a leaded acorn head, the weight of which holds the veil in position.

A pretty sleeve, known abroad as the Sabot, is slightly full, cut bias, and gathered into a band above the wrist, from whence a frill of the material, or of lace, falls over the hand.

New kid gloves of the Alexandrie make are ornamented with a row of gilt or silver studs around the scalloped wristband. A movable chain for fastening gloves may be easily attached to any glove, making it fit neatly about the wrist. The chain is silvered and sold at fifty cents a pair.

Dress trimmings exhibit the caprice of the wearer. One extreme succeeds the other, and the toilette of to-day is a reaction on that of yesterday. An elaborate garniture is followed by severe but tasteful simplicity. Pleated flounces, lace, ruffles of silk, bows, and rosettes are lavished upon one costume, while that with which it is alternated is simply scalloped and bound, or edged with wide satin braid and bullion fringe of strands almost as thick as a lady's finger. Heavy poplins and serges are stylishly made, with the long upper-skirt bound with satin and looped by rosettes at the side, and the under-skirt trimmed with a pleated flounce, merely hemmed top and bottom without binding. The pleats are broad, all run the same way, and are tacked to the skirt at both edges. The close, high corsage has a polka basque just covering the hips, and a small cape looped with rosettes, or pointed to simulate a hood.

Cashmere costumes are rapidly growing into favor. They are stylish and inexpensive, and the light, soft fabric is close and warm and wears well. Black, bottle-green, and steel-gray are the colors most in demand, worn with blue or scarlet petticoats. All-wool serge of fine quality, soft and full to the touch, a very different article from the common mixed serge, is $2 50 a yard, and measures a yard in width. The fancy for twilled goods is bringing the long-disused merinoes into fashion again.

A novel and picturesque costume for breakfast has a petticoat of blue cashmere trimmed with a pleated flounce, and a short over-dress of gray cashmere made with a yoke into which the body and skirt is pleated. A blue cord and tassel confines the loose garment at the waist. The body hangs carelessly over the cord in the Garibaldi style. The skirt is looped at the sides. A ruche of blue silk trims the yoke and Marie Antoinette sleeve.

Among new importations of Russian leather goods is a useful and pretty sewing-apron, to preserve the dress when using a sewing-machine. It is admirably shaped like a gored apron, has a bib and pockets, and is pinked at the edges and stitched with white silk. It is in the pale leather, russet color, black and blue. It is a novelty, and therefore expensive, costing $15.

Chambray gauze of tinsel combined with a color, gilt with green, and silver with blue, forming chameleon effects, is shown for evening dresses, to be worn over silk. It is three-fourths of a yard wide, costing from $2 to $2 75 a yard. It is prettily arranged in the Watteau drapery, falling in loose folds from the low corsage, and caught up in a panier puff. A soiled light silk of last season may be freshened in this way.

Bows or jabots of Valenciennes lace and muslin, with knots of ribbon between, are worn at the throat with narrow standing collar. Many of the jabots are made almost round, and may be used as breakfast caps by married ladies.

Foulard neck-ties of bright blue or scarlet, arranged in the sailor's knot, are worn with the linen yacht collars in vogue for young ladies. Black velvet bands for the neck become wider. An inch ribbon is worn if the neck is small; a half-inch width suits a large neck.

Newlace capes for evening toilette take the form of bretelles instead of fichus. They are made of tulle puffs, broad on the shoulders, narrowing toward the belt, and finished at the back by loops and a short sash. Black guipure lace and velvet ribbon make pretty capes, to be worn over high or low corsages of dinner dresses. Black velvet bretelles are embroidered with a vine of marguerites, the white flower and green leaves thrown into relief on the black ground.

PERSONAL.

THE Diocese of New York and the city of New York, so far as Episcopalians are concerned, may congratulate themselves that on the floor of the late General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, one of the readiest, most effective, most eloquent debaters in that body, as well as one who exhibited the most perfect familiarity with the history of the Church, with Parliamentary rules, etc., and who at the same time on all occasions took what may be termed a statesmanlike view of the interests of the Church, was the Rev. Dr. BENJAMIN I. HAIGHT, one of the assistant ministers of Trinity Church in this city. And what added, deservedly, to the influence he concededly exerted in the Convention, was the perfect frankness and the uniform courtesy he exhibited to his brother members, whether concurring with, or differing from them, in the positions he felt it his duty to advocate in that body.

At this present writing the prominent candidate of the Junta for King of Spain seems to be FERDINAND of Coburg, husband of the last Queen of Portugal, and father of the present king. The idea is that by electing him Spain will acquire a good administrator and a resolute Constitutionalist for the present; while in the future the succession may fall to the King of Portugal, and the Peninsula be once more united. King FERDINAND is a Catholic of the Coburg type, i. e., not Ultramontane, has had great experience, and governed Portugal as Regent for some years very satisfactorily.

Prince ALFRED is coming to New York in due course of time. The young gentleman has started in his man-of-war steamer to make a voyage around the world. It will take two years or more to accomplish the manœuvre.

RICHARD PURSER is dead. RICHARD was an old man. He was the oldest man in England. RICHARD was aged 112 years. For the last fifty years he lived in Cheltenham, working all the day at hard labor; but in consideration of his great age, her Majesty the Queen had given RICHARD a pension of $25 per annum. It did him a little good, though not much.

In what a ridiculous plight a very great man sometimes finds himself! On election-day, at Quincy, CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS deposited a written ballot. A few minutes afterward he returned, and stated that by mistake he had put a receipted bill into the box! An examination proved the correctness of the statement.

The Centennial of the birth of SCHLEIERMACHER, the founder of the new Christology of Germany and the restorer of positive Christian faith in connection with broad culture, will be celebrated widely in the German Churches on Saturday, November 21. A Commemorative Service will be held in the Church of the Messiah, Thirty-fourth Street and Park Avenue, on Sunday evening, November 22, at half-past seven o'clock. Dr. Osgood will give the discourse, and Dr. BELLows will assist.

PATTI-CAUX is doing well, pecuniarily, since her marriage. Her engagements for the year, commencing October 1, 1868, will bring her 521,000 francs, gold, not counting in what she may reasonably rely upon from private concerts and professional services at other than operatic entertainments.

MISS ROSE HAWTHORNE, eldest daughter of the novelist, has marked talent as an artist. Her mother is gifted in the same way, and before marriage practiced her art professionally. Among her published productions were the illustrations of "The Gentle Boy," a story by her future husband, which labor led to her marriage with the author.

Mr. MOTLEY, who has recently added to his avocations that of a political orator, in addition to the position he occupies as an historian and diplomatist, belongs to that very small class of Americans who combine high scholarship and literary distinction with the ability and experience of a politician and statesman. As a youth his career opened happily. In manhood he was a close student, traveled much, and became Secretary of Legation at St. Petersburg. Subsequently, as historian of the Dutch Republic and the grand Protestant struggle in the Netherlands, he attained celebrity as one of the greatest of historical writers; and as American Minister to the Court of Vienna he took rank as a good diplomatist and a man of high political principle.

General PRIM is a wag as well as a warrior. He remarked, the other day, in reference to the poll-tax, that it had only been imposed for the purpose of proving to the world that Spain was determined to go a-head.

There will be no end of English and American writers, actors, actresses, sculptresses, etc., etc., in New York this winter, among whom, notably, will be Miss BRADDOCK, CHARLES READE, HANS ANDERSEN, MAX MULLER, ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Miss CUSHMAN, Miss HOSMER, Miss EMMA STEBBINS, etc., etc.

Among the curious things that have occurred in connection with royal marriages in Europe is that of FREDERICK VII., who, when Crown-Prince of Denmark, fell in love with the princess who afterward became the wife of the Prince of GLUCKSBURG, and is now QUEEN OF DENMARK. The Crown-Prince, when he became enamored of the young damsel, was about to be married to the Princess CAROLINE, of Mecklenburg, whom the happy bridegroom intensely disliked. His father, the old King of Denmark, was furious at this untoward love affair, and he caused the young Prince of Glucksburg to offer his hand very suddenly to the princess of whom the Crown-Prince was enamored. She said she would take him, and they were shortly after married. The union, brought about so unexpectedly at the wish of the old king, proved to be an exceedingly happy one.

The lady who has had the honor of being the first of her sex elected a member of the Italian Academy of Belles-Lettres, is DORA D'ISTRIA, the authoress, who speaks fifteen languages, has written books in six of them, and is noted alike for her genius and beauty.

One of the most peculiar of St. Louis personals has just deceased—ISAAC WALKER—the Astor of that city. In alluding to the old fellow a St. Louis paper says: "In a rickety old two-story building on St. Clair Street, used alike for office and dwelling, there has lived for many years old ISAAC WALKER. Wifeless, and with one foot in the grave, any morning for the past ten years he could have been seen in his den of an office on the first-floor, arranging papers, assorting kegs, and counting money. He spoke with no one save on business; friendships he had none; money was his sole passion and aim. A stern landlord, he was commonly known as 'Old Walker,' and the cheap tenement houses and buildings all over the city brought him an enormous income. When the Lindell Hotel burned some years since, although his property lay all around it, and its re-erection would have greatly enhanced his land, still he refused to give a cent, while Madame Haycraft, the wealthy demi-monde, subscribed ten thousand dollars. Mr. WALKER leaves an estate worth from seven to ten millions of dollars."

Mrs. SCOTT SIDDONS, whose début as a reader has been one of the successes of the season, is the grand-daughter of the SIDDONS, who from the year 1782 to the year of 1812—thirty years—reigned upon the English stage as no actress had ruled before, or has ruled since; of whom the poet CAMPBELL has written: "She copied no one, living or dead, but acted from nature and herself; she was more than a woman of genius, for the additional benevolence of her heart made her an honor to her sex and to human nature." Mrs. SCOTT SIDDONS, the grand-daughter, is a young lady of much promise, and is already possessed of an English reputation as an actress that seems to challenge criticism, and it is but natural to expect that with such ancestry she must inherit great perception of dramatic art. At the early age of eleven years she made her first appearance upon the stage in a small part in the French play of "Esther," and succeeded in attracting considerable attention by her striking performance. Since then she has acted in English, French, and German in the most difficult plays of SHAKESPEARE, SCHILLER, RACINE, MOULIERE, CORNEILLE, etc. In person Mrs. SCOTT SIDDONS bears a strong resemblance to FANNY KEMBLE in her youth. She has a fine figure and manner, the KEMBLE face, and the grace, intelligence, and sympathetic character that go to make up the true histrionic artist.

The wife of M. DE GIRARDIN is a handsome German princess, and gives receptions, which, for intellectual and fashionable splendor, are second only to those of the Empress EUGENIE's. The husband's house cost 450,000 francs; is spacious and elegant, though in these respects not superior to some of the dwellings on Fifth Avenue and the gilt-edged streets diverging therefrom.

Our American artists, CHURCH, BIERSTADT, M'ENTEE, and GIFFORD, are still in Europe, where they are much entertained, accepted, dined, and so forth, and so forth. Their artistic merit is every where appreciated, and much European coin is expected to find its way to their credit as a result.

One of the cleverest actresses that ever trod the French stage—Mlle. CLAIRON—says, in her Memoir, that she read and studied the character of Montmorency for fifteen years "before," as she says, with charming modesty, "I permitted myself to learn the part." The most finished comedians of that day were modest. BETTERTON, at seventy, remarked to a friend who was praising his Hamlet as perfect: "Perfect! I have played Hamlet now fifty years, and I believe I have not got to the depths of its philosophy yet!"

A correspondent of the Chicago Republican has been sketching the exterior and general "get-up" of the Rev. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, of Boston, who writes clever stories for the "Oceanic Miscellany," as Dr. HOLMES called it. The correspondent expected to see an athletic Christian, with short English whiskers and a jolly smile, something of the KINGSLEY order. Instead, a form scarcely more than slight, with the staid stoop in his shoulders, clad in a gown, advanced to the desk. It would seem that his frame was originally robust, but, cloistered in a study, had given sparseness to the whitened cheeks, had sunken the large, meditative eye, and given the slight trace of severity to his face, which is really beautiful, reminding one at once of the Christ in Henri Le Jannis's picture of "Jesus Blessing Children." The Harvard tradition was, in his younger days, that he parted his hair to increase the resemblance! But the hair is thin on his temples now, worn with thought; and the face is one that might be stern when defending his faith in ecclesiastical council, but would soften unutterably to the children round his table.

Astrakhan Cap for Boy from 10 to 12 Years old.

THIS Astrakhan cap is lined with black lustring and a thin layer of wadding. Cut of Astrakhan, lustring, and thin wadding from Figs. 66 and 67 of the Supplement each one piece. Lay thin lining on one side of the wadding and the lustring on the other and quilt in small diamonds, then join these lining pieces with the outside pieces, sew Fig. 67 together on the ends, but without the lustring, after which cut the wadding out at the ends and sew the lustring down over the seam. Backstitch together Figs. 66 and 67 according to the corresponding figures on the pattern, hemming down the lining in the same manner as with the other seam. Overcast the ends around the bottom.

THIS vest is knitted plain with chamois wool on two wooden needles in backward and forward rounds except on the under edge of the vest and sleeves, where it is ribbed. Begin on the under edge of the back with a foundation of thirty-five stitches, and knit backward and forward sixteen rounds for the border, but in the first of these rounds work two stitches out of ev-

The edges are finished with bright-colored silk cord, which is also arranged in a cluster of loops on the top, the middle one of which serves for hanging up the holder. The sides are finished with two bright-colored silk tassels. Cut of pasteboard from Fig. 88 of the Supplement two pieces, one of which, however, only reaches from the under edge to the line. Next cut of white cloth the covering for the front and back, but on the back it reaches only from the upper edge a little below the lower part of the line. Next embroider these pieces of cloth in the manner shown by the illustration and partly by the design. The ring-shaped, leaf-shaped, and four and five leaved figures are of pieces of cloth in various bright colors, and are sewed to the white foundation with split filoselle silk in different colors, after which the remainder of the design is worked in point russe, except the stems, which are in chain stitch. Arrange the cloth on pasteboard, and cover the remainder with green satin, which must cover the under edge of the back piece of cloth, while the edges are overcast. Then join the front and back pieces with the side pieces of satin, which are three inches wide at the upper ends and sloping to the under ends. Finally, sew Crochet Cap for Boy from 8 to 10 Years old.

THIS cap is worked in the round, the foundation of gray wool in slip stitch, not as usual from right to left, but from left to right. The under side piece is worked of black wool in single crochet with chain stitch picots between. Begin the cap in the middle of the crown with a foundation of four stitches; join this in a round with a slip stitch, and work in the same manner as for the crocheted purse, illustrated in Harper's Bazar, No. 27, p.

417, a piece eight inches square. The corners are made by widening in the manner shown by the purse. Having completed this part work two rounds without widening, and then a side two inches wide, in every second round of which narrow four times in the same line of the widening. On the last round of this, which is worked without widening, work the under straight side an inch and a half wide of black wool on the same number of stitches as follows: Alternately five chain, one single crochet in each stitch of the former round. In continuing the work always pass over the chain and work single crochet on single crochet. The last round consists of a round in single crochet also only in the single crochet of the former round. Line this part of the cap with leather.

Child's Knitted Mitten.

THIS mitten is worked in the round in common patent with chinchilla and violet wool. Begin the mitten on the under edge of the violet wool stripe which borders the gauntlet, and make of the violet wool on a fine needle a foundation of fifty stitches, join these in a round and knit ten rounds, alternately one stitch knitted and one purl. This forms that part of the gauntlet next the hand. Now knit the 11th-12th rounds on coarser needles in patent; in knitting the patent in the round knit alternately in one round stitch and made stitch plain, and in the next purl them. In the 15th round splice on the chinchilla wool, and work sixty-four rounds in patent, then again with the fine needles ten rounds, alternately one stitch purl and one knitted, which forms the edge. Knit now, again with the coarse needles, twenty-four rounds in patent; then for the thumb take twelve stitches on another needle, cast on four stitches more, join in a round, and knit the thumb in twenty-eight rounds, narrowing off in the last four. Take the under veins of the four stitches, cast on on a needle with the remaining stitches and knit again forty-eight rounds, in the last eight of which narrow off. Turn the gauntlet over so that the violet stripes comes on the wrist.

Lady's Glove.

See illustrations on page 900.

The hand part of this glove is of white zephyr, knitted in backward and forward rounds, and worked in cross stitch with blue wool on the back. The gauntlet, which is six inches long, is worked in coiled crochet stitch of white, and in crossed double crochet of blue wool, and is lined with a loosely-knitted lining of white wool. Begin on a foundation of 44 stitches with steel knitting-needles and knit 108 rounds; in the following round cast off the first eight stitches and knit, with the 28 following, 40 rounds for the thumb (the last eight stitches remain without knitting), in doing which cast off one stitch at the end of the 109th round, ing attention to the widening on the under edge and the striped design, twelve pattern rows, which must always be narrowed five stitches at the end of the first round (upper edge of the skirt); this is done by leaving the last five stitches of each pattern row without working. The following sixteen pattern rows are worked on the entire row of stitches and also on those left while working the gore, but in each row a stitch must be added on the under edge of the under-skirt and one left on the upper edge. In this manner work still three times alternately a gore like the first, and sixteen pattern rows on the entire row of stitches. Then follows again a gore twelve pattern rows wide like the former, but on the under edge of the skirt in the seventh pattern row of this gore do not add a stitch, and in the 8th-12th pattern rows, as also in all the pattern rows now following, narrow a stitch. By this narrowing the other straight (back) edge of the under-skirt is formed. The fifty-two pattern rows now following are worked in the same striped design, but in each of these narrow one stitch not only on the under (back) edge, but also on the upper edge of the under-skirt, so that these pattern rows may be shortened in the same and also of every second or fourth following round, in order to make the thumb part gore-shaped. Having completed the thumb part sew together the foundation stitches with the edge stitches of the thumb of the glove and the eight stitches still on the needle. Next crochet the gauntlet on the wrist of the glove with white wool by working first a single crochet stitch in each edge stitch. After this follow two rounds in coiled crochet stitch, a detailed description of which will be found in the following Number, and after this a round of crossed double crochet with blue wool. Each of these is separated by a chain passing over a stitch of the previous round. After this follow twice three rounds of coiled stitch separated by a round of crossed double crochet. Now take up the back veins of the stitches on fine wooden knitting-needles and knit the lining plain in the round. After the last round cast off and sew the edge to the wrist of the glove on the under side. Lastly, edge the upper edge of the glove and of the thumb with a round of single crochet in blue wool, and work the back also with blue wool in cross stitch, crossing two stitches in width and two rounds in width.

Lady's Crochet Under-Skirt.

See illustration on page 900.

This gored under-skirt is crocheted of white and red wool in Tunisian stitch. The bottom is edged with a frill crocheted in the same colors. The upper part is finished with a muslin binding. Begin on the under edge of the back with white wool on a foundation of two stitches, and crochet six pattern rows. In these pattern rows widen at the beginning and end of each first round. The 7th pattern row, in which add also two stitches, is crocheted with red wool. This finishes one stripe. On the last (red) pattern row work seven times alternately six white and one red pattern row; then again a white pattern row, in which add also one stitch at the beginning and end. With the last pattern row the entire length of the under-skirt is reached. Work now for the first gore, pay-proportion as the pattern rows at the beginning were lengthened. The last pattern row must count two stitches. This finishes the under-skirt. Sew the back edges together with overcast stitches except a ten inch long slit, work a round of single crochet on the edge stitches of the slit, and crochet on the stitches on the upper edge of the under-skirt one pattern row, fulling the skirt in slightly. For the frill around the bottom of the skirt crochet with white wool one round sc. (single crochet) on the edge stitches in such a manner that the skirt shall neither be stretched nor full. On this work two other rounds sc., the first with red, and the second with white wool. 4th round.—With red wool, * 1 sc. in the first sc. of the former round, 2 ch. (chain), passing over one stitch in each of the following five stitches, 1 dc. (double crochet), in the middle one of these five stitches, however, 2 dc., then 2 ch., passing over one stitch. 5th round.—With white wool, * 1 sc. in the first sc. of the former round, 2 ch., pass over two stitches, 1 dc. in each of the next 6 dc., 2 ch. 6th round.—With red wool, * 1 sc. in the first sc. of the former round, 2 ch., pass over two stitches, 1 sc. in each dc., on each of the two middle dc., however, 2 dc., then 2 ch., pass over two stitches. 7th round.—With red wool, * 1 sc. on the first sc. of the former round, 2 ch., pass over two stitches, on each of sc. crocheted in the first dc. figure 1 dc., on each of the middle two stitches of this figure 2 dc., then 2 ch., pass over two stitches. 8th round is like the 7th, but with white wool. 9th-11th rounds are like the 6th-8th rounds. 12th round.—With red wool, * 1 sc. in the next sc. of the former round, 2 ch., pass over two stitches, on each stitch of the next dc. figure 1 sc., but in one of the two middle stitches of this figure 2 sc., then 2 ch., pass over two stitches. This completes the frill.

John had come home again, then! But would that make any difference? I had got into a way of thinking that most things went amiss in this life, and I had not built many air-castles lately. So when Aunt Lal said John had come, I went to work very soberly to convince myself that I never must care for him any more.

All of a sudden the door flew open, and a great burst of air and sunshine came into the room, and there was John holding me tight in his arms and calling me his darling! He looked so proud and happy and handsome, and I just laid my head on his shoulder and began to cry.

"I have loved you so long, little Gertie," he said; "but till this morning I thought you would never, never care for me."

And how, pray, had he found it out this morning? I asked, almost too happy to care much about knowing.

"Come out in the garden and see," was all his answer; and away we went down the long, untrodden path, over the last patches of snow, to the crocus bed. And they were all in bloom, the little darlings, red, white, yellow, and blue; and there it was, just as plain as could be, "I Love You, John," for him to read when he happened to look over the fence that morning. Do you wonder that we never fail to plant crocus bulbs now every year? I always do it myself, and I always make them say those words, "I Love You." But I put it in Latin, so that Jacob will not know, nor the children.

But Jack, our oldest boy, is very forward, and he commenced Latin last spring. One day he came in and said, "Why, mother, it looks just like Ego in among the crocuses!"

"Does it?" said his father. "Let me hear you decline Ego."

But now the boy knows more, and next spring he will want to be told all about it, so here is the story ready for him.

ENGLISH CORRESPONDENCE.

I AM writing this letter to you from Scotland, having for the first time in my life crossed the border. You, with your gigantic country, think nothing of a few hundred miles' journey; but we, though our island-home is a tiny one after all, as a rule know but little about it, and travel only so much in it as is necessary to see our friends and relatives, and enjoy the sea-breezes. Still, our lake district is crowded with tourists every year; and as soon as the 12th of August approaches, and grouse can be shot, the northern trains are full enough.

The part of Scotland where I am now sojourning, however, is a part but little visited by tourists, and little known. The wilds of Galloway, as the world is pleased to call it, is an old principality comprising the two counties of Wigton and Kirkcudbrightshire, and the Stewartry—viz., these combined counties—for which one member is returned to Parliament, is now in a state of great excitement on account of the coming elections; but then every place is so excited just now throughout the length and breadth of the land; and at pretty well every dinner-table, shooting—the one general topic on ordinary occasions—for a while gives place to the various details of the political struggles. And this is not the worst part of it: old friendships, which have borne the wear and tear of life for many a year, often enough find a speedy tomb at these times; and it takes a good year or two afterward for the ill-feeling, which is sure to get about, to subside at all.

The scenery in Galloway is rarely beautiful. The bonnie Dee and blithesome Urr dash and foam over pebbly beds and waylaying boulders, which lash them to foamy fury in their course, forming as they go natural cascades and waterfalls. On they flow under rustic bridges, beneath whirling water-wheels, the graceful larch and dark Scotch fir lining their banks oftentimes. A more beautifully wooded country you could hardly see; and tier upon tier of hills, now blue with distance, now pink with heather, peep in on every side. Sir Walter Scott is always present in one's mind as one revels in these beauties. The scenes of both "Red Gauntlet" and "Guy Mannering" are laid about here; and the other day I had the pleasure of rambling about at Auchincarn, amidst the famous caves where Dick Hatterick and his crew plied their illicit trade only too well.

I wish any word-painting of mine could bring before your eyes the pretty view on which I am looking as I write, stretching in front of the hospitable mansion where I am staying. Quite in the fore-ground is the park, where the small, black Galloway cattle, scattered here and there, a white mark like a belt across some of them, are feeding peacefully. You catch a pretty glimpse of the avenue on one side, and on the other of the extensive road beyond. In front is a long, flat plain of rich cultivated land, mapped out into fields with hedges and stone-walls, and the ruins of Threave Castle in the midst, which apparently, from this point of view, is in perfect preservation. It was an old strong-hold of the Douglases, and the hanging-stone—a projecting block of granite—still remains. The eighth Earl Douglas used to boast that it had never wanted a tassel for the last fifty years; he subsequently hung here Sir John Herries and Sir Patrick Macklean. This remnant of old days is backed by ranges of hills all more or less beautiful.

Good cheer is abundant in these parts, the most distinctive features of it are the good oatmeal porridge, the hot scones, and the heather honey. Porridge with the lower orders is their staple food. Among the upper classes it is generally the precursor of breakfast. It is sent up in large soup-plates, and each mouthful as it is eaten is dipped into a cup of cold milk hard by. Perhaps some of my readers may care to know exactly how Scotch porridge is made, so I will give them the full particulars thereof. To begin with, the water must be put into the sauce-pan cold, and while it is boiling the oat-meal must be dropped in lightly with the hand. After it has boiled it must be kept simmering by the fire for twenty minutes, and then salted to taste. Scones are merely hot round breakfast-cakes. I won't make your mouths water by telling you too much about the short-bread and rich plum luncheon-cake we have lately been enjoying, nor will I do more than allude to the apple jelly, marmalade, bramble jelly, etc., which invariably form part of breakfast. One of the nicest novelties to me are carries, small caraway seeds lightly covered with sugar, which are spread over bread and butter and make a very nice mixture, I can assure you.

The service of the Presbyterian Established Church of Scotland is one of the things which strike the members of the English Church a good deal. It is altogether so different to ours. I have only had the opportunity of seeing a small village church, and there the performance was very primitive. In the first place the building itself, large as it was, was unsightly. The principal pews were large and square with a table in the centre; they had evidently been at one time lined with green baize, which had been hastily torn down, the nails with morsels of baize attached still remaining. The clergyman appeared from first to last in the black silk gown. During the extemporary prayer every body stood, and while the hymns were sung every body sat. There was no organ or instrument of any kind to accompany the voices; a tuning-fork having been struck the clerk or precentor began a verse alone, in which, in time, the congregation joined.

Always after the service alms were collected in boxes attached to long poles which were passed to every pew. The holy communion is administered only twice a year, and in the week previous to its administration one day is observed as a fast—only a spiritual fast—when due preparation is supposed to be made for the rite. No labor is performed throughout the parish where the fast is ordered, but in every parish it falls on a different day. These fasts are the only days except Sundays, signalized in the Scotch Church by any special religious observance. Those who partake of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper are provided with tokens—a small metal badge either with a verse of Scripture or name of the church thereon; and the minister can, if he so please, debar any one he may deem unfit from partaking of it. They have no communion-tables as with us at the east end of the church, but tables are laid for the sacrament all down the aisle, covered with a white cloth, at which the congregation sit.

I must now turn, however, to current news. Longfellow is enjoying the beauties of Killarney. Mr. Bright and his wife are making a short sojourn in Cornwall. Commodore Nutt and Mrs. Thumb's sister are going to make a match of it. Miss Yonge, the authoress of so many charming works, of which the "Heir of Redcliffe" is perhaps the greatest favorite, is building a church with the proceeds of her latest works. With the profits from the "Daisy Chain" she fitted out Bishop Pattison's missionary ship, the Milanesia. Great praise is being generally accorded to the lessee of the Queen's Theatre for insisting that the dresses of all the ballet girls employed there should be saturated in a solution of tungstate of silver; had such a precaution been taken elsewhere sooner how many lives would have been spared!

The Duke of Cambridge, the Queen's cousin, is certainly a most enviable mortal, from all accounts. He receives as General Officer £16 a day, as Commander-in-Chief £7 a day, as Colonel of the 1st Regiment of the Line nearly £1000 a year, as Colonel of the 1st Regiment of Engineers £800 a year, as Colonel of the 1st Regiment of Artillery £600, and possesses besides all these a clear £12,000 a year.

It is said of us English that we dearly love a lord; at all events, we take a great deal of interest in the doings and movements of our nobility; and their vices, like their virtues, can certainly not be hid under a bushel. Lord Albert Clinton's misdoings are now the great public scandal. He is the Duke of Newcastle's brother, and only twenty-three; yet he has contrived to become a bankrupt, with liabilities to the amount of some £30,000. When his father died, not so many years ago, he had £900 a year and £10,000 under the marriage settlement—now he hasn't a penny, it has all disappeared in gaming and horse-racing.

Mr. Leighton is in Egypt. Mr. Holman Hunt, after a short sojourn in Naples, is now at Florence, en route for the East, preparing rich treats for us, no doubt, in the future.

London is getting fuller, and the theatres are beginning again with fresh vigor. The Prince Alfred, a new one, was opened the other night, in the presence of the illustrious Prince to whom it owes its name. The "Fortunes of Nigel" is being performed at Drury Lane, with Phelps as King James and Trapbois. The piece of the day, however, is Lord Lytton's "Rightful Heir." There is a perfect furore about it; and yet years ago, when it was brought out as the "Sea Captain," with Macready, it failed utterly. Now, on its first representation, the cheering and enthusiasm which greeted it was so hearty and prolonged that the author-peer, who was in a private box, had to come forward and show himself.

Tennyson is busy at work with a new poem, which is to appear at the end of the year, and President Johnson is expected here in March, and with these items of news I conclude my budget. I will conclude this letter, however, with a true history, which, if read in any work of fiction, would be deemed simply incredibly preposterous. Within the last week or so a claimant has arisen to Dilston Castle in the person of a woman, who styles herself Countess of Derwentwater, and is no doubt the lineal descendant and heiress of that ill-fated house, whose property was, as is always the case, forfeited to the crown on the execution of the then possessor for high treason. This "Countess of Derwentwater" has, it is said, been fruitlessly urging her claims for years with, it seems, much show of right on her side, for in many almost similar cases such property has been restored to the attainted family. She, however, has failed in her endeavors, and has taken the matter into her own hand. Clad in an Austrian military coat, with the sword of the Derwentwaters at her side, she obtained admission within the ruined walls of Dilston Castle. Having barred the entrance with a plank or so, a piece of tarpaulin was stretched where the roof should have been, and the walls hung with some original family portraits and other relics. The property is now in the hands of Greenwich Hospital, and, as represented by Mr. C. Grey, it declared her a trespasser and desired her to depart. This she refused to do, and was at last actually carried out in her chair by the work-people, who had, notwithstanding all her remonstrances, previously removed all the penates she had brought with her, though she drew her sword in their defense. But even then she held her ground to the best of her ability, and still remains on the turnpike road where she was ejected, with no better protection than the tarpaulin, her cloak, and her umbrella. How all this will end it is difficult to say; it will doubtless lead to a settlement of her claims one way or other. Meanwhile crowds are flocking to see her, and the neighbors show her the greatest sympathy, bringing her food and wine, and doing their best to support her through her trying ordeal. Nothing will induce her to desert her post; it is only to be feared her health will succumb. There are few incidents, even in the sensational novels of the day, that will beat this, I think.

ARDERN HOLT.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

UP-TOWN residents of New York are to be congratulated on the prospect of soon having a commodious, thoroughly built, and conveniently located market. "Central Market," on the block bounded by Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth streets, Broadway, and Seventh Avenue, is nearly completed, and will be opened for business during this month. The interior of this large structure is well lighted and ventilated. The double-planked floor is covered with cement to make it perfectly water-tight. When finished the market will contain one hundred and fifty stands, which are subdivided into sections. These are built of white ash and black walnut, and are conveniently planned. Each dealer will have for his individual use a large ice-box and meat-safe. If the Central Market is well managed, and only first-class dealers are allowed a stand in it, it will prove a great advantage to families in the vicinity. A little healthy competition in business is desirable; and there are many who will be glad to have a good selection of meats and vegetables at their command, without going to the large down-town markets—or being obliged to pay an extra price for every article, as is now frequently necessary.

The skating-rink on the corner of Sixty-fourth Street and Third Avenue is nearly completed, and is probably the largest building of the kind in the country.

It is again proposed to construct a canal across the Isthmus of Darien. This subject has been agitated many times without any practical result. Now it is said that our Government is thinking of negotiating with the Republic of Colombia in reference to this important international undertaking. The present plan is to construct a canal large enough to allow any ship in the world, except the Great Eastern, to pass from ocean to ocean without unloading, and to have it free to all nations, and neutral in all wars. Vessels are to pass and repass by paying a stipulated sum per ton and per passenger; the ports at either side to be free, except for goods intended for consumption in the Republic of Colombia.

A French medical journal contains an interesting article in regard to the use of electricity as a remedy in cases of poisoning by opium. Several instances are related in which, after all other articles had failed to rouse the patient, electricity was successfully applied.

Smiles's "Life of George Stephenson and his Son" shows in a clear, comprehensive, and peculiarly interesting biography how much earnest, persistent men may accomplish in one particular line of business, even if they have not any extraordinary genius. Perseverance in working out a good idea is more valuable to the world than bright, sparkling, but impatient genius.

An inquiry comes from Louisiana whether the item mentioning a new method of making diamonds, published in "Sayings and Doings" a few weeks ago, is authenticated. The British Scientific Review contains a curious article upon the subject, ascribing the invention of the art of making artificial precious stones to M. Ebelmen, but states that many improvements have been made since his death. The minute details of the process would scarcely be interesting to the general reader; but, according to the process of M. Elsner, certain proportions of pure pulverized quartz, pure dry carbonate of soda, calcined borax, saltpetre, and pure red lead, must be thoroughly mixed together, then introduced into a Hessian crucible, and heated to a vivid red heat in a charcoal fire. The product, when thoroughly melted, is a transparent crystal glass of very great brilliancy. To imitate the various precious stones, certain oxids or carbonates are added. According to M. Doult a magnificent artificial ruby can be obtained by adding to certain parts of the above mixture glass of antimony and purple of Cassius in definite proportions. The fusion must be thorough, the parts finely pulverized previously, and melted at a gradually rising temperature, maintained with great uniformity when at its maximum from twenty to thirty hours, and the cooling must take place very slowly. On the whole, the manufacture of artificial gems seems a rather complicated process, which few, except experienced chemists, will care to undertake for amusement or for profit.

While much that is true and useful is given to our readers in this column, no pledge is made to prove the truth of every thing. What is said and done would become very stale if time were always taken to authenticate it. Items are often given as current reports, sometimes when quite obvious they are any thing but true. The design is to present a pleasant variety of fresh matter, combining the useful and entertaining. As a general thing there is internal evidence enough to indicate what statements are true.

A marvelous story comes from Missouri. The captain of a vessel trading between San Francisco and Valparaiso was sailing on the Pacific Ocean when the terrific earthquakes occurred which lately destroyed so many towns in South America. The ocean was greatly convulsed, but after a little delay the voyage was continued. Soon a strange sight met the captain's gaze. It was no less than a group of islands formed of huge masses of solid diamond of every color and of the purest brilliancy. The islands are from twelve to twenty in number, and of various sizes. They consist of large white flint rocks, which rise to a height of about one hundred and fifty feet from the water. Thick layers of diamonds are imbedded in the rock. Some of the smaller islands are composed nearly altogether of diamond. There are agate, opaque topaz, ruby, and, indeed, gems of every hue; but one island, seventy miles long by fifteen wide, consists of an entirely pure emerald without any admixture of foreign substance. The seamen landed and found brilliants lying about like huge boulders, the smallest being about two hundred tons in weight. All efforts to detach portions of the diamond rock by means of crow-bars and sledges were in vain. So the captain ran the vessel on shore near Panama, telegraphed to her owners that she was wrecked, and to his brother in St. Louis to hurry on to him with plenty of nitro-glycerine and blasting implements. Meanwhile the secret has leaked out, and every body in St. Louis is wild to go on an expedition to the jewel islands, which are said to have been thrown up from the fiery reservoir in the centre of the earth by volcanic action. If this story is authenticated it will not be worth while to go to the trouble of making diamonds—there will be a plenty already made. But at present this sounds like a very good story of the Arabian Nights.

Valuable marble quarries have recently been disclosed in Loudon County, Virginia. If properly worked, they promise to be a great source of wealth to the people of the Old Dominion.

Early in the recent war a volunteer from Pittsfield, Massachusetts, enlisted and was killed. When he left home he took with him a Bible given him in Scotland twenty-two years before. Strangely enough there was a soldier in the rebel ranks who thought enough of that Bible to take it and carry it as his own. In front of Richmond, three years after, this soldier fell, and the good book was again appropriated by a rebel soldier, who recently, upon his death-bed, directed his brother, of South Carolina, to forward it to the widow of the soldier who first owned it, and whose address happened to be written on the fly-leaf. She duly received it, and prizes it dearly as a relic of her dead husband, and a curious instance of the chances and changes of life.

A pretty story is told by Mrs. L. M. Child, illustrating the readiness with which little folks take up, in imagination, the burdens of life. One evening a little girl of six years heard her father read an account of a mechanic whose arm was torn by machinery. No one supposed she took any notice of it; but when she went up stairs she began to sob violently. When asked what was the matter she exclaimed, "Oh dear! what shall I do if they marry me to a machine man?" Her mother, scarcely able to repress laughter, replied, "Don't cry about that, my child; perhaps you will never be married." "Oh yes, I shall," she responded, trying to swallow her sobs; "they will marry me to somebody, and likely as not he will be a machine man; and if he breaks his arm all to pieces, I sha'n't know nothing what to do."

A new railway is projected between Buffalo and Niagara Falls. The route is said to be considerably shorter than the present line of the New York Central Railroad, and the preparatory work is to commence soon. It is also announced that the Erie Railroad Company propose to lay a third rail the entire length of their track between New York and Buffalo. The object is to secure for the Erie Railway an unbroken narrow gauge route from New York to Chicago, both by the Buffalo and South Shore route, and by the Canada and North Shore route. The Erie Company have also resolved upon the construction of a magnificent new passenger depot in Buffalo on the site of their present buildings.

In various ways Nature is giving evidence of her destructive power. The appeal for aid from the overwhelmed cities of South America has not yet ceased, and there comes another from Switzerland. Most disastrous floods have recently visited the Alpine cantons of Switzerland, those which have suffered most being Tessin, Grisons, and St. Gall. For eight days the rain fell in torrents, and with but little intermission, along the northern and southern slopes of the Alps. During all this time a powerful south wind raged furiously amidst the masses of snow and ice which had lain undisturbed for centuries in their inaccessible Alpine strong-holds. Every mountain rivulet swelled into a rushing torrent, carrying appalling destruction in its course. Many places are under water; others in ruins. In Tessin alone the damage is estimated at forty thousand pounds sterling. The St. Gothard, Splügen, and St. Bernard routes have been rendered impassable, and on these three routes upward of eighty persons perished. In the village of Loderio alone no less than fifty deaths occurred. So terrible a flood has not taken place since 1834. In 1818 a very destructive one occurred. Subscriptions for the relief of the sufferers have been opened in France, England, Italy, and other countries. A movement has also been made to send remittances from the United States.

Winter Bonnets and Bonnet Frames.

THE patterns of bonnets will be found in the Supplement, Nos. XXVII.-XXXI, Figs. 78-87.

OPHELIA BONNET.—This bonnet is of black velvet, trimmed on the left side with a spray of leaves and a bunch of long fine grasses. An accompanying illustration gives the frame on which the bonnet is made. For making the frame cut of double black foundation from Figs. 80 and 81 of the Supplement each one piece, lay a pleat in Fig. 80, and bind the edges with narrow black velvet over a wire. Cover the front bandeau, Fig. 81, with a velvet puff, on each side of which blindstitch a little black satin roll. Now join the two bandeaux according to the corresponding figures on the pattern, and set on this a second large puff, which is sewed to the back edge of the frame, and reaches to the upper edge of the front bandeau, where it is sewed fast. Now cover the remaining ends of the back bandeau smoothly with velvet, bind the back with narrow velvet, and sew on the black satin ribbons, which are an inch and a quarter wide and ten inches long. The strings are of lace seven inches wide; one is thirty inches long and the other twenty-five, and both are edged with lace two inches wide. Gather the upper ends of both strings and fasten the shorter piece to the middle of the back of the bonnet, allowing the longer piece to reach over this to the left side, where the end is hidden by the spray. Fasten the lace ends again on the ends of the back bandeau, and finish the front with a rosette of black satin ribbon with long loops and ends.

MADÉLON BONNET.—This bonnet is of garnet velvet, trimmed with satin of the same color, a wreath of garnet velvet leaves and Figs. 78 and 79 of the Supplement each one piece. Having sewed in wire all around the front and on the back, lay the back in pleats and sew it to the front, according to the corresponding figures on the pattern. Now cover the back with a puff of velvet and the front with another of satin. This last is arranged on the back edge in a box-pleated diadem an inch high, after which gather the front and sew it down on the inside of the bonnet. Between the diadem and the front puff sew gathered lace, put in a lustring lining, and bind the back with a narrow strip of velvet or satin; on the inner edge of the front of the bonnet cover the edges of the lining and front puff with lace. In the inner front arrange a narrow band of foundation, which is covered with a bias strip of velvet two inches and a half wide and pleated along the middle. Border the strings with edging, lay a few pleats on the upper edge and sew them on the back of the bonnet. The place where the feather is set on is covered with a lace bow similar to the one which fastens the ends in front. The violet satin ribbons are an inch and a quarter wide and twenty-five inches long.

LUCRETIA BONNET.—This bonnet is of black velvet, trimmed with lace rosettes and a garnet flower spray. An accompanying illustration shows the frame of this bonnet. Cut from Figs. 85 and 86 of the Supplement each one piece of double foundation, join the two pieces according to the corresponding figures on the pattern, in doing which full in Fig. 85, sew a wire along the seam, and also a few other rows of wire, and wire the outer edges. Cover the frame with a velvet puff, which is sewed down on the outer edge and pleated and sewed down along the seam. This seam is covered with gathered lace two inches wide. Now put in inches long, and consist of lace insertion an inch wide, on the front side of which sew edging an inch wide and on the back three inches wide. These are sewed on the back of the bonnet, after which the wreath is arranged in the manner shown by the illustration.

STUART BONNET.—This bonnet is of black silk rep, trimmed with a violet feather, lace an inch and a half wide, and black lace strings fifty inches long and six inches wide, which are edged with lace. An accompanying illustration shows the frame of this bonnet. Cut from Fig. 87 of the Supplement one piece of double black foundation, take up the pleats on the front, and sew on the outer edges a strong wire, the ends of which must lap over three-quarters of an inch. On this frame arrange the silk, which has been laid crosswise in three box-pleats, leaving a space half the width of the pleat between each. Border the front edge of the bonnet with gathered lace, sew in a lining, and bind the outside and lining together with a narrow bias strip of lustring. Now sew on the front edge of the bonnet a bandeau of foundation and wire an inch wide, the upper side of which is edged with lace. Cover this bandeau with a puff consisting of a bias strip of rep four inches wide, which is arranged on the upper side in box-pleats in a diadem, and sewed to the bandeau so that the black berries, and black lace strings. Cut first for the frame, shown by the illustration, from Fig. 82 of the Supplement one piece of double black foundation, and from Figs. 83 and 84 each one piece of double. Sew a wire on each side of the bandeaux, and then sew them to the foundation, in doing which the latter must be slightly full. Sew on the front a wire coil, which is formed by rolling a fine wire around a fine tatting mesh or a large lead-pencil, and afterward flattening out the coil thus formed. Next cover the frame with a velvet puff, the front edge of which is sewed inside the edge of the bonnet and covered there with lace edging. The wire serves to hold out the puff. About an inch from the front edge sew an upright bandeau. This is composed of a strip of bias satin two inches wide, which is doubled, with a fine wire inserted in the doubled edge, and is pleated on the under edge. The place where this is set on is covered by a satin piping a third of an inch wide. The satin ribbons are an inch and a quarter wide and thirty-five inches long. The strings are thirty diadem stands up free; on its under side gather the strip, sew it fast inside the edge of the bonnet, and cover the seam with gathered lace. Lastly, arrange the feather, the ribbons, which are an inch and a quarter wide and twenty-five inches long, and the strings, which are pleated on the back edge of the bonnet. A lace rosette fastens the ends in front.

GALOTTI BONNET.—This bonnet is of violet velvet and violet satin, trimmed with a small violet feather, black lace two inches wide, and plain black lace strings twenty inches long and eight inches wide, dotted with beads. An accompanying illustration shows the frame, for making which cut of double black foundation from a black lustring lining, bind it with black velvet or lustring, and fasten inside on the under corners of the bonnet a bandeau of double foundation a third of an inch wide, to which sew two rows of lace gathered, with the gathered parts together, and set between these little lace rosettes in the manner shown by the illustration. Set on the back of the bonnet a veil of figured lace eight inches long and sixteen inches wide, and on the under edges the satin ribbons, which are twenty inches long and an inch and a quarter wide, and also the twenty-inch long strings. These strings are of black satin ribbon two inches wide, which is laid in threefold box-pleats in every two inches. The upper edges are fastened with a few stitches. Between the box-pleats lay the ribbon in little plain pleats, and trim with rosettes of lace an inch and a quarter wide. The same lace is sewed on the back of the bonnet and ends. Lastly, arrange the flower-twig in the manner shown by the illustration.

BLACK VELVET ROUND HAT.—This black velvet round hat is turned up at the sides. A twisted satin band encircles the crown. On each side of the hat, under the revers, are fastened two black satin ribbons two inches wide, which are tied in a bow on the top of the crown. The strings are fringed at the ends.

Hood for Girl from 7 to 9 Years old.

This elegant hood is of white cashmere, trimmed with black beads, and furnished with a knitted lining of white wool. The trimming consists of ruches of pinked bias strips of red cashmere and a rosette and ends of the same. Cut of white cashmere from Figs. 70-73 of the Supplement each one piece, and sew on black beads in the manner shown by the illustration. Make the lining to fit the outside. The lining is knit of white wool on medium wooden knitting-needles, plain, in backward and forward rounds. Next gather the back from the middle as far as \times on each side, lay the front edge in pleats, fastening \times on \bullet , and join the pieces according to the corresponding figures on the pattern. Lastly, sew on the piece, Fig. 73, which has been trimmed with a ruche, and the remaining ruches and rosette in the manner shown by the illustration. The ruche on the front stands out half its width. Red cashmere strings serve to tie the hood.

Crocheted Hood for Girl from 5 to 7 Years old.

This hood is crocheted with gray chinchilla wool in Tunisian stitch, and trimmed on the outer edge with a revers, which is crocheted with white wool in the same stitch and edged with points. The revers is fastened down with small jet buttons. Crochet the pieces separately from the patterns, beginning the crown and side pieces on the front, the cape on the under edge, and the revers on one end. For the pointed edges of the revers (the front edge of the front revers is left plain) work, first, the 1st round.—Always an sc. (single crochet) in each edge stitch. 2d round.—1 sc. in every second following stitch of the former round, and between each 1 ch. (chain). 3d round.—2 sc. separated by 3 ch. in every ch. of the former round. Now sew together the pieces of the hood according to the corresponding figures on the pattern, in doing which gather the sides of the crown, and lay two pleats in the upper edge of cast off, and knit sixteen inches further. Edge this part with the border, gather the upper edge, and set it on under the edge of the hood. Gather the ends closely and finish with a bow.

Trianon Hood.

This hood is knit of white wool, with a lining knit in the same manner, and trimmed with a border knitted of red wool. It consists of a long scarf to which is fastened a simulated net behind. The top is covered with a long piece, which is trimmed with a bow of ribbon and hangs loosely as in the Catalane cap. The ends may be arranged either like a fichu, or in the manner shown by the illustration. The scarf is in the pattern six inches wide and eighty inches long. Work on a foundation of 250 stitches fifty-five rounds plain, backward and forward. For the front piece take the middle fifty stitches of the last round on another needle, and knit twenty-five rounds, narrowing gradually. The Catalane part is worked in a similar manner, and is sixteen inches long and six inches wide, rounded on the back, and pointed front, to correspond to the front of the hood. Knit the net part from the pattern of the muslin net cap, Harper's Bazar, No. 45, page 713. Lastly, work plain in backward and forward rounds, with red wool, the stripes for the edges. Each of these stripes is forty-five rounds wide, and is doubled in such a manner that the edges meet along the middle of the stripe; with this double stripe bind the hood, fastening in at the same time the Catalane stripe on the front. Gather the ends up, so as to make them rounded, gather the same part from the middle of the back nine inches each side, and join it to the upper edge of the gathered net, which is finished with an elastic cord on the under edge. Finally, fasten the Catalane part again to the hood with a bow.

REPUTATION.

'Tis said that Wind and Water once,
In emulation,
Among the hills played hide-and-seek
With Reputation.

With many a gusty gambol, first
The Wind essayed it;
Behind the hills and round the knolls
He slyly played it.

But ev'ry nook betrayed his lair;
The leaves around him
Would rustle at his breath, and so
His playmates found him.

Then, laughing, crept the Water forth,
And 'mong the mallows
He spread himself, and branched apart
In countless shallows.

The long grass hid his silver stream,
The sedge concealed him;
The dripping willows helped his flight,
No sun revealed him;

Till, in his confidence elate,
With vigorous sally
He leapt a rock, and so was caught
Within the valley.

Then Wind and Water, panting both,
Remind their mate
That he should take his turn, and meet
The self-same fate;

But Reputation answered slow:
"Though I inclined me
To sport, if once I hide myself,
Say, who shall find me?"

"With me, all cunning skill is vain,
Vain all endeavor;
Miss me an instant, I am lost—
And lost forever!"

CHAPTER XVI.

AN HISTORICAL RETROSPECT.

I BEGAN my labors as clerk, or secretary, to Mr. Holwell with a hearty desire to render good service to the one friend I had found on this far foreign shore, and at once plunged into the entangled mass of accounts it was my business to examine.

The zemindarship is an office of double duties, and involves two separate functions, distinct and almost wholly independent of each other. The zemindar is not only judge of the Court of Cutcherry, but he is also superintendent and collector of the East India Company's revenues; and it was in this latter capacity that Govindram Metre, in his post of standing deputy, had enjoyed ample opportunity of amassing a fortune at the Company's expense.

The rapid rotation of the English zemindarship, which office changed hands two or three times in twelve months, had thrown all the power into this fellow's hands; since the superior officer, whose deputy he was, had no time to learn the details of his office, and little inclination to enter laboriously into the duties of a position he was to hold for so brief a period. Mr. Holwell's suspicions of this man's integrity had been aroused before his voyage to England, while the attention of the Court of Directors had also been drawn to sundry depredations and abuses committed by this official. At the request of the court, Mr. Holwell had taken pains to explain the nature of the zemindarship to the ruling powers at home; and he now returned invested with full authority as zemindar, and not to be removed from his office without express orders from England, since no proper investigation of the deputy's abuses could be possible while the head-office fluctuated by rotation as heretofore. Once invested with full powers, Mr. Holwell spared no labor in his task of cleansing this Augean stable of foul accountancy.

It would be but dry work to enter into the details of Govindram Metre's defalcations. Nothing could be more iniquitous than his system of embezzlement; and while the office of head zemindar had been a fluctuating one, nothing could be less liable to detection, since not one of the natives, from the highest to the lowest, durst with impunity have given umbrage to him, and 'tis they who alone could have explored the dark and intricate mazes in which he had so long concealed himself from the eye of justice.

Among his other functions it was his duty to dispose of the pottahs or leases, which appertained to the Company's farms for the space of one year. These pottahs should have been disposed of by public outcry or auction in the Cutcherry in the presence of the zemindar; but instead of being thus offered to public competition, the farms were sold privately at Govindram Metre's own house at such prices as he chose to assign to them. All the best of these he bought himself, under fictitious names, and immediately resold at a profit of from forty to sixty per cent. This infamous transaction, repeated annually for ten years, and involving several estates, had alone enabled him to amass a large fortune; but this was only one species of fraud among many. On the monthly charge of servants, on charges for repairing the cutcherries or court-houses, for repairing roads, and on other items, this knavish rascal's embezzlements amounted to thousands.

Govindram Metre's summary dismissal from his too profitable office was an act of Mr. Holwell's in which the Court of Directors at home promptly concurred; but the investigation of frauds so complicated, and the exposure of a system of plunder as artful as it was infamous, was a work of years. To discover the black zemindar's embezzlements was one thing, to prove them was another and far more arduous labor. Every obstacle by which the genius of dishonesty could hinder the progress of justice was placed in our way by this arch plunderer. A complete retrospective examination of his accounts was impossible, for we were politely informed that the white ants had destroyed some papers, while others had been washed away in a great storm. In spite of all opposition on the part of the culprit and his slavish instruments, Mr. Holwell did, however, contrive to lay before the Directors a detailed statement of the frauds to which their property had been subject; while the immediate and remarkable augmentation of the revenues under his charge fully proved that his discoveries were of no hypothetical character. It was reserved for this gentleman in the future to prove how small is the gratitude of princes, or of companies, and to drink to the dregs that cup of neglect so frequently offered to the lips of the faithful public servant.

Before I had been many months an inmate of Mr. Holwell's house, I had the satisfaction of finding that my services were of real value to this kind friend and master. He honored me with much confidence; and I, for my part, told him my own story without the smallest reservation, save on the one subject of Phil Hay's treachery. Meanwhile, although our life at Calcutta was monotonous itself, stirring events were taking place elsewhere; and Major Lawrence, with his brave young subordinate, Robert Clive, was teaching Duplex that French ambition was not to be forever unopposed by British enterprise.

But before proceeding farther with this narrative, it may be well for me to give some brief description of the condition of Hindostan and her rulers, as I received it from the lips of my well-informed patron, Mr. Holwell.

"You must accept all that you have heard and read of the Great Mogul and his absolute power as a page of past history that ended with the death of Aurungzebe. When that master-spirit sank in the grave, the soul of Timur expired with him. It is not fifty years since that great man died, at ninety-four years of age; and indeed it seems as if to such unscrupulous and commanding genius there belongs a power that can keep death himself at bay, and prolong life beyond its natural limit; and in that half-century seven emperors have sat on the musnud of Delhi, but one among them worthy to occupy the throne of his ancestors—the rest weak slaves of their favorites, and weaker slaves of their own vices. Hence the power that once extended to the utmost boundaries of Hindostan, and ruled its haughtiest deputies with a rod of iron, is now little more than a shadow. Subahdars and nabobs no longer wait to be appointed by a mandate from Delhi, but audaciously seize on territories, which they still more audaciously bequeath to their sons, or adopted sons, after them; while, with unparalleled impudence, they impose on the common people by pretended delegates from the imperial city, before whose spurious dignity they bend their stubborn knees, and from whose hands they receive forged credentials with a pretended humility that deludes and satisfies an ignorant populace. For the last half-century the most dangerous force of the East has been that of the Morattoes—a nation of hardy mountaineers—natives of the hilly regions that extend from the borders of Guzerat to Canara. They are the Swiss of India—ever ready to fight on the stronger side, and able to change leaders with the varying breath of fortune. This is a power which first arose in the palmy days of the Mogul empire, and has fattened upon that empire's decay."

"Then you consider the despotism of Delhi a power of the past?" I asked.

"Yes, Robert. Delhi has seen the last of her greatness. Her splendor sank in an eternal eclipse when the shepherd monarch of Ispahan, Nadir Shah, and his Persians invested the city, to retire thence with thirty-two millions' worth of loot, after such a work of ravage as was new even to Hindostan. Shade of Timur, that was indeed a degradation for the chief city of thy Tartar race!"

From Mr. Holwell's conversation I learned

the history of the Mogul empire during the last century. It was a bloody record of ambition and treachery; and I, who came fresh from a Christian country, was struck with horror by the crimes of a people whose religion I have heard philosophers extol as little inferior to the faith of Christ. The farther I carried my retrospect, the longer was the list of iniquities which the history of the past revealed; and as a monotonous sameness characterizes the murderous deeds of these Mahometan usurpers, I will not burden this chronicle by going farther back than to the reign of Shah Jehan. This noble follower of the Prophet distinguished himself in early life by the quiet assassination of his elder brother and an unsuccessful rebellion against his father, a feeble-minded monarch, very much under the governance of his wife, and who, upon beginning his reign with a little private business in the way of murder on his own account, assumed the modest surname of Mahomet Jehangire, or Conqueror of the World. Shah Jehan, knowing the family failing, wisely inaugurated his reign by a happy dispatch, per dagger or bow-string, of all the male posterity of Timur, except himself and his four sons. Had he made the exception still narrower, and included the four young Timurs in the general massacre, he would have shown himself a wise man; for one of these Tartar cubs was Aurungzebe, who, after his father had reigned thirty years, and he himself had won the reputation of a religious enthusiast utterly devoid of ambitious desires, engaged in warfare with and subjugated two of his brothers, betrayed and imprisoned the third, possessed himself by stratagem of his father's person, and, having safely bestowed that ancient ruler under lock and key, caused himself to be importuned by his nobles, whose entreaties so touched his tender nature—like the prayers of the Lord Mayor of London in that famous scene of Shakspeare's Richard III.—that he submitted to assume the royal power under the title of Aulum Geer, or Conqueror of the Wind.

Aulum Geer, alias Aurungzebe, proved himself a wise and prudent despot. He took speedy means to dispose of his best friend and ally, Meer Joomla, whom he dispatched on a warlike expedition, which resulted in the destruction of his army, by privation and disease, and his own untimely death, whereupon Aurungzebe had the candor to remark that he had lost "the greatest and most dangerous" of his friends.

After languishing in a prison, made tolerable to his senility by the amusements of a well-furnished harem, Shah Jehan expired, and there were not wanting slanderers to whisper that a noxious infusion of poppy-juice, called poust, a favorite slow poison of these Orientals, had somewhat accelerated his death. But the subjects of the Mogul empire were too busy for minute inquiries on this point. The emperor was bent on the subjugation alike of Mahometan and Hindoo rulers. He made war upon Morattoes and Sikhs, Rajpoots and Affghans, using sometimes the pretext of religious fervor, sometimes the right of an offended chief, and, having subdued the two sovereigns of the Deccan and made himself almost master of the Carnatic, he closed a reign of half a century in a harassing and useless struggle with the Morattoes, and died a natural death in his camp, thereby considerably varying the common close of a Mogul sovereignty.

The successors of Aurungzebe are scarce worthy of being chronicled in the same page with so wise and renowned a tyrant. Jehandar Shah, the grandson of this great man, allowed himself to be governed by a public dancer, whose very name of Lal Koor sounds disreputable to the English ear. After wasting his days and nights in debauch, and outraging the feelings of his omrahs, or nobles, this Jehandar was deposed and strangled, and his dead body exhibited in the streets of Delhi at the behest of his nephew and successor, Ferokhsere.

Nor did the usurper show himself better worthy to occupy the musnud than the kinsman he displaced. He also inaugurated his accession by the butchery of every man he had reason to fear. He also submitted to the base dominion of favorites, and, as the historian Ferishta remarked of one of his predecessors, "delighted in the soft society of silver-bodied damsels with musky tresses." I should scarcely have recorded his name save for the fact that to this Emperor the East India Company owe the phirmaud which gave them their richest privileges in Hindostan. Mr. Hamilton, a surgeon traveling with an embassy from the English Company, had the good fortune to cure the Emperor of a malady which the unskillful treatment of his native physicians had failed to subjugate. Ferokhsere bade the English doctor name his reward, and the generous Briton solicited privileges for the Company. These privileges included the extension of the Company's territory, the reduction and simplification of the duties hitherto paid by them, the exemption of their goods from stoppage and examination under cover of a passport or dustuck signed by the president of Calcutta, with other protections and exemptions of equal importance. The grant promised by the Emperor was only secured after much intrigue and counter-intrigue; but the English embassy was patient, and did not take leave of the Mogul until his royal phirmaud had been obtained.

From the Court of Delhi Mr. Holwell bade me look to the Deccan, or southern provinces of India, where the master-mind of Nizam-al-Mulk had created a sovereignty scarcely second to that of the Moguls, and which his daring had rendered independent of the imperial power. The Nizam had given up the ghost, after more than a century of life, in 1747; and since his death the sovereignty of the Deccan had been the subject of unceasing contention. But here I must again indulge in a retrospective glance, even at the risk of appearing prolix; and in order to make my narrative complete, it will be well for me to quote Mr. Holwell's description of the aspect of affairs upon the coast of Coromandel, where Clive was at this time winning his youthful crown of laurels.

"It is just twenty years since Sadatulla, a regular and acknowledged nabob of the Carnatic, died, much regretted by his subjects, after appointing his nephew and adopted son, Dost Ally, to succeed him. His dying wishes were quietly fulfilled, but not without inspiring secret aversion in the breast of Nizam-al-Mulk, subahdar of the Deccan, since the accession of Dost Ally to the subordinate kingdom of the Carnatic took place without reference to his authority. It is, however, a peculiarity of the Mahometan mind to smother its resentments, and to patiently await the opportunity of revenge.

"Dost Ally had two sons, the elder of whom, Subder Ally, had attained to man's estate at the time of his father's accession; he had likewise several daughters, one of whom he gave in marriage to his nephew, Mortiz Ally, another to a more distant relation, Chunda Saheb, who became his Dewan, or treasurer, one of the most powerful officers of the state.

"This Chunda Saheb was a man of limitless ambition, a supreme master of all the native arts of intrigue. On the death of the Rajah of Trichinopoly, an independent Hindoo state, he was sent with Subder Ally to obtain possession of the city; and, by a series of false pretenses, contrived to seduce the garrison and imprison the dowager queen, who died of grief and humiliation at finding herself thus betrayed. It was even whispered that the unhappy woman had fallen in love with her base betrayer, and that it was by the softer arts of the lover Chunda Saheb penetrated the citadel.

"Once master of Trichinopoly and its appertaining kingdom, Chunda Saheb showed himself bent on keeping his conquest.

"The nabob, who cherished a high opinion of his son-in-law's genius, dared not recall him from his new power. Chunda Saheb, without openly throwing off his allegiance to such an indulgent master, took care to improve the defenses of Trichinopoly, and to plant his two brothers in the strongest towns of his little kingdom.

"Nizam-al-Mulk's hatred of Dost Ally and his race was only increased by the extension of their possessions; but, as he was obliged to keep his arms turned toward Delhi, where he was equally dreaded and detested, he was unable to assail this aspiring family in person. In this dilemma he had recourse to the Morattoes, and gave those savage mountaineers permission to attack the Carnatic; thus by the same stroke wiping out his obligations to that race and gratifying his own resentments. This permission of the subah's was like the loosening of some mighty mountain stream, that carries sudden devastation to the valleys below its source. A hundred thousand Morattoes, under Ragoojee Bonsala, swept across the western barrier of the Carnatic before Dost Ally was able to collect his forces to oppose them. Bloody was the struggle that followed. The treachery of an Indian officer gave the nabob and his army into the hands of the foe. Dost Ally and his younger son, Hassan, fell dead from their elephants on the field of battle, and, with the common result of a leader's death among Oriental armies, immediate rout and ruin followed their fall.

"Subder Ally had happily taken refuge in the strong-hold of Vellore, and from that citadel he made terms with the triumphant Morattoes. He then assumed the title and authority of nabob, and Chunda Saheb came to Arcot to do homage to him, with a splendor of retinue and military force that made him appear the equal rather than the dependent of Subder Ally. In the December of the same year, however, the Morattoes returned, in consequence of a secret engagement with Subder Ally, invested Trichinopoly, intercepted and slaughtered the two brothers of Chunda Saheb—the severed head of one of whom they sent him as a confirmation of his brothers' defeat—and after a siege of three months, finally subjugated the city, and captured its resolute defender, Chunda Saheb, whom they carried off to a strong fort near their metropolis of Sattarah.

"That ambitious spirit, Chunda Saheb, being thus safely bestowed at a remote distance from the Carnatic, and the Morattoes appeased by the conquest of Trichinopoly, Subder Ally might have enjoyed his kingdom in tolerable security but for his ever-present fear of the Nizam, whose wrath could only be appeased by the payment of those large arrears of revenue which the late nabob, Dost Ally, had withheld. But to part with his treasures was a sacrifice which Subder Ally could not bring himself to make, and he strove to soften his creditor by humble excuses and pretended poverty, even giving out that he intended to go to Arabia and end his days in acts of piety at the tomb of his Prophet.

"His poverty and devotion were alike assumed, but the late calamities had made such an impression upon his mind that he left the defenseless city of Arcot, and took up his residence in the fortified citadel of Vellore, the strongest in the Carnatic, while his family and treasures were placed under the care of the English at Madras; for it is a notorious testimony to British honesty that these heathens will often trust us when they dare not trust each other.

"Unhappily for this cautious sovereign, danger lurked within the citadel of Vellore, more dire, because more secret, than the perils of unfortified Arcot. Mortiz Ally was the nabob's brother-in-law, bound to him by every tie of gratitude and affection; but among these people such ties count for nothing when once interest is at stake. The nabob knew that inherited wealth and parsimonious habits had made Mortiz Ally the richest man in his dominions, and was determined that he should contribute to the satisfaction of the greedy Morattoes in common with the other governors of the province. None of these gentlemen were too well inclined to disburse their treasures, and needed but the example of a respectable leader to refuse obedience to the nabob's demands. They therefore took occasion to hint to Mortiz Ally that Nizam-al-Mulk, the soubah of the Southern Provinces, would be inclined to favor rebellion against a prince who had defied his vice-royalty.

"In the East rebellion generally means assassination. Mortiz Ally was at once avaricious, ambitious, revengeful, and cowardly. He never moved, even in his own palace, without the protection of his guards, and never tasted food or drink until his wife had affixed her seal upon the vessel that contained it. For such a character the nabob entertained the most profound contempt, and at last, wearied by Mortiz Ally's repeated excuses for withholding the payment of his arrears of the assessment, went so far as to threaten him with displacement from his government if he persisted any longer in such trifling.

"This imprudent threat was the spark that fired the train. The discontented governors flattered Mortiz Ally's ambition, promising to acknowledge him chief of the Carnatic, in the place of his brother-in-law. The traitor now only waited his opportunity to strike.

"This seemed difficult to seize. Subder Ally's army lay within the suburbs and under the walls of Vellore. A numerous guard attended him within the fort. Mortiz Ally was too great a dastard to dream of open violence, and only showed himself more than usually servile after the insult he had received from his brother-in-law. The assassin might, indeed, have waited long for his opportunity had it not been afforded by the singular imprudence of the nabob himself.

"At the chief religious festival of Mahometan India, Subder Ally's servants asked permission to absent themselves for two or three days, in order to celebrate their pious orgies in their own families. The unsuspecting nabob, contrary to all courtly etiquette, suffered all his retinue and guards, except four persons, to leave him, and even desired that some of Mortiz Ally's officers and servants might attend him in the absence of his own.

"The governor of Vellore was prompt to seize so excellent an occasion. Poison was at first attempted, and failed. But even this attempt did not awaken Subder Ally to the consciousness of his peril. He gave a ready ear to his enemy's servants, who attributed his illness to one of the bilious disorders so common in India. On this followed a night of horror, during which the gates of Vellore were shut against all intruders. Among all his subjects Mortiz Ally found but one man willing to execute his orders. This was an officer whose wife the nabob had dishonored. The assassin entered Subder Ally's apartment at midnight at the head of a band of Abyssinian slaves, upbraided him with his wrongs, and stabbed him to death as he was in the act of escaping by a window.

"Mortiz Ally endeavored to appease the nabob's army by a somewhat lame account of their master's death; but the general opinion of his character was such that the soldiery flew to arms, declaring that their sovereign had been murdered by the governor of Vellore. The attachment of these devoted creatures, however, had its price; and on Mortiz Ally bidding high for their affection, they consented to waive their desire for vengeance, and agreed to accept him as Nabob of the Carnatic some forty-eight hours after the murder of Subder Ally Khan.

"The new nabob made a triumphal entry into his chief city of Arcot, and for some time all went merry as a marriage-bell, until several of the principal officers of the Carnatic discovered that they sympathized in a profound detestation of their new master; while the army, finding that Mortiz Ally's liberal promises had not resulted in ready-money, surrounded his palace, and tumultuously demanded their due.

"This was enough for the timorous nabob, who immediately fled from Arcot to his stronghold of Vellore, disguised in a woman's dress and shrouded by the curtains of a palanquin, only to reappear when the time was again ripe for treachery and murder. Upon this, Seid Mahomet Khan, the youthful son of the murdered Subder Ally, was immediately proclaimed nabob, and removed under the guardianship of his mother from Madras to Wandewash, a fortress in the command of his uncle by marriage. The sagacious and powerful old soubah, Nizam-al-Mulk, having for the moment no danger to fear from Delhi, now appeared upon the scene, supported by an army of eighty thousand horse and two hundred thousand foot. He was at once indignant and surprised by the state of anarchy which prevailed in the Carnatic, where every governor of a fort and every commander of a district had assumed the title and state of nabob. 'Scourge me the next son of a dog who dares approach my presence under the name of nabob!' cried the proud old Viceroy; 'for I have this day seen no less than eighteen nabobs in the Carnatic, whereas I imagined there was but one in the Southern Provinces.'

"The son of Subder Ally was among the visitors who did obeisance to the soubah. Nizam-al-Mulk did not permit this young prince to return to the safe-keeping of his uncle at Wandewash, but gave him into the charge of his own officers, who were bidden to show the lad all possible respect. The Composer-of-the-State then returned to Golcondah, and gave the sovereignty of the Carnatic to one of his generals, who had the misfortune to be found dead in his bed on the morning appointed for his departure to his new kingdom, not without suspicion of poison.

"This somewhat suspicious decease resulted in the appointment of An'war-adean Khan, whose enemies were not slow to hint that he who most profited by the death of his predecessor was the person whose unknown hand had hastened that event. An'war-adean was the son of a learned Mahometan, deeply versed in the original text of the Koran, and one of the religious officers attached to the person of the late mighty Aurungzebe. The new nabob was a brave and prudent officer; but the people of the Carnatic cherished a warm affection for the race of Dost Ally, whose descendants had governed them with a gentle hand, and Nizam-al-Mulk found it prudent to assert that An'war-adean was appointed only as regent until such time as Seid Mahomet, the son of Subder Ally, should be old enough to reign. In the mean time the boy was placed under An'war-adean's guardianship, in a position that somewhat resembled that of a famous young prince of the House of York under the tender care of his kind uncle Gloucester.

"An'war-adean treated his charge with all show of kindness, despite any natural jealousy which may have been aroused in his mind by the general joy with which the populace had welcomed the youth on his return to Arcot. Installed in the palace of the fort, Seid Mahomet had no possible cause for uneasiness, save the somewhat clamorous demands of the Patans—a body of Mahometan soldiers from the extreme north of Hindostan, whose hardihood, courage, and audacity distinguished them from all other inhabitants of the empire. These men had served Subder Ally, and they now tormented his son by daily demands for their arrears.

"In the month of June the young prince, as head of his family, was called upon to preside at the marriage festival of a kinsman, which was to be celebrated with all pomp in the fort of Arcot. Invitations were sent far and wide to the bridegroom's kindred, many of whom were governors of cities in the Carnatic.

"Among these was Mortiz Ally. The prince was bidden to conceal his natural aversion, and to receive the murderer of his father with all Oriental courtesy. It was thought by many that the cowardly governor of Vellore would not trust himself outside the gates of his strong-hold upon an invitation from the son of his victim; but to the general surprise he presented himself among the guests of the young prince, and was treated with distinguished respect by the regent, An'war-adean Khan.

"The marriage festival was not suffered to proceed without interruption from the insolence of the Patan soldiers, twelve of whom, with their captain at their head, broke through the ceremonial pomp of the prince's court, to urge their demands with more than common insolence. They were repelled by Seid Mahomet's servants, at first with contumely, and in the end with violence; such an outrage as is rarely offered to this proud and insolent people without provoking a sanguinary and immediate revenge.

"The thirteen Patans, however, received this rebuff with unusual meekness, and on the same day tendered their humble apologies for the morning's violence. Their submission was readily accepted, and all was calm; yet it was but a deceitful tranquillity, which presaged the coming tempest.

"With evening came the most brilliant hour of the festival. Seid Mahomet, with Mortiz Ally, and most of the other guests, were assembled, when the approach of the Regent Nabob was announced. The young Prince, desiring to pay his venerable guardian public homage, passed into the vestibule, intending to receive him at the bottom of a flight of steps leading to the court of the palace. The thirteen Patans were among the spectators in this lower court, and as the prince appeared, surrounded by his guests, and attended by his officers and guards, these haughty warriors greeted him with demonstrative reverence and affection. After these compliments their captain rapidly ascended the steps, as if about to cast himself at the feet of his offended lord, and having thrown Seid Mahomet's attendants off their guard by his contrition of countenance and manner, suddenly drew his dagger, and with one blow pierced the young prince's heart.

"In an instant the vestibule flashed with naked swords. The assassin was cut to pieces on the spot, and ten of his companions were sacrificed by the furious crowd below. Amidst this scene of horror An'war-adean Khan appeared, and promptly gave such orders as were necessary for the discovery of the conspiracy; since it was the general cry that the Patans had only been the venal instruments of some hidden power.

"Nor was it long before a vengeful murmur arose, coupled with the name of Mortiz Ally. The governor of Vellore had been beside the prince as he fell, but when he was now sought for, it was discovered that he had availed himself of the general confusion to fly from Arcot, attended by a large body of cavalry and other troops, which had been awaiting him in a spirit of caution that argued a foregone conclusion. Pursuit would have been worse than useless, for no equal force of cavalry was ready on the instant, and the distance from Arcot to Vellore was but twelve miles. Curses and imprecations on the murderer's head rang out upon the air which had so lately echoed the tinkling of lutes, and brazen clash of cymbals, and all the joyous sounds of Eastern festival. The populace, dispersed by an order from An'war-adean Khan, retired to their homes in gloomy silence, or gathered stealthily in secret companies to communicate their dark suspicions. The nabob not only dismissed every Patan in his service, but ordered that no member of that nation should remain an hour longer in the city, and that their houses should be razed to the ground, the last mark of infamy which Oriental justice can inflict upon a malefactor. Yet, so given to suspicion is the public mind, even this conduct did not hinder the assertion that the murder of Seid Mahomet had been plotted by An'war-adean and Mortiz Ally.

"Such whispers having reached the ear of the nabob, he strongly denied all share in a crime which he boldly attributed to the governor of Vellore, and challenged his detractors to the proof of their foul slanders. Mortiz Ally, for his part, as boldly accused the nabob, but brought forward no proof to sustain his assertion; and it was supposed that the same evidence which would have condemned An'war-adean must also have demonstrated his own guilt.

"Favored by Nizam-al-Mulk, and sheltered by his vice-royal power, An'war-adean held his ground as Nabob of the Carnatic; but his government was not the less hateful to his people. The death of the Nizam, in 1748, was the signal for revolution. And now the spirit of European intrigue allied itself to the plotting genius of the East. Dupleix, the governor of the French establishment of Pondicherry, had long since secretly fixed on Chunda Saheb, as that member of Dost Ally's race most gifted with the talents of intrigue. Now followed plot upon the heels of plot, revolution upon revolution. Nazir Jung, the son of the late Nizam, and Moozuffer Jung, his grand-nephew, contested the government of the Deccan. Chunda Saheb, ransomed from the Morattoes by French gold, moulded Moozuffer Jung to his own ends, and struggled for dominion in the Carnatic; while Dupleix, like the monkey in the fable, waited till his cat's-paw should have snatched the prize, to grasp it for himself; and if not actually aspiring to Oriental sovereignty upon his own account, was at any rate bent upon elevating to power a Soubahdar of the Deccan, and a Nabob of the Carnatic, who should be little more than the instruments of his will. To what height this aspiring man might have reached, and what extended dominion France might have acquired in the East, had not the English at last awakened from their ignominious apathy. I can hardly venture to calculate.

"For some time the rebels were triumphant. An'war-adean was slain in an engagement, at the age of one hundred and seven years. His eldest son was taken prisoner during the same struggle; and his second son, Mahomet Ally, with the remnant of the army, escaped to his government of Trichinopoly. Success favored the arms and intrigues of Dupleix and his two allies. The powerful hill-fortress of Gingee, hitherto deemed impregnable, was taken by the French under Bussy; Nazir Jung was slain under circumstances of some treachery; his nephew and opponent, Moozuffer Jung, installed as Soubahdar of the Deccan; and the ambitious Dupleix made governor of all the countries south of the Kistna, with Chunda Saheb for his deputy at Arcot.

"Moozuffer Jung was not permitted long to enjoy his triumph. He perished in an attempt to subdue the ever-rebellious Patans, who, having helped to raise him to the throne, were insatiable in their demands for reward. At this perilous juncture the French interest was protected by Bussy, who instantly proclaimed Salabut Jung, eldest surviving son of the Nizam, Soubahdar of the Deccan. This prince confirmed all the grants made to Dupleix, and it may be fairly said that at this period the governor of Pondicherry wielded a power superior to that of the Great Mogul himself.

"While a plotting French politician and his general had thus contrived to seize the dominion of Southern India, the prospects of the English Company were of the darkest hue. Mahomet Ally, the one chief friendly to the British government, was reduced to the single possession of Trichinopoly; and nothing appeared more likely than that the whole Carnatic would fall into the power of Chunda Saheb, from whom we English could expect neither favor nor mercy. Against the audacious intrigues of Dupleix, and the military skill of his generals, we could only oppose the prudence of a petty trade committee, since Colonel Lawrence was at this most critical epoch absent in England on private affairs. Menaced with certain ruin in the event of Chunda Saheb's extending power, and insulted by the French, who planted their white flags upon almost every field around the English boundary, and even within the English limits, it was time that forbearance and neutrality should cease.

"In this dark hour, when British pride had been humbled to the very dust by the rapid successes and undisguised insolence of a rival power, there arose upon the clouded horizon a star which, as I think, is destined to mount yet higher in the military heaven. While Colonel Lawrence was still in Europe, and in the absence of orders from England, Robert Clive, with an innate military genius, took the helm of affairs, and Arcot, the chief city of the Carnatic, was seized by a handful of English soldiers, held against a siege of fifty days' duration, and secured to the English ally. This was but the beginning of triumphs. Other engagements as brilliant have followed in rapid succession, and thus Robert Clive, at the age of twenty-six, has undermined the French power in the Carnatic, humbled the pride of that most ambitious nation, and founded the renown of British arms in India."

Thus ran my patron's record of affairs past and present upon the coast of Coromandel. It was during my own residence in India that the young captain, whose name had already become synonymous with victory, enjoyed a signal triumph at Trichinopoly; but before this new conquest, the daring chief, Chunda Saheb, had terminated his adventurous and troubled career under circumstances of peculiar cruelty.

His affairs having become desperate, he accepted a deceitful promise of protection from Monackjee, the general of the Tanjore forces. It is possible that Monackjee gave this pledge in good faith, but finding all other powers bent on disputing his possession of so illustrious a prisoner, this barbarous Tanjorine put his too-confiding captive to death, and dispatched the head of Chunda Saheb as a bloody offering to his rival and enemy, Mahomet Ally.

Such was the state of affairs upon the southern coast when I entered upon my new duties as Mr. Holwell's secretary. In Bengal all was quiet. The nabob Allaverdy Khan, in his actions in the present, showed himself a beneficent ruler and an amiable man; but when I ventured to say as much to my patron, Mr. Holwell regarded me with a somewhat ironical smile. "Yes, Bob," he replied, "the nabob is a very indulgent ruler, and no doubt altogether an excellent person; but for all that I should scarcely care to trust too much to his honor. I tell you, boy, these Mahometans are false to the marrow of their bones, and treachery is as natural to them as truth and honesty are supposed to be to John Bull; though I have found, by-the-way, that even that blustering gentleman can tell a lie when his interest pushes him to it."

"Will you tell me why you think badly of Allaverdy, Sir?" I asked, ever curious about the rulers of this strange empire, which seemed to me wonderful as a glimpse of fairy-land, and ancient as a page of Herodotus.

"You shall hear the darkest passage of his life, Robert, and form your own judgment upon it. He and his brother, Hodgee Hamed, began their careers as penniless adventurers, the sons of a wily Tartar, and rose to power by the favor of Sujah Khan, Nabob of Bengal, Behar, and Oria, who made the elder brother, Hodgee Hamed, his prime minister, and the younger, Allaverdy, general of his troops, and ultimately governor of Behar. Each well suited his allotted post, the elder being versed in the arts of suppression and diplomacy, while the younger had all the best gifts of a military leader. The two were closely bound to each other; for self-interest, in this case, strengthened the ties of relationship.

"The short-lived gratitude of the East did not long secure to Sujah Khan the fidelity of these favored subjects. A conspiracy was ripening for the casting aside of all authority on the part of the deputy-governor of Behar, and Sujah, apprised of this treachery, was meditating vengeance, when Nadir Shah, the Persian Alexander, and his forces swept like the whirlwind across Hindostan, and every eye was turned to Delhi. Before the Persian had left the imperial city Sujah died, and his profligate son, Suffraze Khan, succeeded to his sovereignty.

"The vices of this new ruler were eminently favorable to the ambitious plans of the two brothers. Suffraze quickly contrived to offend all his influential subjects, among others Juggat Seat, the head of the princely banking-house of Muxadavad, whose son's wife he insulted by an act of supreme folly. Hodgee promptly traded upon his master's errors. A plot was hatched, and Allaverdy invaded Bengal. The reigning nabob was slain, after a nobler resistance than might have been expected from so vicious a man, and Allaverdy pushed boldly onward to Muxadavad, where he was proclaimed Nabob of Bengal, Behar, and Oria.

"The power thus audaciously seized was not long unassailed. The proud and wily Composer-of-the-State, Nizam-al-Mulk, took alarm, and incited the Morattoes to attack the new nabob. Eighty thousand of these hardy warriors swooped from their mountain strong-holds upon Allaverdy's new dominions; and long and desperate were the struggles that inaugurated the nabob's reign. The Morattoes ravaged the country, collected the revenues of almost the whole of the territory south of the Ganges, and after being beaten, routed, and driven out of Allaverdy's dominion one year, reappeared the next, with renewed strength and unconquerable audacity; nor could handsome payments on the part of their victim assure him of exemption from attack.

"In Eastern politics, when affairs grow desperate, treachery is not far distant. Finding himself powerless to cope with so strong and slippery a foe, Allaverdy pretended a desire to treat, and proposed a personal conference with Baschir Pondit, the general and moving spirit of the Morattoe army. Doubting the good faith of the nabob's professions, Baschir Pondit refused his consent to this interview until Allaverdy had sworn on the Koran that no treachery should be attempted. It was agreed that the two leaders should meet in a tent pitched on the open plain, each attended by an equal number of officers and unarmed servants. But the care of providing the tent was left to Allaverdy, who had contrived to hoodwink the Morattoe general by offering to send his wife to visit the wife of Baschir Pondit, a social concession of supreme importance in this land of ceremonies.

"At the appointed hour the two chiefs advanced to the tent, each attended by the most distinguished of his officers, while in the distance a long train of covered palanquins, supposed to contain Allaverdy's wife and her retinue, was seen moving toward the Morattoe camp. What passed within the tent has been told by many, and seldom told alike. Enough is known to stamp the work of that hour as one of the darkest deeds ever committed on this wicked earth. At a signal, fifty armed men sprang from the sides of the tent, which had been constructed with a double lining to afford ambush for the assassins. The Morattoe general and his captains were massacred to a man; but Allaverdy did not draw his sword. He only looked on, and approved the carnage. When the work of slaughter was finished, a signal of attack was thrown out, and the Bengal army rushed at once upon their disorganized foe. The Morattoes fled in confusion, only to reassemble and renew the war with redoubled fury.

"Ten years of harassing warfare followed that day of treason; and a treaty of peace, arranged between the nabob and his hydra-headed foe, is not yet ratified. But the Morattoes have been propitiated by subsidies and concessions, and Allaverdy, now a very old man, has received his patent from the sorely enfeebled powers of Delhi, on condition that he shall annually remit the tribute of six millions of rupees. The courage and fortitude he has displayed in overcoming innumerable difficulties have endeared him to his people, despite the murder of Baschir Poudit, and a few minor treacheries, which his subjects indulgently ascribe to the account of Hodgee Hamed, who fell a victim to the anger of his enemies, and expired, universally execrated, some years ago. To his own people he has been a just and not unkind master; with the English Company he has on the whole dealt fairly, although he has shown himself somewhat exacting in money-matters. But take him for all in all, I fear we are likely to have reason to regret his loss."

"How is that?" I asked.

"Because his nephew, and probable successor, Mirza Mahmud, is a cruel voluptuary, who hates the English, and, indeed, loves nothing but his own sensual pleasures. He has enjoyed a princely education, which in the Oriental sense of the word means the slavish flattery of parasites, and the unrestrained indulgence of every vicious propensity. The favorite amusement of his childhood was the torture of birds and animals; the diversions of his manhood consist in the society of profligate menials and low buffoons, and in the gratification of a propensity for intoxicating liquors, to say nothing of other vices, which serve to mark the contrast between himself and his great-uncle, ever a temperate man, and the faithful husband of one wife."

"And is this wretch certain to become nabob?"

"I believe there is little doubt of it, though the appointment has not yet been formally made. The people of Bengal look forward with terror to such a ruler; but Mirza Mahmud has contrived to hide his real nature from his great-uncle, who has regarded the young man from his birth with an almost doting fondness: and among this servile people no one dares enlighten the old man as to his adopted son's disposition and pursuits. All we English can do is to pray that Allaverdy's years may be prolonged to the utmost limit."

CHAPTER XV.

AN ILL WIND THAT BLEW SOME PEOPLE GOOD.

FATE had decreed that Major von Groll should not immediately proceed with his investigations touching the mysterious tenant of the hunting-lodge.

On the morning after his visit to the deserted house, Major von Groll appeared at the land-steward's office in the main street of Detmold, and presented himself to Von Schleppers with an open letter in his hand. He had just received news of the death of his wife's only brother, and must, he said, set out at once for Bohemia to attend the funeral, and to make sundry business arrangements on behalf of Frau von Groll.

"My brother-in-law has died intestate, I am told," said the Major. "And as my wife is his only surviving relative, she will inherit as next of kin."

The Justizrath made a queer grimace, intended to combine sorrow for the lady's bereavement with joy at her accession of fortune.

"Well, Major," said he, "we are all mortal—all mortal. May I ask if the gnädige Frau's inheritance will be—a—considerable? The deceased gentleman—I fancy I have heard it said—was wealthy?"

"Baron Dornberg was very rich. He married a great heiress, who left him a widower some years ago. But as they were childless, I believe the bulk of her estates return after Dornberg's death to the lady's family."

"Oh!"

"Yes; but there will still be something for Amalia. All the Dornberg property in Saxony will come to her, I suppose."

"Ah, so!"

"We shall not be millionaires, but it will be a very acceptable thing. You know well enough that we have not more money than we know what to do with."

The Justizrath did know it. And he knew also that it was chiefly the Major's straitened circumstances which had induced him to accept the office of land-steward to the Prince of Lippe-Detmold.

"I am very glad," said the Justizrath, rubbing his hands in his slow, soft way. "Delighted. That is to say, of course, the gnädige Frau must not give way too much to grief. We are all mortal—all mortal."

The Major was to drive to Paderborn, whence he would pursue his journey by railway. He would get his business done as quickly as might be, and hoped to be back in Detmold in a week, or at farthest ten days. This was on the 27th of March.

Major von Groll set out that same afternoon; the Justizrath advising him strongly not to delay being on the spot to look after his wife's interests.

Mathilde von Schleppers, when she heard the news from her husband, lost no time in paying a visit of condolence to Frau von Groll, but she found that aristocratic dame quite prepared to accept congratulations instead. Her brother's death had been sudden, and therefore to a certain extent a shock to his affectionate sister; but otherwise Frau von Groll opined that it was a very good thing, and need not be lamented over in any way.

Baron Dornberg had led a lonely, gloomy life for the last few years—ever since his wife's death, in fact—shut up in an old château in Bohemia, where he scarcely saw a soul except his servants. He had never behaved in a fraternal manner toward her, said Frau von Groll. Nor had his family ever been the better for the wealthy marriage he had made. Baron Dornberg had shown himself to be covetous and selfish, she was sorry to confess. Covetousness and selfishness she considered the most odious of sins. She remembered how her poor, dear mother had striven and struggled to make the match between Ernest and the great Bohemian heiress. And directly her brother was married, he all but cut his family! They had all expected him to help them on in the world; but, instead of that, Ernest had chosen to keep his wife's riches and influence for himself. Wasn't that disgusting?

She herself—Amalia Wilhelmina von Groll, geboren Dornberg—had known what it was to want money, and that was a tremendous thing to reflect upon, when it was remembered that her brother had been rolling in riches all the gratulations she also dutifully communicated to the Justizrath.

"Do you think, Friedrich," said she, "that the Von Grolls will go away to Dornberg?"

"I'm sure, my dear, I can't say. How should it be possible for me to answer you?"

"But you can guess, Friedrich, I suppose?"

"I never guess, meine Liebe. And I would advise you not to do so either. It is a very bad plan."

But there was a twinkle of satisfaction in the Justizrath's eye, which his wife interpreted rightly, as a symptom that he thought his promotion far from impossible.

"Well," said she, straightening her broad back, "one thing is certain; if the Von Grolls do leave Detmold, you, and you only, ought to have the land-stewardship. And what's more, you will too. Why, it is your duty to take it for the sake of the poor dear Prince. People in our position are bound to assist him, I always say."

The news of Frau von Groll's inheritance filtered down from the select and genteel circle in which that lady lived to the lower strata of society. Liese in her kitchen, and Otto behind the counter of Herr Schmitt's shop, heard the rumor. But Otto at this time had his head too full of thoughts and speculations about his own future to give much heed to the gossip.

Herr Schmitt's illness increased so rapidly that time. Of course, had she not been a noble lady, poverty would have been much easier to endure. Low-born people naturally had not the same feelings. But for a Von Groll, geboren Dornberg, to suffer from straitened means!—Ach Himmel!

Well, under the circumstances, people could not expect her to be overwhelmed with sorrow at her brother's demise, could they?

All which utterances, and many more, did Frau Mathilde von Schleppers faithfully report to her husband.

The news of Frau von Groll's inheritance was not long in spreading through the little capital. Of course its amount was exaggerated, and the circumstances attending it distorted. But granting that people must talk of their neighbors' business with assumed knowledge of the facts, this was all very natural.

Strangers to the Von Groll family could not know the particulars of the case with accuracy. That was impossible. Well, then, they must guess at or invent them. It was all very natural, if you would only grant that trifling premise—namely, that it was necessary for them to talk about their neighbors' business at all!

There was a general impression that Major von Groll would resign his post under the Prince, and go to live in Saxony. Frau von Schleppers was even congratulated on her husband's coming promotion to the land-stewardship. Which con-at last it became obvious that he must give up business altogether for a time. The doctor recommended him to try a mild southern climate and sea-air. Such recommendations are too often impossible to follow. In Schmitt's case, however, there was no serious obstacle to his leaving Detmold. He was a bachelor, and possessed of means which his frugal German habits made amply sufficient for all his wants. With the passive resistance of an invalid who dreads exertion, he had for some months combated the advice of his physician; but now came a reaction, and having finally resolved to go, he grew feverishly anxious to depart, and chafed at the little unavoidable delays which would keep him among the bleak breezes of Northern Germany for a week or two yet.

Here, then, was Otto once more with the world before him and an occupation to seek. He had pretty firmly resolved that this time it should be one of his own choosing.

Schmitt wrote to Simon Schnarcher, the sacristan, to inform him of the state of the case; but he advised Otto to go over to Horn, and communicate with his great-uncle by word of mouth.

"You had better see the sacristan, Otto," said Herr Schmitt. "I was not strong enough to write fully. My letter will reach Horn tomorrow morning. If you start betimes, you may be in your uncle's house but a few hours after the letter. You can ask him, if you like, to come and talk matters over with me. But it must be soon—soon. There is no time to lose."

Otto thanked his master, and resolved to comply with his advice. And after they had parted for the evening, Schmitt called the young man back into his room, and said, with a faint smile, "Hark ye, Otto! If the Herr Küster talks to me about you, I am willing and ready to give him a certificate that, according to my conscientious judgment—founded now upon six months' experience—you will never make a tradesman."

"Heart's thanks, Sir," returned Otto, with thorough simplicity, and went down stairs to put up the shutters of the shop.

It was seven o'clock on a cold spring evening. The street pavements were white and dry as long-bleached bones. Fitful gusts of wind whirled little eddying clouds of dust hither and thither; and the fast-darkening sky looked like a vast cold dome of polished metal dimly seen, and fretted here and there by a steel-bright star. Otto helped the cadaverous apprentice—still in a chronic state of toothache—to place and bar the heavy, old-fashioned shutters; and then he stood at the shop-door for a moment irresolutely, gazing up at the sky.

"Gottlieb," said he, "I want to go and speak to a friend in the town. If I find the person at home, I shall be back in a couple of hours. If not, I will return directly. Any way I'll undertake not to be later than nine. Will you send the servant to bed and sit up for me? Poor Marie is tired with waiting on the master, and if you will just open the door when I knock, I shall take it kindly."

Gottlieb promised willingly enough. And Otto put on his hat, and set off down the street.

He walked rapidly from habit, and the chill biting wind was not calculated to make one's pace lag. I have said, in describing Lawyer von Schleppers's house, that it faced the river. But the word river scarcely conveys an idea of the little stream of the Werre as it flows through Detmold. It is banked up artificially throughout its course through the town, and on its margin stand many pleasant old red-brick houses, of which the Justizrath's was perhaps the most picturesque. But this quarter of the little town, which in summer affords pleasant and much frequented walks, was at this season of the year, and at this hour of the evening, even more solitary and deserted than the streets. Otto's brisk, firm footstep sounded on the gravel-path by the Werre, and, save the muffled bark of a distant watch-dog, no other sound broke the silence.

Suddenly, as he passed a rugged and now leafless hedge, inclosing a piece of meadow-land, where the housewives bleached their linen, he felt a hand laid firmly on his shoulder from behind, and a low, subdued voice bade him stop.

Otto threw off the grasp with a strong, quick movement, and turning, saw a figure beside him whose outline was but dimly seen in the gathering darkness.

"Who are you, and what do you want?" he demanded, rather peremptorily.

"Why, cousin Otto—you gave me leave to call cousins with you, you know—did I frighten you?"

"Well, yes, I suppose so. I was very near knocking you down; so I suppose you did frighten me a bit."

With which odd confession of timidity Otto shook hands with his cousin Joachim Müller.

"I have looked many a time since that day we met in the forest by Horn for the three white crosses on the oak-tree; but I never saw them. Well, of course, you had other things to do, and pleasanter folks to think of, than such as me. It's all natural, and I was a fool to expect you to remember me."

"It is true that I had other things to do, and, mayhap, pleasanter folks to think of," answered Otto, bluntly; "but I did remember you, kinsman, for all that; and if I had known any place where you might be found for certain, I would have tried to come and see you. But these three crosses were only to give you four-and-twenty hours' notice—didn't you say so?—and I have been tied to the shop lately, and not always able to arrange what I would do four-and-twenty hours beforehand. Yours seems rather an outlandish way of communicating with your friends."

"Yes; outlandish enough. It's well for them that have a home, and what's a deal rarer, friends to come to it. But never mind about that now, youngster. I wanted to see you, to tell you that I'm thinking of going away from Detmold."

"Going away! What for?"

"Because ill-luck follows me here, as it has followed me every where. I'm hunted about worse than a rat or a stoat."

"Come, come, cousin Joachim, don't be down-hearted. I'm just cast on the world again myself, but I don't fear. However, to tell the truth, I have no time to stay and talk with you now. I want to call here at this house, and I have but a short time to do my errand. Can't you let me see you somewhere in the daylight, instead of flitting about by night like a bat or an owl?"

They had now reached the Justizrath's door, and Otto pulled the bell with that vigorous touch which had so scandalized the Justizrath.

Joachim lingered by his young cousin's side.

"I will be about by the hollow oak below the Denkmal, all to-morrow and next day," said he, earnestly. "Do come, Otto Hemmerich! Hang it! I don't know how it is, but my heart warms to you as I thought it never could warm to any human being."

At this moment the door was softly opened, and the charcoal-burner, slinking behind Otto into the shadow, saw Liese Lehmann's pure, fair face framed in the open doorway, and illumined by the light of a lamp which she held in her hand.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

JANE GRAY.—The Amozine embroidery was correctly described in the Bazar. Of course, we can not explain why your letter to the proprietors was not answered, but think it quite likely that it did not reach them. The dry-stamping is not indelible, but simply marks the pattern to be embroidered. By addressing the proprietors, per advertisement, you will doubtless receive particulars.

MATTIE.—Cord and Creese has not been published in book form. The story will be found complete in the first volume of Harper's Bazar.

N.—We can not give the addresses you desire. Mrs. C. K.—You will find the pattern you want in Bazar No. 24. It is called a smoking-jacket. Make it longer, and it will serve for a dressing-gown. The night-wrapper pattern was given in Bazar No. 48. We furnish back Numbers of the Bazar at ten cents a copy.

A COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER.—The Supplement of Bazar No. 55 will give you patterns and precise quantities required for cloaks. The New York Fashion article in the same paper will tell you the prices of velvets. Velvet is not fashionable this winter, and never was suitable for a cloak. If you are married in your poplin traveling dress, a round hat of velvet is admissible. Do not wear a velvet cloak, but a wrapping of the material of the dress. Leave your plaid circular, or extra traveling wrap, in the carriage.

ACHSAH.—Make your traveling dress a short gored skirt, trimmed with serge braid. A pelisse with belt and elbow cape is the most convenient outside garment. Line the waist and cape with flannel. Your light silk should have a train with tunic and flounce of white lace. If the tunic is too expensive the skirt may be looped in a panier puff, and worn with a short sash trimmed with lace. Make a black silk peasant waist and panier skirt to wear over your poplin dress. It will also serve to modernize other dresses of last season. Long dresses are seldom worn to church here. The train is particularly troublesome in a narrow crowded aisle. Handsome short suits of velvet, silk, or poplin are used instead.

SIDNEY M.—The Maria Theresa dress, illustrated in Bazar No. 52, is the model you want. The square neck with folded chemisette, and the frilled sleeves are very fashionable. Make the pleated chemisette of Lyons tulle, or of wash net, if the muslin is not dressy enough, though muslin is greatly worn at present. Make your black silk suit with double skirt, not looped up as you are stout, and a tight short basque. Wear very small hoops, if any. Lace on your basque and upper skirt; headed with passanterie is the most elegant trimming. Points are predicted for evening dresses this season, but are not yet seen. Black spangled lace is not worn. Fichus of velvet and lace are worn with high and low corsages, but are not so new as velvet bretelles embroidered and edged with lace. All kinds of plaid mantles are worn. A lace hood or cape, or a Watteau fold down the back of your cloak, would perhaps improve it.

CHURCHWOMAN.—The best answer to your question: "What is the authority for the use of the surplice by the clergy of the Episcopal Church in the United States and England?" may be found in a learned and costly work lately published in England entitled: "Vestiarum Christianum. The Origin and Gradual Development of the Dress of Holy Ministry in the Church," by the Rev. Wharton B. Marriott. According to this work it would appear that the dress of the Christian priesthood, during the first five centuries, was not, as is alleged by some, modeled on that of the Jewish priesthood, but was simply taken from that of persons of condition in the better classes of Roman society; in other words, the long tunic or robe falling to the feet as distinguished from the short tunic worn by laborers, and reaching only to the knees. This dress appears on the walls of the Catacombs as a sacred garment, and is virtually the white surplice of the Episcopal clergymen of the present day. About the eleventh or twelfth century the analogy or usage of the Jewish Church was insisted upon; and hence the more ornate and symbolical "vestments" of the Romish priesthood. At the Reformation, according to Mr. Marriott, the English Church, from which the American Episcopal Church inherits, had the good fortune to hit the early usage in a return to the simple white tunic. In the volume referred to this theory is supported with much learning.

X. Y.—You are right. Swift has been as abusive of women as Voltaire. He not only broke the hearts of two, his Stella and Vanessa, but said some ugly words of the whole sex. It is he who has the credit of this: "A very little wit is valued in a woman, as we are pleased with a few words spoken by a parrot;" and this also is his: "Women are like riddles; they please us no longer when once they are known."

LAURA N.—We take it for granted that if you are thought worthy of being the instructor of the person's children you will be deemed, as you are really, her social equal, and thus treated in every respect. It is not customary, we believe, for republican dames to consider their governesses inferiors.

PROCTER.—Each laundress has her own preparation for polishing shirt fronts. Spermaceti and gum-Arabic enter into all of these. A preparation called "Hutchings' Starch Polish" is highly recommended.

E. A. A.—The entertainment at a golden wedding is similar to that at any other evening party. The hours are usually early in deference to the age of the entertainers, and the cards sometimes announce the reception as from eight until eleven o'clock.

LULU.—A blue cashmere, or a blue and white plaid poplin, or the red and black Rob Roy, are suitable for indoor dresses. Let the skirt just sweep the floor. A ten-inch flounce, bias, and bound with silk of the prevalent color of the plaid. Above the flounce is a cross-cut strip of the material edged with silk. The corsage is lapped in front, with three deep pleats from shoulder to belt. A very full coat-sleeve, with a band and ruffle falling over the hand.—Eighteen yards of yard wide muslin is bought for six shirts, but a yard or two is left if they are cut economically. New York Mills and Wamsutta are the best shirtings. Buy ready-made bosoms, the pleats stitched by the sewing machine. Woven pleats do not wear well. Get a shirt-maker to cut one shirt, and use this as a pattern for the others.

A. E. M.—Patterns for ladies' under-clothes were given in Bazar No. 48. The first volume of the Bazar ends with the sixty-first Number.

MARIA.—Is your dress for the house or the street? Is it woolen or silk? Be more explicit. The simple statement that it is claret color is not sufficiently definite for us to decide how it should be trimmed. Consult Bazar No. 55 for information about cloaks.

C. L. M.—You will find a number of cloak patterns in the Supplement of Bazar No. 55, with minute details of making. It is impossible to give the quantity of trimming required. Make the garment and then measure the parts to be trimmed.

Mrs. F. P.—It is impossible to state precisely the annual expense of living in the places you mention, as so much depends upon the manner of life. It is, however, safe to say that it will not cost you more than one half that it would in any of our large cities. The cost of living in Florence, however, has greatly increased since it has been made the capital of Italy.

BURNETT'S FLORIMEL, also BURNETT'S COLOGNE-WATER (three sizes).—There is a freshness in these delightful perfumes found in no others. New York Branch, 592 Broadway (Metropolitan Hotel Building). For sale by druggists and fancy-goods dealers in the principal cities of the United States.

MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN.—Now is the time to clear the complexion for the winter from those disagreeable discolorations, by using PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. Sold by all Druggists.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS.—Of PRANG'S recent publications, the most artistically finished is a Sunset-scene after BIERSTADT. . . . The Chromo is a faithful reflex of the original, and would adorn the walls of the most elegant mansion. As a work of art, we look upon it as the best of the many good pictures issued by this house.—Boston Traveller.

CALISAYA BARK.—It is said that Messrs. DRAKE & CO. (proprietors of the PLANTATION BITTERS) are the largest importers of Calisaya Bark in this country, and that, with the exception of an occasional sale, all they import is used in the compounding of their celebrated PLANTATION BITTERS, to which they undoubtedly are indebted for their wonderful health-restoring properties. As a tonic and appetizer they are not surpassed, and we cheerfully recommend them. All first-class druggists keep them for sale.—Independent.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR REMOVED from any part of the body in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by UPHAM'S DEPICATORY POWDER. $1.25 by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, 115 South Seventh St., Philadelphia.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

THE DERBY ATHENÆUM.

WORKS OF LITERATURE AND ART.

This Association has been formed for the dissemination of the STANDARD PRODUCTIONS OF LITERATURE, As well as artistic works of the highest class, at a moderate expense. It is proposed to assist the progress of knowledge and to elevate our national taste, by an application of those principles which have insured the success of co-operative and business Unions, the actual advantage of the sales effected being placed almost wholly in the hands of the purchaser.

In accordance with this design, the following plan has been adopted, and is submitted to the public, in full confidence that it can not fail to receive their sanction and support.

The management of the Athenæum will be under the direction and immediate supervision of Mr. H. W. DERBY, its Business Superintendent, with the sole view of making it a thorough, and, at the same time, a permanent success.

A spacious Bookstore, with Art Galleries adjoining, has been established at

in which the most valuable and prominent publications, in every branch of Literature and Science, is sold at the Publishers' lowest regular price. In addition to this, every purchaser to the amount of Five Dollars will be entitled to a certificate in the distribution of Works of Art.

In order that the public may judge of the value and high order of the Paintings and other Works of Art which will be at the First Distribution, they have been placed upon

FREE EXHIBITION

AT THE GALLERIES OF THE ATHENÆUM, Their actual value being

ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS.

It may, therefore, be seen that every purchaser will not only receive the direct value of his money in the books or other goods purchased, but at the same time have an interest in the distribution of

THE WORKS OF ART NOW ON EXHIBITION.

No person is limited to a single certificate of membership, but can receive two or more, according to the amount of purchases.

BUYERS OF BOOKS

Will see the advantages in making their purchases from THE ATHENÆUM, which is ready to supply them with every work published in the United States at the present time, as they receive, on so doing, a gratuitous Ticket—provided their purchase amounts to Five Dollars—with the books, which are MARKED AT THEIR LOWEST ACTUAL VALUE.

The Principals of Schools, Colleges, and Public Libraries, will readily perceive the advantages derivable to their institutions by becoming patrons of the Athenæum, as they will, in addition to their purchases, become the actual throughout the country, at the same time ornamenting their homes with the finest Works of Art and Choicest Literature.

PROMOTERS OF ARTISTIC TASTE

PRICED CATALOGUES OF OUR STOCK,

From the North British Review:
MISS MULOCK'S NOVELS.
She attempts to show how the trials, perplexities, joys, sorrows, labors, and successes of life deepen or wither the character according to its inward bent.
She cares to teach, not how dishonesty is always plunging men into infinitely more complicated external difficulties than it would in real life, but how any continued insincerity gradually darkens and corrupts the very life-springs of the mind; not how all events conspire to crush an unreal being, who is to be the "example" of the story, but how every event, adverse or fortunate, tends to strengthen and expand a high mind, and to break the springs of a selfish or merely weak and self-indulgent nature.
She does not limit herself to domestic conversations, and the mere shock of character on character: she includes a large range of events—the influence of worldly successes and failures—the risks of commercial enterprises—the power of social position—in short, the various elements of a wider economy than that generally admitted into a tale.
She has a true respect for her work, and never permits herself to "make books," and yet she has evidently very great facility in making them.
There are few writers who have exhibited a more marked progress, whether in freedom of touch or in depth of purpose, than the authoress of "The Ogilvies" and "John Halifax."

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward
by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the custom-house stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the express charges) by sending directly to the

"GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

H. W. BEECHER'S SERMONS.
SERMONS BY HENRY WARD BEECHER, Plymouth Church, Brooklyn. Selected from Published and Unpublished Discourses, and revised by their Author. WITH STEEL PORTRAIT BY HAL-PIN. Complete in Two Vols., 8vo, Cloth, Beveled, $5 00.

These sermons are selected from over five hundred published and unpublished discourses. Some of them have never before been printed. Others are substantially rewritten. Others are materially modified. They are not theological, though there are theological discussions among them. They give a fair portraiture of the author's preaching; illustrate his most common and most popular methods; appeal, as he does, with almost equal power to every faculty; address in turn the reason, the imagination, the fancy, and the affections; and always, though by different routes, reach the heart. They will interpret to many a young minister the secret of true success; not only because in one or two autobiographical discourses Mr. Beecher uncovers his heart and lets us look therein, but because in them all he displays the customary methods of the most popular modern preachers. They will be esteemed by every student of theological philosophy as the authentic exposition of the views of one who has done more to modify modern theology—at least in his own denomination—than any other man since the days of Edwards. Above all, these sermons will be warmly esteemed by many a Christian who will find in these pages the wants of his heart appreciated by an exquisite sympathy and fed by one whose unrecognized wealth of heart is greater even than his recognized genius.

SOL SMITH'S
THEATRICAL MANAGEMENT.
THEATRICAL MANAGEMENT IN THE WEST AND SOUTH FOR THIRTY YEARS. Interspersed with ANECDOTAL SKETCHES, autobio-graphically given by SOL SMITH, Retired Actor.
With Fifteen Illustrations and a Portrait of the Author. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

This autobiography of one of the first of American actors is immensely entertaining as a narrative; from the laughable Dedication to the Anecdotal Appendix it is irresistibly droll and comic. It is full of incident, character, and reminiscence. It is not only an autobiography of Mr. Sol Smith, but a complete history of the American stage, full of facts about the early life of the principal actors and managers of the present day, and of reminiscences of the stage for the past fifty years and more. Besides, it forms a most pleasant and agreeable sketch of Southern and Southwestern society, so faithful that any reader who has ever encountered the peculiar people of those regions will instantly recognize its truthfulness.

FACETIÆ.

A GLEEGYMAN called on a poor parishioner, whom he found bitterly lamenting the loss of an only son, a boy four or five years old. In the hope of consoling the afflicted woman, he remarked to her that "one so young could not have committed any very grievous sin; and that, no doubt, the child had gone to heaven." "Ah, Sir," said the simple-hearted creature, "but Tommy was so shy—and they are all strangers there."

LAURA. "Why, Harriet, what a queer way of doing your hair—just like a snail!"

HARRIET. "Well, my love, I don't think any one can call that a 'fast' head-dress."

A fellow in an oblivious state took up his lodgings in the street. He woke next morning, and, straightening himself up, looked on the ground on which he had made his couch, and said: "Well, if I had a pickaxe I would make up my bed!"

The late Queen of Spain should change her name from Isabella to Wasabella.

An Indian chief, in a telegraph-office in Montana, being told that the operator was "talking with a white brother two thousand miles distant," gave it as his opinion that that was the "longest talk" he had ever witnessed.

Elliot Smith was a good-natured auctioneer at Cambridge, England, whose body exceeded in dimensions the proper corporation standard. On him a Trinity wag wrote the following lines:

"If flesh be grass, as some folks say,
Then Elliot Smith's a load of hay."

DELICATE GROUND.

In the course of a life you are likely to mix
Among folks of all possible kinds;
And, in talking, it's highly improper to fix
Upon any chance topic one finds.
You may long to exhibit your wisdom or fun,
You may try to be gay or profound;
But you'll often discover, when once you've begun,
That you're treading on "delicate ground."

Now suppose that a friend has induced you to lend
A respectable sum long ago;
And the time for repayment has come to an end,
But repayment is dreadfully slow.
If you venture to hint at a trifling advance
Of a shilling or two in the pound,
You can hardly insist, when you see at a glance
That you're treading on "delicate ground."

If you tumble in love and are burning to "pop,"
You should never lose time in despair!
But at once on your knees you should gracefully drop,
And express what you have to declare.
If the nymph should have smiled on a happier swain,
While on you she has constantly frowned,
You may give up the case, for it's perfectly plain
That you're treading on "delicate ground."

It's a difficult thing to be always discreet,
Or talk in a frank sort of way,
When you think of the number of people you meet,
And the number of things that you say.
If you notice a sudden and absolute blank
In the whole of the faces around,
You've only yourself and your folly to thank,
For you're treading on "delicate ground."

To get out of debt, pay up. To keep out, pay down.

A clergyman recently married a couple, and the pair had scarcely left the church when a rich banker rushed in, and, having heard the facts, expressed his disgust that his daughter should have married "that fellow." The banker had but just left, when in rushed a wealthy broker, who, on hearing the facts, expressed his disgust at his son's marrying "that girl." An even thing all round.

MINOR JOKES.

When are gloves unsalable?—When they are kept on hand.

"Drop me a line," as the drowning man said to the fellow on deck.

What joint of meat is most appropriate for an empty larder?—A fillet (fill it).

Why is a farmer impressed by the letter G?—It will convert oats into goats.

When a poor fellow is about to be burned by the savages his existence is at stake.

Why is a spendthrift's purse like a thunder-cloud?—Because it is continually lightning.

"Sir, you are just like the motion of a dog's tail." "How so?" "Because you are a wag."

A country paper wants to know if a man with wooden legs can be considered a foot-passenger.

If a man is murdered by his workmen, should the coroner render a verdict of killed by his own hands?

A respectable gentleman don't like to have a heavy charge leveled against him—especially if it is in a gun.

Why are our fingers particularly reliable in case of breakage?—Because they are always on hand with nails.

A bean dressed out resembles the cinnamon-tree—the bark is of more value than the body.

What suit is the most costly, and the less liked the longer it lasts?—A law-suit.

A PRIVILEGED PERSON.

YOUNG LADY IN SWING. "Oh! this is awfully jolly!"
COUSIN (not a bit jealous). "How can you use such words? 'Awfully jolly' is very vulgar; is it not, Mr. Chepstow?"
MR. C. "Yes it was—till your Cousin said it."

"DISTANCE LENDS ENCHANTMENT TO THE VIEW."

We need not say how difficult it was for Alfred to Post Ledgers, and give his Mind to Business generally, under the above Circumstances.

AMONG THE RUINS!

GUSHING OLD GIRL. "Oh! is it not strange, Captain Fitzroff, that all that is Old is Beautiful?"

A country paper, in noticing the death of a worthy citizen, says: "As a neighbor, he was kind; as a miller, upright. His virtues were beyond all price, and his flour was always sold at ten per cent. advance."

A FIERY STEED—Horse radish.

An American farmer says: "We raise four hundred bushels of potatoes to the acre here, which would be a big thing if we didn't also raise insects enough to eat 'em all up."

No wonder grave-yards yawn, when there are so many sleepers there.

What small animal becomes a large one by being beheaded?—Fox—ox.

SINGULAR—To see a garden walk.

Who were the first astronomers?—The stars, for they first studied the heavens.

An English cockney at the Falls of Niagara, when asked how he liked the falls, replied: "They're 'andsome—quite so; but they don't quite hanser my expectations; besides, I got vetted, and lost me 'at. I prefer to look at 'em in an engraving, in 'ot weather, and in the 'ouse."

TO RENOVATE AN OLD HAT—Take it to an evening party and leave early.

A candidate for auditor of public accounts was called upon for a speech.

On rising, he commenced: "Gentlemen, you have called on me for a few remarks. I have none to make—I have no prepared speech. Indeed, I am no speaker. I do not desire to be a speaker—I only want to be an auditor!"

"I don't know any thing about your 'Tycoon,' said an old Illinoisian to a man who was discoursing on Japan; "but when you come to the raccoon you'll find me at home!"

ELIZABETH'S FRILLS.

Elizabeth's frills! they were broad and were narrow,
My mind now their magical memory fills;
The pattern ran on just as straight as an arrow,
Or twined in a scroll round a parrot or sparrow,
So funnily braided Elizabeth's frills!

The strangest thing was when you looked at the pattern,
So strongly suggestive of milliners' bills,
In the rest of her dress, though by no means a slattern,
They shone round her person as rings do round Saturn,
You saw nothing else but Elizabeth's frills!

And once when I lay in the terrible stillness
The medico ordered with potions and pills,
With ice on my head, a most horrible chillness,
Came one consolation to lighten my illness,
The sight of the charming Elizabeth's frills!

And though you may say they are not quite the fashion,
Their beauty all thought of discarding them kills;
They shine on my love and they heighten my passion,
I'd stake all my money, though that might be rash, on My lovely Elizabeth's sweet little frills!

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Vol. I.—No. 58.]

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 5, 1868.

[SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS.
$4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.]

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

Street and House Dresses.

Fig. 1.—Dress with double skirt of steel-blue serge, trimmed with velvet, bias folds, and fringe of the same color. Tight-fitting paletot of the same color, looped behind with a bow and ends. A simulated scarf, trimmed with a band of black velvet and bias folds set on in points, with deep silk fringe across the ends, is arranged on the front of the paletot. Bonnet of black velvet and satin, trimmed with brown leaves and black lace. Coiffure of long curls.

Fig. 2.—Dress of gray poplin. The trimming consists of bias folds and rosettes of gray satin and fine cord of the same color, and simulates a tunic, closing diagonally in front. High corsage and plain sleeves. Linen collar and cuffs. Hair waved in front, with long curls behind the ear.

Fig. 3.—Short dress and paletot of bear's-ear cashmere, richly trimmed with velvet, silk cord, and buttons of the same color. The under-skirt is trimmed round the bottom with bands of bear's-ear satin and velvet. Velvet beret of the same color, trimmed with satin folds and an aigrette.

Fig. 4.—Short dress of black silk, cut in points and scallops round the bottom, and trimmed with ruffles and bias folds of the same material and black fringe.

TOWEL RACK.

Long under-skirt of violet satin. Black velvet paletot, trimmed with satin folds and fringe. Large passementerie buttons and silk tassels are set on the bottom of the over-skirt and paletot. Violet velvet bonnet, trimmed with satin ribbon of the same color and a spray of roses with leaves.

Fig. 5.—Dress and scarf mantilla of brown reps, trimmed with satin folds and fringe. Deep flounce surmounted with two straight bias folds of satin, and satin piping set on in points, around the bottom of the dress. Over-skirt of the same material, trimmed round the bottom with fringe. Brown velvet round hat, with aigrette.

Towel Rack.

THIS towel rack is of carved oak. In the central medallion put a looking-glass, and in the little side medallions embroidery. Either of the medallion designs, p. 916, is suitable for the little medallions. They are worked with beads on canvas in the colors which the illustrations designate; or may be worked in wool or silk instead of beads. The medallions are fastened on pasteboard and set into the frame, and brown paper is pasted on the back. The towel rack is designed to be hung up against a wall.

NIGHT.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

WHETHER I hang o'er wintry fields stretched stark
In ceremonies of white silence, whose repose
Is girt by forests that across the dark
Shoot with a sudden sway from their bronze boughs
The sifted silver of a thousand snows,
Making more awful quiet; or I rouse
Fierce polar summits to hurl back
The flying shafts of flinty foes,
And, couchant, flash in hasty ire
With crusted mail and icy sheaths entire
A storm of splendor underneath my blows—
Oh, slowly up the windy way I beat,
The glory dips, the fires eclipse,
The angry sparkle makes retreat—
Ruby the cliffs that melt to fairest rose,
By sapphire heavens darkly kissed,
And cloven crags splinter from base to spire
Beryl and amethyst,
At many a tempest-graven dint and hack
Bickering and glancing to my slow attack—
Yet shrouded into phantoms as my track
Leaves the wide air a shadow!
Whether o'er these I sail, or where I list,
Whether o'er mountain-top or spongy meadow,
Neither rebellion nor antagonist
Find I, that by my first breath blanched
Through sullen flashes,
Falls not as utterly involved and quenched
And self-consumed to ashes—
Leaving the universe before me
Till, boding ruin every where,
Crystalline beakers of a foreign glory
Spill in the upper fountains of the air.
Then, mounted high midst ever-deepening concaves,
In golden showers the outer darkness staining,
O'er the slant edges of the rolling world
I see the sunbeams raining!

DESCRIPTION OF

COLORED FASHION PLATE,

ACCOMPANYING THIS NUMBER FOR DEC. 5, 1868.

To be followed by others in quick succession.

Fig. 1.—Under-skirt of yellow and white striped foulard, with a flounce set on somewhat scant, and surmounted by a pinked ruche of yellow silk. Diana over-dress of yellow reps, open in front, bordered all the way round with a frill of the same material, and looped up at the sides with a large bow. Corsage square in front, and trimmed with a frill and bow; sleeves almost tight, and edged with a frill. Pleated fichu inside the corsage.

Fig. 2.—Blue poplin dress for young girl, with mantelet of the same, trimmed with a silk ruche of the same shade, and confined by a belt.

Fig. 3.—Dress of violet velvet. Mantelet like the dress, trimmed with wide black lace. The tabs of the mantelet cross in front, and are fastened behind half-way down the skirt with a bow of Ottoman reps.

Our next Supplement Number will contain numerous patterns of Bridal Dresses, Veils, etc.; Walking Dresses, Chemisettes, Fichus, Cravats, Breakfast Caps, Crinolines, Paniers, Fancy Work, etc., etc.

MAKE YOUR WILL.

THERE seems to be a rather general feeling in some way to hasten his demise. Hence a great many excellent people who have property to leave, and very well-defined intentions as to whom to leave it, put off the necessary formalities till they are suddenly stricken down by death, and forced to let their effects be distributed by the hand of the law, perhaps in the manner most alien to their inclinations. Now, in point of fact, the tranquillity that comes from having one's affairs in order is above all things conducive to recovery; while the sick man, writhing under the consciousness of leaving them in an unsettled state, may by this very anxiety bring his illness to a fatal termination.

It is often affirmed that the law makes equitable provision for such an emergency. Were this so, no more need be said on the subject; or indeed we should rather be inclined to deprecate the interference of individual caprice with this just distribution. In some respects the assertion is correct. The law is just in setting aside all privilege of primogeniture or sex, and dividing the property equally among the children. Their interests at the father's death are properly cared for. But as regards the widow the injustice is obvious. As a rule, throughout the length and breadth of the country, a young man marries poor and grows rich with his wife, he as the bread-winner and she as the careful economist of his earnings. The estate which they accumulate is due to the efforts of both. Yet, if the wife dies, this common property passes unconditionally to the husband; he can squander the estate; disinherit the children; or marry again, and leave the whole to the children by the second marriage; the first wife's children not being supposed, in this case, to need any protection. If the husband dies, it is very different. The law instantly steps in and takes from the wife's hands the management of her own household; and she, who has been used to reign supreme in her home, is forced to apply to strangers for permission to take the slightest step with regard to her own property. How humiliating this must be to a high-spirited woman can be readily imagined by any man who will fancy in her place. Again, the use alone of one-third of the real estate is granted her. With the use of the whole estate during her lifetime she might end her days in ease and comfort, and lend a helping hand to her children in case of need. Or even with the full ownership of one-third of the property she might possibly put herself in a position to earn a comfortable support; but the pittance afforded by the interest on one-third of a homestead, for instance, is only a mockery, which leaves her dependent on the generosity of her children or friends—a position to which we are persuaded that no generous-minded man would willingly subject his wife. The consequence is that, among the masses, a woman who has always lived in competence immediately sinks, on her husband's death, to comparative penury and dependence. The pretext is that the interests of her children need protection; but who will say that these interests are not as safe with the mother as with the father, and that a possible step-father is to be dreaded more than a possible step-mother?

In the present state of the laws it is the duty of every husband to make a will that shall insure to the partner of his fortunes the life-enjoyment of their joint savings, and make her the honored benefactor of their children, instead of the humble recipient of their bounty, too often churlishly doled out to her by sons or daughters-in-law.

NEW MUSIC.

WE have received from WILLIAM HALL & SON, 543 Broadway, New York, the following new pieces of music, which we recommend to our readers:

"MARION LEE." Ballad composed by WILLIAM VINCENT WALLACE. Price 35 cents. This is one of those charming ballads of WALLACE's which are destined to become familiar in every parlor.

"SO FAR AWAY." Ballad by JANE SLOMAN TORRY, author of "La Primavera," "Estelle Valse," etc. Price 35 cents. A simple and easy ballad, somewhat after the style of REINHARDT's famous song, "Thou art so Near and yet so Far."

"THE OLD FRIENDS STILL." Song and chorus by CHARLES HENRY. Price 35 cents. Sung nightly by Mr. MONROE DEMPSTER, BRYANT'S Minstrels.

"TO MARY IN HEAVEN." Words by ROBERT BURNS; music by JOHN DANIELS. Price 35 cents. One of those sweet, plaintive ballads which go right to the heart.

"BESIDE THY GRAVE, MOTHER." Words by W. L. GARDNER; music by G. SOONOLA. Price 35 cents. Sung nightly, with great applause, by GEORGE JACKSON, of HOOLEY'S Minstrels.

"GENTLE SPRING." Nocturne by WILLIAM VINCENT WALLACE. Price 50 cents. This is one of WALLACE's best works. Bright, sparkling, and not difficult.

"BY THE SEA WAVES." Arranged by RICHARD HOFFMAN. Price $1. A brilliant and effective arrangement of that popular ballad, which we recommend to all good pianists.

"STUYVESANT GALOP." By PAUL STEINHAGEN. Introducing the comic song "Not for Joseph." Price 50 cents.

"CAPTAIN JENKS (of the Horse Marines)." Galop played by GRAFULA'S Seventh Regiment Band. Arranged by C. PUERNER. Price 50 cents.

These are two fine galops, well arranged for dancing.

WILLIAM HALL & SON will send any of the above pieces by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the marked prices.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

MY DEAR RALPH,—I hear that you are very anxious to see Bohemia. You have heard such pleasant praises of Bohemians that you will have no peace until you feel that you are one yourself. The very name has an attractive music, a suggestion of happy vagrancy, of a modern idyl. My friend Mr. Fry, who gives me this news of you, says that you would like to have a word from me of my own Bohemian experience—if I happen to have had any—in order that you may judge whether Bohemianism, if we may use a horrible word, is a desirable kind of manner upon the great road that we are all traveling.

Well, my dear boy, if I tell the truth, I suppose I must confess that I am, and always have been, a Bohemian. I hope not exactly a "Bohemian-Tartar;" but I have certainly loitered a great deal upon that "sea-coast in Bohemia" to which the poet alludes. And with what a merry company! Where was it? Every where. Do you mean to bring me to the cold fact of geography? Why, Wall Street, the Exchange itself, Fulton Market, the Campagna, the Baths of Caracalla, Amalfi, Capri, Salerno, yes, and further still, are Bohemia.

Upon any one of these soft, sad Indian summer mornings I come out of my room and set forth upon that meditative, sauntering pace which you have remarked often enough in gentlemen of my years. I breast the swift, steady current of the men of business sweeping resistlessly down town. They smile and nod—those that I know—and they say to each other "What an inveterate vagabond he is! why doesn't he do something?" And they press on to the Brokers' Board and "do something" in Erie, or Fort Wayne, or whatever the stock of the moment may be. To do that, you see, is not to be a vagabond. To hang round that door in Broad Street, to sit in a shop of some kind and sell for more than you pay, pleases the worthy gentlemen who are concerned for me. They pity me as I pass. Quits, gentlemen; I sail for Bohemia.

What a curious and pleasant voyage! These are children going to school, and how fresh and bright are their young faces! They scud along like a fleet of little smacks, upon whose white sails the sun flashes. How they cheer the great waste! Bon voyage, little smacks! And here, what is this? What a storm must have smitten this craft that seems even now to be staggering under its fury! The sails hang forlorn, the masts are sprung, the hull is shabby and battered. Poor woman—I mean poor ship—what a voyage you have had, and how hopeless you look! And is this Turner's Temeraire, this placid, stately vessel calmly gliding along and fitly framed in the pensive Indian summer morning? There are the credentials of famous days of action in this splendid old craft now laid up in ordinary and creeping about as if to sun itself and kindle its proud old memories a little. I suppose it is really a grave old gentleman who has lived wisely and fought his good fight, and who now floats along bravely toward the final haven.

And is it the Indian summer that bewitches every thing and makes a stroll in the busy streets a voyage to distant shores? No, my dear Ralph, it is the Bohemian spirit that possesses the mind and touches the eye and fancy of the dweller in that pleasant land. I have seen a little Italian boy with his heavy harp or his violin standing on a sunny spring morning before that window in which is the beautiful blooming oleander, and his face grew tender, and the roar of the street died out of his consciousness, and he was once more in Italy with the vineyards rising high over him, and the lazy Mediterranean lapping upon the shore below. People as they passed said, "What a pretty Italian boy!" But I smiled, for I knew that he was a Bohemian.

What is Bohemia? Why, it is Gipsy-land. Don't you know that all gipsies come from Bohemia? And did you suppose that they all encamp under a wagon upon the country roads at night, and do nothing but steal chickens, tinker old pots and pans, and tell Sir Roger de Coverley's fortune? Step down these steps with me into this rather dismal cellar. It has horrible little cells upon each side, with a fixed wooden table in the centre of each, and fixed wooden benches. It is all very dingy, and probably very dirty, and the gas is lighted, or ought to be, all day long. The table-cloths!—And there is a smeared mustard-jar and opaque oil and vinegar cruets. It smells, you observe, of stale oysters and yesterday's fried fat. Is this the lee of a wagon upon a country road? Yet this is Bohemia.

At least so I was told when I was there. Several persons came in, I remember, and seated themselves at the table. They were generally quite young, and there were two or three young women among them. They ate oysters or a chop or a beef-steak, and they drank a great deal of whisky, and puffed tremendous clouds of tobacco-smoke. The women drank also, and smoked. They all talked loud, and laughed a great deal. The talk was of theatres and books and papers, and of actors and authors. They cracked jokes—excellent, many of them—broad, a good many of them; and they praised each other, and laughed at a mutual admiration club somewhere. If I were to judge from the tone of venerable experience, and of utter exhaustion of all forms of life that revealed themselves in the conversation, there was not one of the jovial company who was less than three hundred years old. Such age and experience were very impressive. I stepped quietly to the host, who stood behind the trough opening oysters dextrously, and I asked him in a whisper whether these were boon companions of Rip Van Winkle recently arrived, or perhaps some of the Seven Sleepers lately awakened. The host did not pause in his sleight-of-hand, and rather contemptuously answered, "Them folks? Why, they are Bohemians."

Bohemians of the press I afterward heard them called, and my informant added, with quite as much contempt as the oyster opener, "They are fellows who live by their wits." Yes, replied I, with some fervor, and so, thank Heaven, was Shakespeare. I suppose it is quite as honorable to live by your own wits, dear Ralph, as by your grandfather's. Young Harry Diamond smiles very loftily at his old school-mate, Dick Whittington. "Dick lives by his wits," says Harry. My dear young friend, I reply, it is very fortunate for you that you are not thrown upon such a support. Indeed, it is true of all genuine Bohemians that they live as Harry's friend Dick lives. The gay life who comes from the camp to look at Sir Roger's hand, or the old swarthy witch who peers into the country girls' faces, or the hang-dog-looking rogue who offers to mend your kettles, or the hopeful young actress, or the newspaper critic, or Bé-ranger, or old Homer, or any other minstrel—all live by their wits. But how does the great merchant live, or the famous lawyer? Is it in any other way? To live by your wits, then, does not of itself make you a Bohemian. Dear me! why, there is my lord the Archbishop, and their lordships the Bishops, and the overworked minister of the Starve Hollow congregation, for whom there is to be a donation party next Tuesday to keep the poor man going—do they not all live by their wits, and do I hear you, my dear Ralph, or any other irreverent person call them Bohemians?

No, no, my dear boy, Bohemia is within you. The toughest old hunx of a Ralph Nickleby may have an estate there as well as Tom Hood; and you shall suddenly come upon its soft valleys and sunny heights in the most sumptuous retreat upon the North River as in the Broadway oyster-cellar. The resolute dissipation of the oyster-house is often only a sign of the thing, of longing for it, but not of its possession. To be a Bohemian, my good Ralph, it is not necessary to drink a great deal of whisky, and smoke endless pipes, and do other much more questionable things. It is not necessary to be unclean and gross and profane. The purest Bohemian I know is the simplest and most modest of men. He smokes his pipe, and he drinks his glass of Capri, or of Monte Pulciano, or of Lagrimi Christi, if he can get them; but he does not abuse those good gifts nor himself. He will not be an exhausted, wretched wight at fifty, but as genial and gay at sixty as he is at half that age.

Bohemia is loafer's land. It is the easy, happy realm of the artists and the poets, or rather of people of their temperament. For he certainly, although an artist, was not a Bohemian who rapped at thy door, Tomasino, thy door on the quattro piano in Rome—how many hundred years ago?—on that night, or, more truly, morning, when we sat drinking hot, spiced wine, and puffing heavy volumes of smoke, and trolling comic and sentimental staves—yet such as sister or sweet-heart might have heard. What a night it was! how gay, yes, and how innocent, and so long, long ago! It was one of those happy moments when we enjoy and know that we enjoy. It was the quattro piano, old friend, just below the stars. It was the garret, if it had been any where but Italy—but the garret of which Béranger sang, and of whose poem Father Prout made so delicious a paraphrase. Thackeray tried his hand at it also; but the passionate abandon of Father Prout wonderfully reproduces the song:

"Yes, 'twas a garret! be it known to all,
Here was Love's shrine;
There read, in charcoal traced along the wall,
Th' unfinished line.
* * * * *
Dreams of my joyful youth! I'd freely give,
Ere my life's close,
All the dull days I'm destined yet to live,
For one of those!
Where shall I now find raptures that were felt,
Joys that befell,
And hopes that dawned at twenty, when I dwelt
In attic cell?"

Well, well, my dear Ralph, I am as bad as the Antiquary taking Mr. Lovel to the blue chamber—or was it the green?—and losing himself in sentimental reveries. I was saying that, although an artist, the good man was not a Bohemian who rapped at our midnight or morning door, and, peering gravely through the smoke and the jollity at his young nephew, said, "Ezekiel, you had better come home." Ezekiel, who had not spared his talents for amusement, returned the grave salutation with a twinkling glance, and answered, "Uncle Ebenezer, all baggage at the risk of the owner." The door closed, and we saw Uncle Ebenezer no more.

Your Bohemian must, of course, have something of the natural vagabond in his nature, a genial temperament, a generous imagination. These are the qualities that send him sauntering through the Exchange when it is busiest, and he pleases himself with watching those eager, humming men, as with watching the breaking and foaming and slipping of waves upon the sea-shore. The world is his oyster—and is that the reason why he was called the oyster-house critic?

You see, my good Ralph, that a man can not make himself a Bohemian. Nature makes him. He may dive into cellars, and be beery and smoky and lazy and dirty, and live from hand to mouth; but such things are the trappings and suits, not the substance of what he seeks. Thackeray was a Bohemian; so was Paul Duggan. Yet how different they were! "He is the best drawer of heads since Vandyc, but not a Bohemian," wrote Thackeray, introducing a friend. Remember it is not the beer and swagger—it is the brains and the heart that make the Bohemian. And so, dear Ralph, good-by. Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

DRESS GOODS FOR MOURNING.

IMPERIAL serge is taking the place of bombazine for handsome street suits worn in deep mourning. This is the same material as bombazine, a mixture of silk and wool, but with better body and more distinct twill, and is as soft and full to the touch as Thibet merino. It is slightly more than a yard wide, worth from $2 75 to $3. At one house it is quoted as high as $4. The coarser English serge, all wool with a very broad twill, is durable and lustreless, and makes a serviceable winter suit for traveling and shopping. The price is from $1 a yard to $2. It should be trimmed with the wide serge braid, sometimes called Hercules braid.

Biarritz cloth, an all-wool fabric resembling corded delaine, is even more desirable than serge for street wear, as the straight longitudinal cords are more readily cleaned than a bias twill. $2 a yard buys a handsome article, about forty inches wide. The well-known Empress cloths, a good heavy quality at $1 50 a yard, and the thick poplin alpaca with demi-lustre at $1 a yard, are the best goods for ordinary street suits.

Henrietta cloth, which is really a silk-warped cashmere, retains its dead black color as long as a thread of it remains. It makes a more elegant house dress than bombazine, and costs from $2 to $3 a yard. Ladies who retain their partiality for bombazine are reminded that the English bombazine will give greater satisfaction in wearing than the light, frail fabric made by the French. English bombazine costs from $2 to $3 a yard. Lupin's is the best French brand. Black cashmere with double twill is in demand for both house and street dresses. The glossy alpaca are not considered suitable for mourning, but a demi-lustre alpaca of firm texture will be found serviceable and inexpensive for house dresses. It costs from fifty cents to eighty-five cents a yard. A variety of velours and ottoman reps are shown, but are generally too lustrous. Only the woolen reps is suitable for deep mourning.

The Bonnet and Pousons silks with half lustre are serviceable for mourning silks, but should be worn only in the house. A gros grain with but little gloss and of excellent quality is sold in the three-quarter width for $4 a yard. The lustreless faille and the cashmere de soie with thicker threads than gros grain are the richest materials for full dress. $5 to $10 a yard is the price. Heavy, dowager-like Antwerp silk falling into rich folds has a broad reps, and is marked $10 for yard wide goods, and $18 for a rare article a yard and a half wide. A thick silk for younger ladies in slight mourning has a satin stripe two inches wide.

HALF-MOURNING.

Dresses of solid purple and gray are not now used for half-mourning. The black materials mentioned are chosen, and are also trimmed with black—not crape or plain folds, as in deep mourning, but pleated frills, quillings, and ruffles of thick silk. A purple bow at the throat and the trimming of the hat is the only color introduced. In suits the petticoat is sometimes of purple, and the kid gloves are stitched with the same shade.

CLOAKS AND SUITS.

Paletots of the different Astrakhan furs, trimmed with Angora fringe, make the handsomest cloaks for mourning. Astrakhan cloth is also greatly used. It is from $9 to $20 a yard. The dead black beaver cloths are made into half-fitted basquines, with cape and belt, trimmed with bands of silk, or bordered with Astrakhan.

Serge and Biarritz cloth suits are heavily lined or wadded, and the outer garment is used as a cloak with other dresses. The pelisse is worn with a belt and small cape. The trimming is several narrow folds overlapping each other. Five folds, each an inch wide, in a cluster, headed with piping, trim the skirt; three folds the cape and pelisse. Puffs, paniers, and gathered ruffles are incongruous with mourning attire, as they look gay and dressy. Pleated trimmings and festooned drapery are more in keeping, such as box-pleated ruffles and flounces, and small capes looped with rosettes, and the Camargo looped upper skirt over a petticoat bordered with a pleated flounce. Arrange the flounce in groups of box-pleats, three in a cluster. It should be bound at the lower edge, and headed with a pleated ruche of the same, or a bias band two inches wide. The Camargo upper skirt has six breadths; the side-widths are narrow and gored. The skirt is quite long and caught up in pleats at the sides and back. Heavy worsted fringes and the serge braid, so strong that it is called Hercules braid, are used for plain suits. Crape quillings are soon destroyed. The material of the dresses is the best trimming for handsome suits. With the addition of an Astrakhan collar and muff, a flannel-lined suit can be worn all winter. $30 buys a good set of black fur trimmed with Angora fringe.

Thibet merino and Cashmere long shawls are worn in the burnous style, a fold arranged in the back, and the long end thrown over the left shoulder.

BONNETS AND VEILS.

English crape doubled over a high frame, with a pleated crape diadem, is the favorite bonnet for winter. Bombazine is not used as it is too heavy. Narrow ribbons tie under the chin, and long crape folds are left hanging in front, caught together by a bow or a slip-knot. The white ruche of tarlatan is only worn by widows. It extends merely across the forehead in the diadem style. White tarlatan bows at the throat are not used. The veil of English crape is worn, tied over the bonnet. It is usually a yard and a half long, but the length is varied according to the degree of relationship.

COLLARS AND HANDKERCHIEFS.

Standing collars with wide lapped ends are the best for mourning, as the corsage is usually made high and close. The two-inch hem of cambric handkerchiefs is deep black, a better style than a border above them. Jet and onyx jewelry is in massive styles, like cameos and coral. The watch-chain should also be of jet.

VARIETIES.

Scotch plaid gauze for evening dress is among the novelties worn abroad. Colibri velvets of the changing hues of the humming-bird are seen in Paris.

For the work-table we have seen very pretty shears and scissors, edged with the finest steel, with silvered handles. In this connection a convenient scissors sharpener is worthy of mention, composed of a small circular steel by which a lady can easily sharpen her own scissors.

Numerous inquiries on the subject of house-furnishing induce us to give some brief hints on the prevailing styles.

DRAWING-ROOM FURNITURE.

Furniture for drawing-rooms is copied from the Louis Seize period. This differs from the Pompadour style in heavy, broad, straight sofas, and chairs with low square backs, stuffed and tufted throughout, the wood of the frame visible only at the feet. Gilded wood is greatly used. The most showy suits are of gilt or white-wood covered with satin of a solid color, such as pale blue, light green, or fawn color. The cherry-colored satin is found to be most generally becoming. Pear-wood stained to represent ebony is combined with gilt, throwing it into bold relief. Tasteful designers deplore the elaborate use of gilt, and only commend it when associated with other woods. It has always a tawdry look, and is soon tarnished. The fashion will not be a permanent one.

Satin and the terry reps thickly tufted are used for upholstery. Brocatel is entirely out of fashion. The beautiful tapestries are in better keeping with the Louis Quinze styles, but have never been properly appreciated in this country.

An elegant drawing-room lately furnished has a moquette carpet, pearl-color strewn with garlands of flowers. The furniture is upholstered with light blue satin, tufted and edged with a tri-colored cord, cherry, blue, and drab. Curtains of the same satin with a tapestry border in which these three colors enter. Lace shades beneath. The long marquise sofa consists of a French confidante, or sofa for two, with marquise arm-chairs attached to the ends. Various shaped satin chairs are about the room, and upright reception-chairs of all gilt in bamboo pattern.

Ebony cabinets are low and flat-topped, and are inlaid with marquetry of the Algerian Tuva wood, the purple amaranth and gilt. The cover is of the colored Spanish marble brought from the Pyrenees. A cabinet of fancy woods, an inlaid table, or a writing-desk in a boudoir afford a pretty relief to rooms furnished with plain woods.

Faience, a clay material with raised figures, is being introduced for medallions, ornaments in furniture, vases and jardinières. The designs are antique, the colors deep and strong, somewhat resembling majolica. A valuable piece shown us is a large vase from the French Exposition. It is tan-colored, with raised flowers in natural hues. The price is $200.

Parlor suits of solid black walnut, upholstered with wool reps are the best choice for people of moderate means. These are made up in as good style as the most expensive material, but in less elaborate design. Plush is being used again by economical families who have sitting-room and parlor in one. It wears well, and is not expensive. A handsome suit of drab reps has a wide stripe of scarlet plush in the centre of each piece. The narrow frames of mantle-mirrors are covered with scarlet plush edged with gilt and ebony.

LIBRARIES.

The library admits of a more severe style of fitting up than other rooms. Waxed walnut-wood upholstered with woolen reps with velvet border studded with steel is the prescribed furniture. Curtains of the same reps with walnut cornices. Low book-cases with glass doors. A long centre-table covered with a cloth to match the furniture and bordered with morocco. Carved walnut mantle and mirror-frame. Low clock of richly-carved wood on the mantle. The Holland carpets and rugs thickly tufted are shown for libraries. They are in small, eccentric figures, and are expensive but durable. $11 for the square yard is the price.

DINING-ROOM.

The dining-room should be a cheerful apartment, filled with light but substantial furniture. Butternut-wood with ebony bands is coming into favor for dining-rooms, but the present demand is for light oiled walnut upholstered with tan-colored leather dotted with gilt. Scarlet leather is also used. Green is out of fashion. The low, broad mantle is of carved wood, supporting a large mirror, or else an oil-painting, framed with the prevailing wood with narrow gilt moulding. The walls are hung with embossed paper resembling the pale Russian leather in Renaissance designs. High buffet with dark marble top, and a carved wood or bronze medallion ornament. Striped reps in tapestry patterns for curtains, or plain reps with tapestry border. An open side-table for the carver has shelves underneath for dishes.

BEDROOM FURNITURE.

Instead of the light styles of bedroom furniture quoted in the spring suits of dark rose-wood and black walnut are now selected, with a view to giving an air of warmth and comfort to the room. Ebony mouldings and delicate gilt tracery ornament these suits. A curious-grained French walnut decorates the American walnut. Walnut shows wear less than any wood. We were shown elaborate chamber suits costing from $800 to $2000. A manufacturer informs us that he has in process of making bedroom sets of ten pieces, solid walnut, plate glass, and three marble-top pieces, the chairs with cane seats, which he can sell at the low price of $125 the suit. At another house, one of the best in the city, we saw an order executed that provides nearly all the furniture in a small house for $1800, a sum often given for a chamber suit. All the materials, wood, glass, and marble, are of as good quality as is used in the most elaborate styles. The parlor is furnished with black walnut upholstered with crimson reps. Mantle and mirror-frame in keeping with the furniture, and an inlaid cabinet. Waxed walnut and brown reps in the library with mantle and clock. Full dining-room suit of oiled walnut upholstered and studded with gilt nails. Lisbon marble slab on the buffet. Carved mantle. The bedroom furniture is simple and light, but tasteful and substantial. Purchasers make a great mistake in buying furniture at the "cheap" establishments. The best manufacturers pay as much attention to details in their low-priced wares as in the most costly.

A desirable article for people who live in small rooms is a new sofa bed. In the daytime it forms a handsome and comfortable sofa with stuffed back, and ornamental wood at the sides. At night it is easily unhinged, forming a double lounge. A receptacle for bed-clothing is beneath. It is shown in walnut and reps at prices varying from $45 to $65. Elastic sponge is being used for stuffing mattresses and furniture. It is as elastic and springy as the best horse hair, than which it is cheaper, and is said to be destructive to vermin of all kinds. The best spring mattresses are divided in the centre so that they can be easily moved, and are provided with a double set of springs. Price $30. Pillows retain the flat, square, French shape.

Arctic down quilts, made up in Turkish calico, are exceedingly light and soft and warm for invalids. Price $18. Handsome comfortables at $65 are made of silk wadded with eider down.

For boudoirs a pretty fancy in imitation of the Venetian is a beveled mirror with glass frame in a solid sheet. The frame is carved and engraved with light tracery.

A convenient secretary bedstead, lately patented, has the appearance of a handsome secretary in the daytime, and is easily transformed into a bed at night. There is a large mirror, three drawers, cupboard room, and an arrangement for a wash-stand. Price $100.

Among the easy-chairs is the comfortable Spanish rocker, fitting snugly to the back, with cushioned arms. It is sold in green reps and walnut for $25. A reclining chair, that almost serves for a bed, has a striped tapestry centre, with plain reps at the sides. A sensible gift for the holidays is a chair of this kind, with the centre stripe embroidered by the donor. The needle-worked stripe should be from a yard and a half to three-fourths of a yard long, and six or eight inches wide. A folding chair, that may be put away in a small space in a corner, has a plush stripe in the centre.

HALL FURNITURE.

Hall chairs and sofa are covered with scarlet leather and tan-color, slightly gilded. Hat-stands have large mirrors in the centre, with pegs at the side for hats. A colored marble slab is over a drawer for brushes. Bronzed metal racks for umbrellas. A pretty idea for a hall is a square rustic frame with pegs for holding canes.

CURTAINS.

The new style for drawing-room curtains is a lace window-shade attached to rings drawn over rods by pulleys which gather the shade to the side instead of the top of windows. Tamboured muslin and dotted Swiss shades have monograms embroidered in the centre. The elegant terry reps, satin, and striped tapestries, are used for lambrequins and side draperies, trimmed with thick cords and bands of velvet, with large tassels. White linen shades, with spring rollers like those used for carriage curtains, are selected for plain rooms. Smyrna silk in chintz patterns is shown for bedroom windows. The wall-paper is of exactly the same pattern, and the furniture is upholstered with French chintz.

PERSONAL.

THE new "Lady of the White House" will probably prove one of the most popular that has ever occupied that position. Like her husband, she is not conspicuous for flummery or nonsense. There will be no attempt to ape the grandeur of a regal court, and no vulgar striving after mere sensation. Mrs. GRANT is a lady who has maintained, through every event which has marked the vicissitudes of her husband's life, an admirable demeanor. She was his helpmeet in days of adversity, and has shared his honors without being dazzled by the brilliancy of his new position.

—MR. MOTLEY, the historian, whose name is mentioned in connection with a position in the Cabinet of General GRANT, is of about the average height, spare, wiry, with a good head, dark hair, full beard and mustache widely sprinkled with gray, has a clear voice and muscular utterance.

—HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN, the Danish novelist, is a bachelor, with great talent for roving about. He is as often heard of in Spain, France, Holland, or Switzerland as in Copenhagen; is a great favorite at courts, but still more a favorite with the people on account of the kindly, humanizing spirit of his novels.

—PROFESSOR GOLDWIN SMITH has arrived at Ithaca, New York, to enter upon his duties as Professor in Cornell University. A slight change that from a professional chair in the oldest university in England to a similar position in that of the youngest university in the United States! But, then, he only comes under a contract for five years, during which time he proposes to gather material out of which to manufacture a great historical work.

—It has been figured up that the aggregate of money given to public institutions by Mr. PRABODY reaches the reputable figure of $6,135,000.

—Boston enjoyed a rare dramatic treat a few evenings since, on the occasion of the appearance of EDWIN BOOTH and FANNY JANAUSCHEK in Macbeth. BOOTH was superb; JANAUSCHEK equally so. Both were frequently called before the curtain. JANAUSCHEK spoke throughout in German; but such was the power of her facial expression and the force of her gesticulation that the meaning of her utterances was almost as comprehensive as if given in English.

—MISS HOUSTON, a prominent church vocalist in Boston, has been offered $2500 per annum to go to Chicago and sing in the Unitarian Church at which the Rev. ROBERT COLLIER is pastor. This is the largest sacred music call yet made in this country; and the young woman hesitates about accepting it.

—MR. GEORGE W. CHILDS, of the Philadelphia Ledger, has arrived in London, and is the guest of Mr. WALTER, principal proprietor of the London Times. He is to be entertained by CHARLES DICKENS and GEORGE PRABODY; and, for that matter, he will be proffered entertainment by pretty nearly every clever man of the Old World who has ever visited Philadelphia.

—Mlle. LUCCA, one of the reigning queens of Opera in Europe, is married to a Prussian lieutenant, a clever fellow, who has nothing besides his baronial title. He worships his wife, and she is much attached to him. They have three children. HORTENSE SCHNEIDER, another operatic celebrity, is married to a music teacher of Limoges, though she does not live with him. A son of hers received recently a prize at the College of St. Barbe, and HORTENSE, who was present on the occasion, was so elated that she embraced the youngster in the presence of the whole assemblage.

—It is said that one of the occupations of the Empress of Austria is the cutting out silhouettes from black paper. She can produce the likeness of any person who sits to her in two or three minutes. The Emperor has had a hundred or more of these trifles handsomely framed and hung in his private sitting-room.

—THE Rev. DR. STEVENS, the able historian of Methodism, is said to be engaged on a "History of Mahomet—his Religion and Followers."

—LOUIS NAPOLEON, notwithstanding his royal salary, and the facilities he has for making a good thing out of "governments," is not at all wealthy. Beyond a few houses and lots in England he hasn't much. The Empress, though reported very rich at the time of her marriage, was only moderately wealthy, and what with her spendthrift habits, and the expenses connected with her exalted position, has managed to incur more debts than she can pay, unless she curtails her expenses by two-thirds, which she will never do. One of her Spanish estates was sold as far back as 1862, and the other, which can not be sold under the laws of Spain, is heavily mortgaged—one of the bad debts of the Credit Mobilier. The story of her having effected an insurance on her life with a London company for a high sum was a canard. The Prince Imperial has had a large income, of which a very handsome sum might have been saved but for the continued embarrassments of the civil lists which have swallowed up its surplus.

—Is there any enterprising young person in New England who would like to employ a portion of the winter in the "Sunny South," by accepting the following proposition of the Columbia (South Carolina) Phoenix, which, being in want of funds, thus advertises: "Wanted, at this office, an able-bodied, hard-featured, bad-tempered, not to be put off and not to be backed down, freckle-faced young man, to collect for this paper; must furnish his own horse, saddle-bags, pistols, whisky, bowie-knife, and cow-hide. We will furnish the accounts. To such we promise constant and laborious employment."

—THE new Bishop of Nevada, Dr. O. W. WHITTAKER, is a native of New Salem, Massachusetts, a graduate of Amherst, and for some four or five years taught the High School at North Brookfield. Like several of the newly-elected bishops of the Episcopal Church, he was not chosen so much for his powers of pulpit oratory as for practical good sense, industry, and general adaptability for the office. Bishops are coming to be regarded less and less as an honorable and ornamental order in the Church, and more and more as men charged with great responsibilities requiring especially a good head, a good constitution, and a talent for labor.

—THE present EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA is one of the few living potentates who when quite young grieved at the thought of becoming a great ruler. In 1848, when his mother, the Archduchess SOPHIA, told him he was to ascend the throne, he was a gawky lad, and so displeased with the prospect that he wept copiously, and downright coercion had to be resorted to in order to obtain his consent. He was afraid that his life would be in danger in case he should become the successor of his gifted and bright uncle the Emperor FERDINAND.

—A London lady—Mrs. INGRAHAM—is proprietor of two of the best newspaper properties in England—the Illustrated London News and the Illustrated London Times. She signs all the checks, and keeps the general run of things in both establishments.

—MR. D. L. MOODY, of Chicago, has a way of blurring out his sentiments at prayer-meetings. Not long since, at one of those meetings, some one rose and stated that the Erring Women's Refuge, in that city, was in great need, and asked the prayers of the congregation in its behalf. One of Chicago's richest men, who is said to be somewhat minute in his contributions to benevolent objects, volunteered at once to lead the meeting in a prayer in behalf of the institution named. He had scarcely closed when Mr. D. L. MOODY got to his feet and said that it was wrong for us to ask God to do what he had given us the power to do ourselves. "The idea," said he, "of a man who can draw a check for one hundred thousand dollars, asking God to give money to the Erring Women's Refuge is preposterous! Let him give it himself."

—SIMEON BENJAMIN, of Elmira, has been doing notably good works for various charitable institutions. He has given $30,000 to the Presbyterian House of Philadelphia, for home and foreign missions; to Elmira Female College, in addition to his former gifts, $25,000; to Hamilton College, $20,000; to Auburn Theological Seminary, $10,000; to the Orphans' Home of Elmira, $2000. Mr. BENJAMIN had previously given to Elmira Female College the sum of $55,000, and the $25,000 contained in his will makes a sum total to that institution of $80,000.

—HENRI ROCHEFORT, now so famous among the wits and writers of the world, has had the misfortune to lose his wife, to whom he was devotedly attached. He is the father of two children of rare talents and beauty, and is said to be as affectionate and tender in domestic life as he is audacious and terrible in public.

GENERAL REMARKS ON KNITTING AND CROCHET WORK.

A FEW words may be useful with regard to the widening and narrowing in Tunisian or Afghan crochet stitch and its varieties. The widening is done in several ways. In the middle of a pattern row it is best to widen by taking up in the first round a loop out of the horizontal chain stitch row between two perpendicular stitches. This method of widening may also be used on the outer edge. The edges may be widened one or two stitches also as follows: Having completed the first round of the pattern row, crochet one or two chain, then cast off, and in the following pattern row take one or two stitches out of this chain. If it becomes necessary to widen several stitches on each side of the work, on the wrong side make the foundation as many stitches longer as it is desired wider, and on the right side crochet, after having completed the second round of a pattern row, as many chain as it must be stitches wider. In the 1st pattern row the foundation stitches designed for the widening remain unnoticed on the wrong side; in the following pattern rows take the widening stitches out of the chain on the right and out of the foundation stitches on the left side of the work. The narrowing is done in two ways: either take only one loop out of two contiguous perpendicular stitches in the first round of a pattern row, or in the second round of the pattern row work off together two such stitches, when, of course, in the next row only one loop must be taken out of the two stitches worked as one. The first method of narrowing is especially to be recommended.

In general it will be considered unnecessary to repeat * always signifies that the work must be repeated from that point to the next period. Lastly, always stretch the finished work on the patterns and moisten it with a damp sponge in order to give the edges the right shape.

Different Crochet and Knitting Stitches.

THE greater number of these stitches are variations of the ordinary Tunisian or Afghan stitch.

ner that one stitch of the foundation appears in wave stitch and the next in Tunisian, while the thread must be spliced on anew for every round.

The wave crochet stitch differs from the Tunisian stitch by putting the needle in every first round of a pattern row behind the parallel row of stitches through the perpendicular stitches, by which means the parallel stand out in relief on the right side. At the beginning of the work crochet, however, one round in Tunisian stitch.

Fig. 1. KNITTING CROCHET STITCH.—For working this stitch collect on the needle the veins of the stitches of the first round of every pattern row in the same manner as for Tunisian crochet stitch. In the second round of a pattern row, however, do not work the stitches singly off the needle, but cut the thread off of the length of the row of stitches, draw it through all the stitches on the needle at once, and wind the end of the thread around the needle. In beginning a new pattern row tie the thread on again. In the first round of the following pattern row always, in taking up the stitches, put the needle through the stitch above the thread.

Fig. 2.—The WHEAT CROCHET STITCH is worked like Fig. 1, but the stitches out of which the loops are taken must be twisted in the manner shown by the illustration, and the needle be put under the thread which was drawn through.

Fig. 3. MOSS CROCHET STITCH.—This stitch is worked of wool in two different colors. For taking up the stitches use the light, and for working off the dark wool. Work, also, every first round of a pattern row in such a manner that one stitch of the foundation appears in wave stitch and the next in Tunisian, while the thread must be spliced on anew for every round.

Fig. 4 is the COILED CROCHET STITCH.—On a foundation crochet first 1 dc., and wind the needle six times with the working thread as for a ltc., take a loop out of the next foundation stitch on the needle by drawing the thread through once, throw the thread around the needle, and draw it through the last loop, through all the threads wound around the needle, and through the first loop on the needle, after which crochet 1 ch., passing over a foundation stitch. In every round crochet this figure in the ch. stitch between every two figures of the former round.

Fig. 5. LOOPED CROCHET STITCH.—Work this stitch in sc., always on one side and over a round fringe mesh half an inch in diameter, as follows: On a foundation of requisite length crochet as 1st round.—First 1 sc., then lay the fringe mesh behind the thread and needle, * put the needle through the following stitch of the foundation, wind the thread once around the needle and mesh, put the thread again over the mesh, put the needle around the thread as shown by the arrow, and crochet 1 sc. Work the following rounds in the same manner. The under side is the right side.

THE BLIND BEGGAR.

THERE he sat alone, quite alone, a man young in years, himself a most beautiful creation of the Great Artist's hand, the mellowed rays of the summer evening sun falling on the drooping form and dark Italian face, with its broad, imaginative brow, and deep, somewhat melancholy eyes. Suddenly he rose up to his full height.

"Strange, how that poem is in my head now; it is true:

'That is best which lieth nearest,
Shape from this thy work of art.'

Is the gift departed that I can create no face to-day that pleases me, that can approach my ideal? Has my right hand lost its cunning, when one rare gem of art will place fame at my feet? I will leave this place and return to my own land again for a while, to Firenze, the city of Michael Angelo. One more glance round and then Guido Sfonza takes wing.

But at the door the artist turned back, took up his sketch-book and pencil, and went out.

The vesper bells had just ceased ringing, and the quaint, picturesque old Flemish town was very quiet; even the market-place was almost deserted. There Guido Sfonza paused, and shading his eyes with his slender hand from the bright rays of the sinking sun, looked around.

The tall, quaint, old gabled houses were familiar objects; he had sat down on this very spot last market-day and sketched the busy scene; equally familiar was the picturesque gray old church of the Augustines, which, with the monastery, formed the southern boundary of the market-place; yet, familiar as it was, it was so picturesque, with its deep porch and graceful arch, so harmonious in all its proportions, that the painter's artist-eye could not turn from it, the more that, as he looked, he saw a picture which the back-ground and marked light and shade made perfect. Guido Sfonza sat down on the step of the ancient sun-dial near him, and gazed in rapt artistic delight. He had found an ideal—a living picture. Partially within the shelter of the church porch stood an old man, dressed in a long dark gown, not unlike a Jewish gaberdine; his head was bare, and the soft evening breeze timidly lifted his long white hair and beard, so white that where the sunbeams touched it, it shone like silver. He was old, his face was deeply lined, but neither age, sorrow, nor suffering could rob that fine face and grand head of their beauty. Nature's chisel had carved her work too well for aught to mar her handiwork. Time might steal away the charm of youth, care might draw her heaviest lines, but still—

"The mind, the music breathing o'er that face,
The heart whose softness harmonized the whole," remained untouched; even the very straining, almost agonized, upward look of the blind—for he was blind—as if the sightless eye-balls still strained yearningly after the lost sight, only gave to that countenance a yet more touching interest. One hand, wrinkled now with age but still finely formed, held his hat for such charity as the passers-by might give, and on its brim rested a black cross and rosary, held between his fingers; the other hand of the blind beggar rested on the shoulder of his companion and guide, a girl, nay, almost a child, scarcely over thirteen years—and well might the young artist start at such strange and wonderful beauty. The face was of the most perfect oval, exquisitely soft in its outlines and shading; the brow broad, full, not high, imaginative, and rather marked by its purity and sentiment than for any unusual powers of intellect; the delicate mouth, the large melancholy dark eyes, the patient, sorrowful brow, were full of a sweet and gentle resignation that gave to her very attitude a singular and indescribable charm: neither could have been born to the position in which they appeared; and, with the girl especially, there was under all the patient resignation a proud suffering endurance that touched the artist even more than her youth and beauty. What wonder that the painter gazed long on the old man and the child, printing off every line, every shade and color, indelibly on his mind, and then opening his sketch-book rapidly, and with the skill of true genius, transferred the picture to his paper!

The few passers-by took little notice of the young Italian; artists often came to their town, often sketched the halle, still oftener the old church of the Augustine Monastery; so it was nothing new to the good townfolk, who were rather flattered than otherwise. One handsome peasant woman was vain or curious enough to pause and ask—Monsieur finds the church beautiful, n'est-ce pas? The handsome Italian face was lifted with a bright smile, and showed the white teeth as he answered, "C'est vrai, madame, mais regardez ces deux mendiants. Who are they?"

"Ah, monsieur, nobody knows," the woman answered, shaking her head till her long ear-drops tinkled again; "they were first seen in that porch a short while ago: pauvre vieillard, he is blind. Ah, it is a terrible misfortune!"

"So terrible," said the artist, more to himself than her, "that I had rather die than live in blindness."

The woman smiled as she looked on the speaker's dark magnificent eyes.

"Assurément, madame la Sainte Vierge will spare monsieur," she said, as she passed on with a cheery bonsoir.

The artist worked at his sketch, and the time fled so quickly that the fading light first made him notice that evening was creeping on apace, swayed, with inexpressible love and tenderness: "Do not think of me, mon bon père; do not grieve; God will take care of me."

"Ah, chérie, but the heart will sorrow, and the brain think; and I am in darkness, bearing a weight of years and afflictions. Oh, child, learn by me how God punishes man's pride! He has brought down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. Come now, Agathe; the sun has set, and it grows chill, my darling."

Guido Sfonza drew back as the wanderers left the church and stole away.

Who and what were they?—what was the romance of those two lives? Agathe! the name dwelt on his ear like music; it was the very name for her; they would surely be in that porch again on the morrow, and then he would speak to them. Meanwhile he would at once begin transferring his picture to canvas; the vivid imagination had carried away every detail of form and shade and coloring, which the sketch of course lacked. All the next day the young artist worked, full of renewed hope and energy; but when the church

Sfonza;" but though there were many larger, there was always a little crowd before it. Yes, though it was neither very large nor brilliant in coloring, though it was of quite moderate size, in a plain black frame sheltered by a glass, though the coloring was so exquisitely soft and subdued: enfin, though the picture was so very beautiful, it was unmistakably the lion of the exhibition. The painter's fame was established and his name lifted high; he might too have become the fashion, for his birth was as noble as his genius was elevated; but he was too wise and too ambitious for himself, and above all for his art. Now in his ripe manhood was the time to labor and to work.

Did the picture go back to its owner's studio, then? No; the committee of the National Gallery, entering the lists with several other competitors, outbid them all, and, paying a high price for the painting, placed it among the national collections, where the humblest might freely see it.

Little wotted any one that soon in the painter's studio there hung another portrait, for which he would not have taken its weight in gold; still less could they have guessed that, when he once more left Italy it was to wander from city to city, in a half romantic, half acknowledged search of the original, whose name, Agathe, his hand had traced beneath her portrait.

Once, and once only, the artist found a trace, a sad one, for it led no further, and ended where it began—in a grave.

Wandering one bright day into a little church-yard on the outskirts of Brussels, he sat down to rest a while on a humble grave, marked only by a cross at its head; it bore no date, or if there was one it was placed where it needed some search to find it. One foot of the little cross bore only a name and a Latin inscription:

"Louis-Charles de Rohan."
Quem Deus amat castigat.

"What story lies buried there, that so noble a name is found on this quiet grave?" murmured the artist, half aloud.

"Ah, mon fils, a sad one—a sad story," said a gentle voice. The painter looked up and instantly rose, reverently doffing his hat, as he saw that the speaker was not only an old man, but a priest. "It is nigh twelve months since my hands administered the last sacrament to him whose body sleeps beneath this earth. God rest his soul, for his had been indeed a life, long and laden with sorrows."

"You knew him, then, holy father?" said Guido; and as the old man sat down on the grave the younger threw himself on the grass at his feet.

"No, my son; not as you mean. I never saw him until three days before his death, when his grandchild fetched me to him. What was he? Hélas! you see that proud name! yet when I followed that child, I found a poor blind old beggar dying in an empty granary near my cottage."

The artist started so visibly that the priest must have noticed him save that tears blinded his eyes. He wiped them away and went on:

"I assisted him to my own cottage—for was he not a wayfarer in want and suffering?" said the good old man; "and there in three days he died, his only anxiety his grandchild's fate. He told me his story, and pardon me if I am abrupt, for it is sad and painful. He was a proud Rohan, a lad, when his parents lost their lives in the French Revolution. Louis-Charles escaped into Italy, where he afterward married an Italian lady, by whom he had four children. All died in youth but one son; the mother also died broken-hearted, and Louis-Charles plunged deeper still into politics, even venturing back to France. He was taken and imprisoned for five years, when, old man as he then was, he escaped back to Italy, to find his only son a widower with one child, Agathe, who soon became her grandfather's darling. But soon their only prop was gone, for the younger Rohan fell in a duel: weeping destroyed the old man's waning sight, and ere long he took Agathe and went forth destitute in his old age, a blind beggar! That is his sad story."

"What became of the child?" said Guido, raising himself.

"Ah! that is a mystery, mon fils. I would fain have kept her, but she grew restless, and one day she went away, promising to return if she ever needed a friend. That is all."

Six months later Guido Sfonza returned to that quiet village, but the good old priest was gone, none knew whither.

But young as he was, there lay in the artist's nature a fine and delicate thread of golden pa-and vespers were over. He closed his book and rose, watching how many of the worshipers in leaving would give alms to the blind man and his young companion.

Drawing nearer he noticed, as first one and then another dropped some small coin into the hat, that the old man seemed to shrink; and the child visibly shivered more than once as the sweet musical voice murmured a half-timid "merci;" nearer still the painter drew, as the last worshiper passed on her homeward way, but paused under shelter of the column as the old man's voice struck his ear.

"Oh, child, it is killing me hour by hour. But for thee, my darling, I would pray God in his mercy to take back the soul he has lent to earth. When I am gone, what will become of thee, chérie—what will become of thee, Agathe? Oh, when thy dying father left his only child to my care, he little dreamed that she would stand the guide of a blind, helpless old man to ask alms of every passing stranger."

There was a second's pause, as if the child was mastering some strong emotion, ere she an-bells rang out for vespers he closed his studio and again turned into the halle. Ah, search in vain! those bright dark eyes will see no blind beggar or Agathe this evening, or to-morrow, or to-morrow! He came for many evenings; he inquired every where for them; all knew who he meant, but none could tell any thing about them, or had seen them depart; yet gone they were; nor could all Guido's efforts find any trace of the singular originals of the picture, at which he now labored from sunrise to sunset. A long day, some might say, but to the artist it seemed far too short, for "His heart was in his work,

And the heart
Giveth grace unto every art."

And when at last, after days and weeks of labor, his work was completed and the painter looked upon it, his lip smiled. Genius had indeed vindicated herself. The picture was a masterpiece.

It hung low on the walls of a great picture-dealer's exhibition, where every visitor could see it as well as if it was in his own house. It was catalogued simply, "The Blind Beggar—Guido tience. Though weeks became months, and months passed into three more years, still he watched and waited, working for bread, for fame, and for her, never losing sight of that Madonna-like face. Would it ever become a reality to him?

"Monsieur will never reach Beauvais in safety; the sun has set behind the Pyrenees already, and the road is lonely. Monsieur will be robbed, assurément."

The place was the space in front of a small and very shy-looking auberge on the road to Beauvais, in the Pyrenees; the speaker, the aubergiste, a rough, ill-looking sans-culotte; the listener a young rider, in whose graceful figure and fine face we see again the now famous painter. The time, singularly enough, was the day, almost to the hour, just four years from that evening, when he had sketched the Blind Beggar.

But the artist only laughed at the aubergiste. His property was safe in Beauvais; his revolver was loaded; and so he pursued his lonely way, and disappeared in the fast-falling darkness.

Somewhere about two hours after he had left a handsome traveling-carriage passed by the same way, and without stopping, drove along the same lonely road, and also vanished in the darkness.

The first cold gray dawn of the summer's morning was just beginning to break the darkness, when the same traveling-carriage drove at a gallop into the picturesque little town, which we have called Beauvais, and pulled up before the Hôtel Maurice, at the great door of which one of the tall chasseurs in attendance played so loud and sharp a summons that the worthy hôte sprang out of bed, and threw up the window in alarm.

The chasseur saw him, and called sharply, "Hô! vite! Courez à toutes jambes! c'est M. le Marquis d'Hauteville!"

The words produced a magic effect; mine host flung on his clothes, furiously rung the servants' alarm, and in five minutes the whole house was alive; the host precipitated himself down stairs, and, followed by Jean-Baptiste bearing a light, threw wide the great door.

A fine benevolent-looking man, past middle age, a military man evidently, was looking eagerly out of the carriage-window.

"Be quick," he cried out, "or my charge will die in my arms. Gaultier! Martinet! help me to carry him in. Monsieur Maurice," to the host, "send directly for the cleverest doctor you have, and for a nurse, a sœur de charité from La Sainte Thérèse, hard by."

These orders were spoken with military precision; the one man's energy made them all fly far quicker than it takes to write it. Then M. Maurice had time to see that on a sort of stretcher, placed against the seats, there lay the insensible form of a man, covered with the Marquis's own cloak, his head lying on the old soldier's breast.

"Doucement, doucement, mes braves!" he said, as his own servants came up, and with all the tenderness of the strong to the weak and suffering, gently lifted the motionless form and laid it on the litter. The host preceding, the Marquis following, they bore it up stairs to a large chamber, and laid it on the bed.

"Mon ami Maurice," said Hauteville, in his rapid way, "you know me. I am so bound for time in my journey that I must go on the moment. The doctor and nurse will come, but I shall be back in a few weeks; spare no expense on this brave boy—yes, boy, to my gray hairs, though the beard is on his lip. Ah, who comes there? Enter, M. le médecin. Soyez le bien-venu."

Dr. Regnard was not alone. There followed him with noiseless step, and garments that made no rustle, a young and beautiful woman in the familiar dress of a sœur de charité. She returned the soldier's salute, and advancing, at once threw back the mantle and loosened the dress of the wounded man that the doctor might examine the wound.

"It's a deep one, I fear," said the Marquis, as Dr. Regnard bent over the painter's motionless form. "I bound it up as well as I could; but it had bled horribly, and still does, I much fear."

"It is a very dangerous wound, monsieur, and has only just missed the heart," pronounced the doctor, after a close examination. "Nothing but the utmost care can save his life. Sœur Marguerite, we must quite stop this bleeding first; then try to recover consciousness."

"I will give a hundred napoleons for this one life," said the Marquis, strongly. "Any thing—only save it. It must be saved."

Dr. Regnard quietly and quickly proceeded to stop the bleeding and dress the wound; and then, while Maurice went for the restoratives he needed, he remarked, confidently:

"Ah, ça. Is this young man monsieur's son?"

"No; a stranger—quite a stranger. I was driving rapidly when, just where the road passes the Pont du Diable range, we heard the report of fire-arms in quick succession. We dashed on, but too late; the villains had fled, leaving their victim wounded, probably thinking him dead. Near him I picked up this vial, with some dark liquid still in it; the rest had evidently been insolently flung on his face, and had fallen on or near his eyes. Poor boy! I fear he is terribly hurt."

Dr. Regnard took the bottle, then stooped suddenly over Guido's deathlike face and closed eyes. Only the religieuse heard him murmur:

"Oh, pauvre garçon! what if they have done for him?"

The host re-entered with brandy and other things; and though D'Hauteville had said he could not stop, he lingered.

"I must see life restored," he whispered. "Does his heart yet beat?"

The sœur laid her soft, cool hand on Guido's breast, and half shook her head, sadly.

"Its beat is so feeble that it is scarcely perceptible."

"Raise his head again, mon enfant," said Dr. Regnard, in that quietly confident way which makes a clever physician come like an angel of light and saving power. And the sœur obeyed, resting the poor head on her breast.

But neither brandy nor any thing else seemed to take the least effect. The heart just beat—no more; only then perceptible to the light touch of the nun and the doctor.

"His life-blood has ebbed away," said the Marquis, turning aside, as the sun rose higher and higher in the blue heavens.

"No; grâce à Dieu, no," said the sœur de charité, suddenly; "there is warmth coming in the fingers, after all these hours of anxiety, and the heart now beats unmistakably."

"We will try some more eau-de-vie," said Dr. Regnard. "How close the white teeth are set!" then, after watching a few more minutes: "M. le Marquis, you may continue your voyage: our charge is out of immediate danger; life returns slowly."

Even then Hauteville lingered; but his business was pressing, and he was obliged to take leave, repeating his charge that no expense was to be spared: he would be responsible. And so he went on his way, truly a good Samaritan.

The moment Dr. Regnard was alone with the sœur he sent a prescription up to his own surgery, and pulled down the blind, even drawing the window-curtains also, as soon as a slight movement and half-drawn sigh from the sufferer showed returning consciousness. The nun lifted her beautiful, Madonna-like face in surprise, asking:

"Pourquoi, monsieur, is not the blind enough?"

"No, sœur Marguerite, I think not. Ah, listen!"

A soft feeble voice was murmuring some words in Italian, evidently wandering.

"Where am I? Is that your hand on mine, madre, mia dolce? how dark it is!"

"What does he say?" whispered the doctor, hastily catching at one of the last words.

The sœur repeated it in French: "and, still more to her surprise, Dr. Regnard immediately glided to the window and closed the shutters, leaving the room almost totally dark, so that each could only dimly discern the other's outline. The nun shivered, beginning to fear or suspect so awful a calamity for the sufferer that her very heart stood still, and speech failed her. A few minutes and the wounded man moved a little, speaking again, but in French.

"What is this pain? where am I? How dark—how very dark it is!"

"You have been badly wounded," said the doctor; "you are in my care and in that of sœur Marguerite. I have darkened the room: it is quite dark."

"Is that all? Oh, my head! Is it so very dark then?"

"Quite dark," said the nun; "but you must be quiet."

The doctor, who had gone to the door, now returned with some vials, a glass, and a basin of hot water. Into this he emptied one small vial, and then giving another to Marguerite, bade her administer the dose.

She obeyed. The doctor stood listening till he heard Guido's soft regular breathing.

"Eh bien, il dort," he said; "that is what I want. Now open the shutters, and wash his brow and eyes well with this hot water. He will not wake for hours."

The nurse obeyed him, and when she put down the basin Dr. Regnard gave a long sigh of relief.

"I hope—yes, I will dare to hope—that I have baffled the most accursed intentions of the villain who used that vial. Now, ma sœur, I am going away for a few hours. I shall return before he wakes. Stay: there is a signet-ring on his finger; see if you can there find any clue to his identity: he may be some one who has friends in Beauvais."

She softly drew off the ring—a curious family heir-loom of antique Italian workmanship; a crest and motto were graven on the ruby, but inside the broad gold hoop was engraved, evidently of recent date, the present owner's name.

"Monsieur," said the nun, replacing the ring, "it is the painter, Guido Sfonza."

"Then, indeed, sœur Marguerite," said the doctor, solemnly, "pray that God may send my efforts success, and give me almost more than human skill, or the painter's bread and handiwork are gone." And with that he hurried out.

Somewhere about noon the patient watcher heard the sleeper move; the shutters were open, though the blind and curtains were closed. As she reached the bedside Guido tried to lift his head, and spoke collectedly. The mind was only too active now.

"Where am I?—is any one here?—is it night?—it is so dark that I can not see."

But the next moment, before the nun could answer, there came such a cry as few ever hear, and hearing once can never forget.

"Mercy! oh mercy! I am blind!"

The nun laid one soft, firm hand over the darkened eyes, and the other on the dangerous wound, lest, in his awful agony, he should disturb the bandages and bleed to death.

"Be calm, for the sake of those that love you; for the love and hope of life and sight try and keep down all agitation."

As the sweet, musical voice struck his ear he started: it seemed as if he had heard one like it long ago—in dreams it might be—and it had a power over him that no other voice could have had. He sank back, every nerve quivering with a fierce agony that tried her terribly to witness: the more so that he struggled so bravely against it, prostrate and weak as he was. He did not even try to move her guardian hands or speak. The blow had gone too deep for any utterance, save in that one awful cry. So for a few moments of deathlike stillness he lay, and then a light step entered the room. The ear, strung to the highest pitch of nervous tension, heard it directly.

"Who is that? Oh, give me light, or let me die!"

"Hush! Sin not, lest a worst thing come upon thee, and God, in punishment, grant thy wish," said the gentle religieuse.

Dr. Regnard advanced, and putting his cool hand on the sufferer's burning fingers, said, in his quiet, kind way:

"I had hoped that you would not have made this discovery till you were stronger; as it is, it is best to speak out at once. You are in the hands of a skillful sœur de charité, and I hope of a skillful physician; you have been attacked, I suspect, by Morteblé's gang; you are dangerously wounded; and, worse than that, he has flung on your eyes a poison he uses, which, had it gone fully on them, must have hopelessly destroyed the sight. I hope that we may avert such an affliction; but I tell you frankly that I am in great uncertainty. When you can bear the worst I will test whether the sight is already destroyed, or whether the seat of it remains."

"Test it now—now—or I shall go mad with horror and suspense," Guido answered.

"Eh bien! courage donc! It is dark to you, n'est-ce pas? Notice, and answer carefully and calmly."

The unfortunate artist clasped his fingers close round the nun's hand, as if in her touch there was strength, and answered, "It is dark."

Dr. Regnard closed the shutters, and held them so that not one ray of light strayed through.

"Now—is it lighter or darker?"

"Darker—dense darkness! Oh, light, give me light!"

Dr. Regnard threw back the shutters and curtains, but left the blind, lest the blaze of sunlight should work the very evil he dreaded.

"Is there any difference?" he asked, exchanging a meaning look with the sœur.

"It is lighter—much lighter."

"Once more." He lighted a small wax taper, and held it about two feet from the patient's eyes.

"Are you conscious of any change?"

"Yes." The voice was very weak, but nothing could rob it of its soft and musical cadence. "I perceive a redness in the atmosphere, as if a light was near me."

"God be thanked! The sight itself is still there—injured, but not destroyed. With care, patience, and sœur Marguerite's good nursing, we will, under Heaven, get you back strength and the blessing of vision—perhaps in a few months."

"Months!"

"Chut!—there must be no agitation, no despair. Ma sœur, keep a subdued light, and wash the eyes with this mixture every three hours."

He then drew her aside, gave her the medicines and further orders.

"It hangs on a hair whether we save him or not," he whispered. "I fear fever and inflammation. If he sleeps through to-night without it, then the danger will pass. I shall return at sunset to take watch and watch with you. I would not trust him to any one else. I will tell Maurice what to send up for him as I go down." And he quietly went out. Guido Sfonza was in clever hands.

When the clock the next morning pointed to seven the wounded man still slept—sleeping as evenly and lightly as a child. Dr. Regnard was also sleeping in a large English easy-chair, and the sœur de charité sat by the bedside, patient, wakeful, watchful. While they slept she had prayed. But three days passed before Dr. Regnard pronounced his patient out of danger, and a full week before he would allow him to speak: indeed, Guido had little wish or power to do so, so great was the prostration from loss of blood. At the end of the week, however, the doctor began to give him every thing that was strengthening, both in food and medicines. So well did his skillful treatment hit the exact mark, so subtle and perfect was the vitality of a constitution so finely organized that perhaps few could rival it, that the painter soon began slowly but surely to recover. The first thing he asked his untiring nurse was to whom he owed his rescue. Marguerite told him the story. All the painter said was, "Now, indeed, may God give me life and vision that I may show my deep gratitude to all who have been so kind to me. But I need be no charge to that noble-hearted man, for I had forwarded on my own property, if you will send for it, to the Hôtel de la Fontaine. Will he return to Beauvais, ma sœur?"

"Not for some time," the nun answered.

In truth, Dr. Regnard had written to M. d'Hauteville, requesting him not to come till he wrote again, for he feared any agitation or emotion for the patient.

"I wonder," said the invalid, as he lay one morning on the sofa, to which he could now be moved—"I wonder, sœur Marguerite, if you are like what my imagination pictures you."

It was well that he could not see the sudden flush which rose painfully to the nun's colorless face, or the quivering lip and deeply sorrowful shadow to which it gave place. She answered in her gentle way and with that haunting voice of hers: "The imagination will often deceive by a fair picture where the reality is far below it."

"Ah! too often, but surely not here. You are young, by your touch, your voice, your head."

"I am not yet quite nineteen, M. da Sfonza."

"Shall I tell you what my picture is like?"

"No," she said, a little hurriedly; "this miserable humanity is not worth it."

Guido turned his face toward her as if he could see her, and his hand trembled. Was a new sorrow coming upon him? Was he growing false to Agathe, forgetting his ideal, his poet love? No; the ideal was taking form in his vivid imagination, and the two were blending into one.

The voice was the echo of his dreams and his memory, and the face his imagination gave to his gentle nurse was the sorrowful Madonna face his genius had given to the world long ago. Oh! for sight, the blessed sight we never value fully till we lose it or are losing it!

One morning, it might be nearly three months since he had been brought to the Hôtel Maurice, he was preparing to walk in the garden with his faithful guide—for his blindness and the need of constantly applying the remedies made it still necessary for her to be with him all day—when Dr. Regnard came into the pretty little salon.

"How are you this morning?" he asked, cheerily. "That Italian face of yours ought to lose its troubled, anxious look, now that you are getting stronger."

"Ah! monsieur, but I am still blind," was the touching answer.

"Ca! I deny that," said Dr. Regnard, pleasantly. "I think we shall soon send sœur Marguerite back to La Sainte Thérèse. Her care and attention, quite as much as my skill, have insured the restoration of sight. Come now, I am sure you can find the sœur yourself; turn, look; yes, look for her."

When the doctor spoke of sending her away she had drawn suddenly back and stood gazing out of the window. The artist turned toward the light by instinct; he had long perceived the light.

"Ah!" he cried, suddenly, almost wildly, "I can see plainly, as through a blackened glass, the outlines of a dark form against the light; Marguerite is in the window." And walking straight to her, he laid his hand on her shoulder.

"A few more days," said the physician, "you will see. Once more Guido Sfonza will belong to the world and to art."

The artist smiled, and linking his arm in Marguerite's, passed out with her into the flower-garden.

"Can you see your convent?" he asked.

"The western wing and refectory; trees hide the rest."

"Oh, how can any man or woman immerse themselves within the walls of a convent," said the painter, "when God gave us the wide world to work in? how ever can you Sisters of Charity, who indeed do blessed works, bind yourselves by vows on which there can be no blessing, a burden grievous to be borne? But pardon! you will deem me a heretic," he added, smiling; "you, a vowed sœur de charité."

"No," said the religieuse, quietly, "for in that we stand on equally heretical ground; I am not a vowed nun, not even a novice, though only our Mère Angélique knows it. I am alone and friendless, and she permitted me to assume the habits and duties of a sœur—on trial. I may leave at any time; but if I remain another month, I must take the vows, as the three years allowed me expire."

The painter made no answer: perhaps he could not, fearful of giving way to the least emotion. A minute after he turned the subject.

The next morning, when the sœur came, the worthy host told her that when he went as usual to assist his charge to dress he had said that he had passed a somewhat restless night.

"M. da Sfonza was very anxious for you to come, madame," added M. Maurice. "I left him seated in the large fauteuil, I think asleep."

"Merci." The nurse stole very softly into the little salon. The painter was sitting in the easy-chair, his fine head resting on his hand, his dark eyes closed; he slept. The sœur bent over him and very gently washed his eyes with a new lotion that Dr. Regnard had used for the last week. He did not wake, but only moved and murmured some words in Italian, smiling, as if even in sleep he was conscious of her presence; but she turned away behind the window-curtain, covering her face; to her the one bright page of her young life was closing in darkness; and yet, true woman to the core, she had only rejoicing and thanks for the good vouchsafed to the one she loved, though it was to part her from him forever. So an hour passed unheeded, and then, with a deep-drawn sigh, Guido Sfonza awoke. The next moment he sprang to his feet, the large, brilliant eyes wide open, "Merciful Heaven! the awful blindness is gone! I see! I see once more! Oh! where is Marguerite, that I may tell her, see her at last!"

"She is here, to rejoice with those that do rejoice," said the sweet voice, and the sœur came forward; but her close head-dress had got loosened, and her golden hair fell on her shoulders.

The painter took one step forward, one word passed his lips as he saw her face.

"Agathe!"

The face of his dreams; the face he had searched for, waited, watched for for years, in unwearied patience.

"Yes, Agathe," she said, trembling; "Agathe de Rohan. How did monsieur know it?"

"Agathe, I first heard the sweet name from your blind grandfather as you stood under the porch of the Augustine Church in that old French town, you must remember. I painted you both; the picture upon which my fame was first built. Through all these long four years I have wandered, searching for the lost Agathe. I heard of you once from an old priest!"

"Dear old man! These three years confessor at la Sainte Thérèse," murmured Agathe.

"And there I lost all trace of my ideal," he continued, "until I awoke to find it a reality at my side, a gentle nurse, a ministering angel. Oh! Agathe, my first and only love, will you not accept the life and sight you have in part won back from death. Let me at least try and teach Agathe to love Guido Sfonza."

"He has taught her that already," whispered the soft voice; and she hid her face on the painter's breast.

There was a quiet marriage one sunlit morning in the convent chapel, performed by the venerable Père Eugène. The Marquis d'Hauteville would allow none but his hand to give a wife to Guido Sforza.

In Dr. Regnard's salon there hangs now a portrait of Agathe, and the Marquis d'Hauteville's private chapel is graced by a noble altar-piece, which no lover of art can pass by.

Père Eugène, now a very old white-haired man, loves best to sit under the orange-trees, or on the terrace of the painter's Florentine villa, with Guido's little son on his knee; and then, when the pretty boy and his sister are tired of play, they will run to the padre to ask for, and hear, perhaps for the twentieth time, the story of the blind beggar.

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE invitations to Compiègne are the ruling anxiety at this moment. The Empress decides on them alone, and desires that they shall be kept secret till the guests actually set out on the visit. Nevertheless, we can name among those invited the wife of Admiral Bruat, the governess of the children of France, and her two charming daughters; Madame Raimbeaux, the daughter of M. Mocquard; the Duke and Duchess of Talleyrand-Montmorency; and Messrs. Jules Sandeau, the Academician, and Paul Féval, the celebrated novelist.

The invitations are drawn up as follows: By order of the Emperor the First Chamberlain has the honor to inform Monsieur [or Madame] — that he [or she] is invited to pass a week at Compiègne, from — to —.

The First Chamberlain,
VISCOUNT DE LA FERRIERE.

The Viscount de La Ferrière seems born for the delightful functions which he performs. As the superintendent of the pleasures of the Court he is thrown in connection with the celebrated cantatrices, actresses, authors, and musicians—the whole artistic world, in short—whom it is necessary to treat with so much tact and so many different shades of respect; for while due deference must always be paid to the self-love of artists, there are many degrees among geniuses; and all the knowledge of the most finished man of the world is needed to treat some as equals and others as more or less valued protégés. M. de La Ferrière resembles indeed those colonels of the French guards who flourished in the eighteenth century, and who preserved their grace and elegance even under a grizzled mustache. He is of a very noble family. The Empress has always showed him much attention, and his somewhat frivolous duties he has been able to do her essential service by knowing how to conciliate those about her.

The first series of guests set out for Compiègne on the 9th of November. As may be imagined, the toilette there is of an extravagant kind—not that each dress is so magnificent in itself, but the prodigality consists in the frequent changes required. Four toilettes are made daily, and the same dress can never be worn twice. In the morning the toilette is simple, for breakfast; and in the afternoon somewhat richer, for going out. If the weather permits pedestrian exercise the ladies put on a short suit; if it is rainy, and they are obliged to stay at home, they wear a trained dress of heavy silk. For driving, they wear long or short dresses according to their taste.

In the morning there is a first breakfast, which each one takes in her room; and at eleven o'clock a general breakfast in the Emperor's dining-room. The ladies who have ridden before or intend to ride after breakfast are permitted to appear at table in their riding dresses.

Dinner is at seven. After dinner a circle gathers round the Empress, who signifies to those whom she desires to see there that they have the right to approach her. This is the time for conversation and the triumph of the men of wit, a choice cluster of whom are always to be found at Compiègne.

The Queen of Spain and her surroundings naturally excite much attention just now. She is about to come to Paris, for she has been cut to the quick by her freezing reception at Pau and the avoidance of the ladies of the French and English aristocracy. Apartments are being prepared for her in a simple furnished house, called the Rohan Pavilion, which fronts the Rue de Rivoli at the part of the Tuileries which bears this name. The first-floor, which consists of two suites of rooms, is leased for eleven thousand francs a month by the Queen. She will stay there with her husband and children while two small hotels in the Champs Elysées are being fitted up for their use.

The Queen of Spain can not hope to win the Parisians by her external appearance. She is enormously fat and waddles clumsily. Her features are heavy and disproportioned, her hair is scanty, and the expression of her mouth is extremely forbidding. She appears very fond of bright colors, and pays little attention to their harmony. She travels in a blue dress, and a bonnet trimmed with red flowers—the effect of which may be imagined! Her steward, Marfori, who never quits her, is a quaint-looking personage, with a conical face and bald head, and looking by no means like a hero of romance. The general opinion is that Queen Isabella has no chance of returning to Spain, and that she will some day do like her mother, Queen Christina, and marry Marfori. It is said that the Duke de Montpensier, the husband of Isabella's younger sister, is quite likely to succeed to the throne. Nevertheless he divides the chances with Don Carlos, who is the presumptive heir, unless the Salic law is set aside. His wife, Princess Marguerite of Bourbon, is a charming woman, tall, slender, and graceful. She dresses well, and with great simplicity. On her arrival at Paris she wore a pearl-gray dress, a black and white striped velvet Macfarlane, and a black lace Fanchon bonnet, with an aigrette of black and mauve curled feathers. The Empress returned her call in a mauve dress; a Laitière mantelet, trimmed with black lace; and a bonnet with a diadem of Parma violets.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

WHAT a pitiful sight it must be!—a room not eleven feet square and between six and seven feet high, containing from forty to fifty children—some of them mere infants—all working hour after hour plaiting straw. Yet this is a common sight in Bedfordshire, England, where thousands of children are sent to a plaiting-school as soon as they can hold the straws. The youngest are employed in clipping the plaits. The labors of the Children's Employment Commission have recently disclosed many painful facts. One of the Commissioners reports that he found in the schools little girls not three years old, although he was assured that in general they did not commence their life of labor until three and a half or four years old! It is not always easy to teach the poor little ones to clip or plait properly, and the stick, a cane about a yard in length, is sometimes freely used by the schoolmistress. The school is usually in a small cottage room, possessing neither proper light nor ventilation, and is often so closely filled that fires can not be lighted. To protect themselves from cold the children keep in their laps small earthen vessels containing bits of coal. One room visited by the Commissioner was so closely packed that the quantity of air each child could have was less than half it would have if shut up in a box three feet square! The present is a period of distress for work among the makers of straw bonnets and hats in Bedfordshire; and the general opinion among the more thoughtful and intelligent residents of the district is that advantage ought to be taken of the present distress for the purpose of putting an end to the child-labor system.

"The Woman's Kingdom," Miss Mulock's latest novel, is dedicated to Mona Margaret Paton, a "little girl." A verse or two will show the spirit pervading the whole book:

"Better to love than to be loved:
Better to serve, and serving guide,
Than wait, with idle oars unproved,
And flapping sail by each breath moved,
The turning of life's solemn tide.
"Live, work, and love; as Heaven assign
For heaven, or man, thy sacred part;
Ancestress of a noble line,
Or calm in maidenly decline;—
But keep till death the woman's heart."

"Bazar," a word derived from the Persian, in its primitive and most comprehensive meaning signifies large, great, grand. Among the Malays in India, who have their literature from Persia and Arabia, "bazar" is said to be used as an adjective, where we use "great" or "large," in contrast with "cachèl," which means "small." For example: Orang bazar, a large man; Orang cachèl, a small man. In the Straits of Malacca are two contiguous islands, a larger and a smaller one, known respectively as "Pulo Rajah Bazar" and "Pulo Rajah Cachèl," which we translate, "Great Prince's Island" and "Little Prince's Island." At the eating-rooms where Malays are the attendants, if one wishes for a full meal, he calls for "Ma-kim (food) Bazar;" if for only a light lunch, a "Ma-kim Cachèl."

The inhabitants of Naples have projected a novel and interesting exhibition to celebrate the forthcoming visit of Prince Humbert and his bride. This is no less than to raise a portion of the city of Pompeii from its ruins, re-furnish the mansions, and repeople houses and streets, so as to present a vivid picture of the ancient city. Cavalier Fiorelli, the intelligent director of the excavations, has long desired to restore a small portion of the buried city, not as a mere transient spectacle for the amusement of the crowd, but as a perpetual museum, in which the general aspect of ancient Italian life can be far better studied than by the inspection of isolated objects. He proposes to commence an accurate and conscientious restoration of certain parts of the city, choosing, of course, such localities as leave the least to be done, and which, at the same time, offer no remarkable peculiarities which might suffer deterioration in the process. The corporation of Naples, however, very naturally hesitates to make the first outlay, which is estimated at no less than 250,000 francs.

There are thirty-one lines of omnibuses in Paris, all of which belong to one company. They are distinguished by the letters of the alphabet, the color of their lanterns, and of the vehicles themselves. The fare is the same on all the routes, being half price for an outside seat. If the omnibus does not go in the direct route to the passenger's destination he may apply to the conductor for an exchange ticket, and he will be left at the point where two lines meet, and can take another omnibus.

Mothers sometimes feel that their little ones are in the way, and are tempted, in busy moments, to thrust them rudely aside. Let such cheek the harsh word and stay the hasty hand, lest they bitterly regret their thoughtless anger as did one mother. She had prepared some flour for baking, and left it a moment, when her little Mary, with childish curiosity, took hold of the dish and spilled the contents. The mother struck the child a severe blow, saying that she was always in the way! Two weeks after little Mary sickened and died. On her death-bed, while delirious, she asked her mother if there would be room for her among the angels? "I was always in your way, mother; you had no room for little Mary! And will I be in the angels' way? Will there be no room for me?" The broken-hearted mother then felt that no sacrifice would have been too great could she have saved her child.

Several severe earthquakes have been experienced near Cork, Ireland; but the people were more frightened than hurt. There is comfort in the theory which observations, extending over a period of nearly half a century, in South America are said to sustain, that it is the first shock, if any, which does the mischief; the succeeding ones are usually harmless.

The Connecticut River Railroad Company have adopted a new method of heating their cars. Outdoor air is purified by being passed through water, is heated, and then conveyed through pipes which run near the floor the whole length of the car. At proper intervals these pipes are perforated with small holes, through which the heated and purified air escapes. The warmth is distributed equally throughout the entire length of the car, and coming low down toward the floor will enable passengers always to keep their feet comfortably warm.

A lady who has spent the last year abroad and recently returned took a walk down Broadway the other day. She remarked afterward, that during her many weeks' stay in Paris she did not see so much display of gaudy and conspicuous dress as in that one walk in Broadway; that while many French ladies dress handsomely in the street, she never saw any thing which indicated a desire to display dress, or which could offend the nicest taste. One is often reminded, nowadays, of the reply of the gentleman who, having warmly admired the appearance of some lady of his acquaintance, was asked how she was dressed: "She was dressed so perfectly," he replied, "that I can not remember a single article that she wore."

According to the opinion of the Rev. J. G. Wood, in his new work on the management of Aquaria, as large a surface of water should be exposed to the air as is possible in making an aquarium. Moreover, it must not be made of a transparent material such as glass, but its sides ought to be opaque, except in front, and the front should not be turned toward the window. If one happens to possess an ordinary glass tank he can greatly improve it by covering the back and ends with pasteboard. But any kind of tub or pan will answer, provided that the owner cares more for the inmates than the appearance of their dwelling.

The public are cautioned by the Scientific American against the use of adulterated vinegar. In order to give the requisite acidity to vinegar it seems that sulphuric, nitric, and hydrochloric acids are used, but chiefly sulphuric, that being the cheapest and sourest. A gallon of so-called vinegar can be made from sulphuric acid, water, and some coloring matter at a cost of only a cent or two. It is considered very injurious to the health. To detect the presence of sulphuric acid, take a small quantity of the vinegar in a clear glass and drop a few drops of the chloride of barium into it, or the nitrate of barium. If the liquid presents a cloudy appearance there is sulphuric acid in it.

The Crown-Princess of Prussia has given ten thousand dollars to the ladies of the Berlin Mid-night Missions. The success of this benevolent society is very great. Not less than one hundred unfortunate girls have been rescued from infamy and furnished with good situations or restored to their parents. No reproaches are addressed to any of the girls, and special pains are taken to protect them from the intrusion of the curious and inquisitive. The Midnight Mission organized in New York city in February, 1867, has accomplished much good. During the first year seventy-seven became inmates of the Mission House, of whom forty-eight have entirely abandoned their former disreputable life.

A London journal, in the communication of a correspondent from Biarritz, remarks that doubtless the high heels of the boots which the ladies wear—about two inches in length—have necessitated the use of a walking-stick; but, be this as it may, the simple fact of the Empress carrying a walking-stick has made its use fashionable. A new kind of parasol has been invented, and is carried by many of the ladies—it combines both walking-stick and parasol. The stick, which is stout and usually white, is made very long and tipped with iron, and is used to assist in walking.

A new kind of sponge has been invented, made from India rubber. The imitation is said to be perfect in appearance, but softer than real sponge, and its power of absorption greater. It can also be shaped into any required form.

The conscience of a child, remarks a writer upon the training of children, may easily be worn out both by too much pressure and by over-stimulation.

Among recent donations which have been made to the zoological collection at the Central Park is a fine specimen of the American black bear, about two years old, which was given to the donor, Colonel E. H. Durfee, by one of the leading chiefs of the Ossage tribe of Indians, and which is very tame, having been reared as a pet. Two Russe cats, brought from the Island of Java, and a cinnamon bear, from Singapore, India, have also been presented.

The New York Times states that although the public debt is enormous, it is less than twice the retail value of the liquor consumed in the United States for the year 1867. The cost of liquor for that period was ten times the value of all church property in the country; equal to the value of all railroads in the United States, except Pennsylvania; more than the value of the metallic yield of the mines west of the Rocky Mountains for twenty years past, and fifty times the cost of public education in the United States for the year.

The North German expedition, which was sent out to Aden to make observations on the sun, during the total eclipse on the 18th of last August, included artists who were resolved to take photographs of the great luminary during its disappearance! Every arrangement was previously made to improve to the utmost the three minutes of total eclipse. The result was that three impressions were secured, in one of which the dark border of the sun was surrounded on one side by peculiar protuberances, and on the other was a remarkable horn. The others showed the protuberances on the lower border, but the impression was obscured by passing clouds.

Fringes and Borders.

See illustrations on page 916.

The fringes and borders here given are for trimming covers, shawls, fichus, etc., and are worked partly in crochet, partly in tatting, and partly in netting.

Fig. 1. TATTING AND CROCHET FRINGE.—This fringe is of red wool. Begin with one of the large tatted rings in the middle of a scallop. This ring consists of 1 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), three tenths of an inch long, 11 times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 1 ds.; after which tie together the beginning and end of the thread. In this manner work as many single rings as will be needed for the length of the fringe. Next work a small ring as follows: 8 ds., fasten to a p. of the large ring, 8 ds.; after three-fifths of an inch space of thread another similar ring, which must be fastened to the next p. of the large ring. Continue in this manner till seven small rings have been fastened to the large one, which completes a scallop of the border. Close to the last ring work a similar one, which must be fastened to a p. of another large ring. Continue in this manner till the border has reached the requisite length. Then crochet around the threads between the first and second and sixth and seventh rings of each scallop always five single crochet, and around the remaining threads always six single crochet. On this round single crochet work finally the loops for the fringe, as in the Crochet fringe, Fig. 2, in Harper's Bazar, No. 46, page 724. On the upper edge of the border crochet two rounds.

Fig. 2.—The border of this fringe of violet zephyr wool is netted and trimmed with little balls. First make for the netted foundation of the border over a mesh an inch in circumference a foundation of the length desired, and work on this three rounds over the same mesh always one stitch in each stitch of the preceding round. Then tie in the stitches of the last round a strand of wool in the manner shown by the illustration, and crochet in over stitch on the upper edge of the border one single crochet, and after each of these one chain. Lastly, sew on the worsted balls.

Fig. 3.—This netted fringe is worked with zephyr wool over two meshes, one of which is two-fifths and the other four-fifths of an inch in circumference. Begin from the middle of the border with a foundation of the requisite length over the finer mesh, and work: 1st round.—Over the same mesh one stitch in every foundation stitch. 2d round.—In every stitch of the former round one stitch over the fine and four stitches over the larger mesh. 3d round.—* Over the larger mesh one stitch in the next four stitches of the former round, over the finer mesh one stitch in the following stitch. 4th round.—Over the finer mesh: alternately one stitch in the following stitch of the former round, one stitch in the four following stitches, so that they shall be worked together. 5th round.—Over the same mesh: one stitch in each stitch of the former round. On the stitches of the 5th round work the fringe loops over a piece of pasteboard three inches and a half wide, working three loops in each stitch. Next repeat the 2d to 5th rounds also on the other side of the foundation stitches, and make the upper edge by working in each stitch a single crochet, and after each single crochet a chain.

Fig. 4.—Work first the border of this fringe lengthwise as follows: On a foundation of the requisite length crochet the 1st round.—Alternately one slip stitch in the first foundation stitch, a loop half an inch long in the following foundation stitch. Work these loops in the manner shown by Fig. 2, Crochet Fringe, in Harper's Bazar, No. 46, p. 724. 2d round.—* Work together the first three loops of the former round by working loops of the same length in all three stitches at the same time, but after every three loops leave the thread two-thirds of an inch long before beginning the next. 3d round.—One slip stitch in every loop of the former round, after every slip stitch one chain. On the stitches of the 3d round work finally the loops for the fringe in the same manner.

Fig. 5.—Crochet the 1st round of this fringe in the same manner as the 1st round of the fringe Fig. 4. Next draw every second loop through the preceding, and crochet one slip stitch in every loop, and between every two cross loops 3 chain. The fringe loops are worked in the same manner as those of Fig. 4.

Fig. 6. WORSTED BALL FRINGE.—This fringe is worked with white zephyr wool. Begin with a border, and crochet first on a foundation of the requisite length two rounds in double crochet, and then a round of chain-stitch scallops, each of which consists of 5 chain and 1 slip stitch in the third following stitch of the former round. This last round is also to be worked on the other side of the border, but in working the slip stitches always fasten in one of the fringe loops, which has been previously ornamented with the balls in the manner shown by the illustration. On the under edge of the fringe the loops hang together in the manner shown. The manner of working the balls is already familiar to our readers.

Fig. 7.—The foundation of this border is crocheted with white wool, while the rosettes and scalloped edges are of blue wool. Begin the border on a foundation of the requisite length, and work on this three rounds in single crochet with white wool, always working around the whole stitch. 4th round.—* Seven single crochet in white wool in the first seven stitches of the former round, but work off the last stitch with blue wool. Now crochet with the blue wool seven picots, each composed of five chain and one slip stitch in the first of these, returning on this picot row work one slip stitch on each slip stitch of a picot, and join the row in a round by working one slip stitch in the slip stitch of the picot before the last, then drop the loop from the needle, draw it through the middle ring, and take it up again on the under side of the work. Now work on the single crochet of the last round, passing over the rosettes, five more rounds single crochet with white wool, and then the scallop round with blue wool. Every scallop consists of three chain and one slip stitch in the first of these; after each scallop crochet around the following stitch a single crochet which shall embrace the first round. These rounds are repeated also on the other side of the border.

Fig. 8. CROCHET BORDER OF WHITE AND BLUE WOOL.—Begin the border with white wool, and work on a foundation of the requisite length two rounds single crochet (putting the needle around the entire stitch). 3d round.—* Five single crochet with white wool in the first five stitches of the former round, one figure of blue wool as follows: splice on the blue wool, work in the following stitch of the former round five loops, each two-fifths of an inch long, in the same manner as the loops of Fig. 4; after which work off together the five loops on the needle with one slip stitch of white wool. 4th to 6th rounds.—One single crochet in every single crochet of the former round, passing over the figure. 7th round.—Like the 3d round, except that the position of the figures must alternate. 8th to 10th rounds.—Single crochet with white wool. Finally, work on both sides of the border a round of scallops with blue wool as follows: 1 slip stitch on the first stitch of the outer edge of the border. * 1 picot composed of 3 chain and 1 slip stitch in the first of these, pass over 1 stitch, work 1 slip stitch, which shall diagonally pass over the two former rounds (see illustration), one slip stitch in the following stitch of the former round.

Fig. 9. KNITTED BORDER OF WHITE AND RED ZEPHYR WOOL.—Begin this border with a foundation of the requisite length, and knit a row of scallops as follows: 5 rounds plain, then one round alternately one stitch made, one narrowed; after this again five rounds plain; then take the under veins of the foundation stitch on the needles, and knit together always a foundation stitch and the knitted stitch. Now work with the red wool a second row of scallops, which consists of two plain rounds, one open-work round as before, and two plain rounds, then again with the white wool a white row of scallops, after which take up on the back of the work the veins of the stitches which were made by knitting together the foundation and knitted stitches, and knit these with the stitches on the needle. This trimming is finished by knitting, in the white scallops, with red wool, alternately 1 single crochet and 5 chain. By the middle row of scallops crochet this scalloped round with white wool, and after this a second with red wool.

MADAME AUGUSTE
VON BÄRNDORF.

FEW of the great dramatic artists who have crossed the ocean have been qualified by nature and study to take so brilliant a position as Madame Von Bärndorf, the Baroness Von Schoultz, whose portrait we give herewith, together with a representation of her in her celebrated rôle of Iphigenia. In Europe she is ranked with Rachel, Ristori, and Jananschek, and her American reputation promises to equal that acquired by her in Europe. Her début at the New York Stadt Theatre on the 6th of November called forth warm applause, and made her at once a favorite with the public.

Madame Von Bärndorf, indeed, possesses every requisite for success; rare loveliness of face, a commanding figure, a manner at once courtly and impassioned, and a fervid imagination, joined with a fine critical and intellectual appreciation of the characters she personates. Her versatility is wonderful; she is equally sparkling in comedy, heroic in classic drama, and thrilling in tragedy. Her taste in dress is admirable; and the social advantages which she has enjoyed from her high position in private life have doubtless contributed to make the great actress also the polished lady.

Madame Von Bärndorf's career has been full of romance. Her father, Herr Baucherhorst, owned an estate near Berlin, where she was born, and where her first childhood was passed, though her father soon removed to Berlin, in order to give her better advantages of education. Her inimitable talent for mimicry early attracted attention; and when quite a child, on being taken to the theatre to witness a representation of Gluck's Armide, she declared her determination to be an actress. This, in the beginning, was only laughed at. But her father's death speedily changed the circumstances of the family and strengthened her resolve. She had recourse to the celebrated dramatic artist, Auguste Crelinger, who examined the young enthusiast, and was so delighted with her promise that she readily consented to instruct her in her art. When scarcely fifteen she made her début at the court theatre of Berlin in the comedy of "A Hundred Years ago." Her third appearance as Ismene in Sophocles's celebrated tragedy of Antigone stamped her success—partly owing to a ludicrous accident. As her sister Antigone led her to view their brother's body a hair-pin sharply pricked the back of her neck. The convulsive shudder that ran through her frame at that instant was cheered by the audience as the perfection of acting, and the lucky pin-prick secured her an engagement at the Court Theatre. She did not, however, remain long in this position. In the beginning of 1846, through the advice of a powerful friend, she accepted an engagement at the Court Theatre of Oldenburg, and three months later went to St. Petersburg to lay the foundation of her fame at the Imperial Court Theatre. It is a singular fact that at St. Petersburg she first appeared in elderly and foreign rôles, as for example as Elizabeth in Mary Stuart; and, later, in those of younger heroines, as Joan of Arc. Here she carried the city by storm. She became the pet of the Court; magnificent presents were lavished on her; and the Czar was so delighted with her personation of Joan of Arc that he sent her a suit of gold armor to be worn by her in that character. The happiest part of her youth was spent on the Neva. She remained there from 1846 to 1858. Her beauty, grace, and talent gave her access to the most aristocratic circles, and at the age of nineteen she contracted a morganatic marriage with Prince Galitzin, a member of one of the most ancient and noble families of the Russian nobility. This kind of marriage, we may say, which is very common among European princes, is consecrated by a clergyman with all the usual formalities, the sole difference being the joining of the left hands instead of the right, and entitles the wife to all respect and consideration save that belonging to her spouse's official position. It is thus that princes reconcile the demands of state and those of the heart. At the ceremony Mademoiselle Baucherhorst received the title of Madame Von Bärndorf. The union, however, was not of long duration; it was dissolved in 1855 by the Czar, and on the 5th of February, 1858, she married the Baron Von Schoultz. In the same year with her second marriage Madame Von Bärndorf quitted St. Petersburg to fulfill a ten years' engagement at the Royal Court Theatre of Hanover. Her vacations during this time were spent partly in short provincial engagements, and partly at her castle of Spiegelberg, situated near Neustadt on the Dosse. It was her intention, at the close of her Hanover engagement, to retire from the stage, and enjoy at leisure the large fortune which she had accumulated, but we are glad to know that a tempting offer from the New York Stadt Theatre, joined, perchance, to a love of adventure, induced her to postpone this step, and to give our countrymen an opportunity of seeing one of the greatest of living actresses.

MADAME VON BÄRNDORF AS IPHIGENIA.

MADAME AUGUSTE VON BÄRNDORF (BARONESS VON SCHOULTZ).

SCHUYLER COLFAX AND HIS BRIDE MISS WADE.

FEW men at this moment stand so prominently before the eyes of the American people as Schuyler Colfax, through the recent election which has elevated him to the second place in the eyes of the nation; while his marriage, following so closely in the wake of the first event, gives an added social interest to his name. Mr. Colfax was born at 86 North Moore Street, New York City, March 23, 1823, and is now forty-five years old, eleven months younger than the President elect. The excellent photograph of him, by Fredericks, which we reproduce, was taken but a few weeks since, and is an admirable representation of his outward man at the present moment. He is rather under the medium height, with brown hair, slightly grizzled, blue eyes, high forehead, and a wiry, well-knit, and muscular frame, susceptible of great endurance. His frank and open countenance is lighted with a sunny smile which the gravest cares can scarcely drive away. This remarkable power of bearing his burdens lightly, coupled with his temperate habits, has preserved the freshness of youth to such a degree that he looks ten years younger than he really is.

Mr. Colfax is essentially a self-made man. At the same time his lineage is second to none in the country. His grandfather, General William Colfax, a native of Connecticut, commanded Washington's body-guard in the Revolutionary War, and enjoyed his personal friendship. He married Hester Schuyler, the cousin of the distinguished Colonel Philip Schuyler, of New York, and Washington stood sponsor for their first son, who bore his name. Schuyler, the third son, became a teller in the Mechanics' Bank of New York. He died young, two years after his marriage, leaving a widow only seventeen years old and one child, who died soon after. Four months after his father's death Schuyler was born.

The young widow left thus early with a future Vice-President to train acquitted herself of her task nobly, as the event proves, for the youth owes little to schools and much to his mother. His whole education was obtained in the New York public schools, and finished in Crosby Street when only ten years old. For three years subsequently he was clerk in a store; and even at this early age he began to show his inclination for politics, for at eleven it is related that he haunted the polls in New York and Brooklyn to gain the first news of the result of the elections. When thirteen he removed with his mother, who in the interval had married again, to New Carlisle, Indiana. Here, for four years more, he was clerk in a store, employing every moment meanwhile in storing up knowledge for future use. His family then removed to South Bend, where he became the deputy of his step-father, who was elected County Auditor. From this post he drifted into journalism, and at twenty-two was editor and proprietor of the St. Joseph's Valley Register. After struggling through years of discouragement and difficulty he gained the success which is always attained by perseverance, and became one of the most influential journalists of the State. Henceforth he played a prominent part in politics, which it would take too long to detail, till, in 1855, he took his seat in Congress, where he has ever since remained. In 1863 he was elected to the Speakership of the House, which he has now filled for three successive terms, and which he will only vacate next March for a higher position.

Mr. Colfax married at twenty-one an early playmate of his childhood. His home-life was saddened by the illness of his wife, who was an invalid for many years, and who died in 1863, leaving him a childless widower. The lonely interval that has since elapsed must have been especially painful to one of his genial and companion-loving nature; and his friends are rejoiced that this solitude has found an end, and that, with a new political life, he begins a new era of domestic happiness.

On the 18th of November, a fortnight after his election to the Vice-Presidency, Mr. Colfax was married to Miss Ella M. Wade, of Andover, Ashtabula County, Ohio. Nellie Wade, as she is familiarly styled by her friends, is the daughter of Theodore Wade, the eldest brother of the Hon. Benjamin F. Wade, now President of the Senate and Vice-President of the United States. Her step-mother is her aunt, the sister of her own mother. Her father, who died some five years ago, was an Ohio farmer, and she has spent her whole life, when not at school (she was educated at the Cleveland and the Willoughby (Ohio) Female Seminaries), in the farm-house where she was born, engaged in domestic and home duties, which were varied only by occasional visits to her relatives in different parts of the country. It was on one of these visits to her aunt in Washington, three years ago, that Mr. Colfax formed the acquaintance which ripened into an engagement last summer during a trip to the Rocky Mountains. The fact that she has become the wife of one of the chief rulers of the nation, and is therefore a legitimate object of affectionate interest to the people, warrants us, we think, in overstepping the bounds of privacy and laying before our readers the excellent photograph obtained from Mr. Rider, of Cleveland, Ohio. The picture shows a sensible, earnest, and thoughtful face, the owner of which would be likely to give none but good counsel to her husband in his responsible position. But still more striking is the graphic portrait, kindly drawn for us by a friend who knows her well. "She is just thirty-two," he says, "and not ashamed of her age. She is not tall, nor short, nor stout, but will average 140 pounds. She is not handsome, but good-looking. She is quiet, reserved, repressed, self-poised, and self-controlled to a remarkable degree. But you think of her that still waters run deep. She seems to have had a life—a quiet country town, village, and farm life—that has not been congenial, or rather has not drawn her out at all; and her repressed manner and nature are due possibly to this. There is no gush, no brilliancy, no show, no exuberance in manner, appearance, and style. Her new life will bring her out; but she has nothing of what is called 'society manners,' and will make no impression upon the multitude. Fastidious and feminine to a very high and rare degree in one of such experience, she is a most admirable selection for a wife for Mr. Colfax—a sweet, true, self-adjusted woman, with a younger heart than I ever saw at thirty odd years, who never would make a career for herself, but would accept and fill whatever place came to her in the way of duty." Judging from this brilliant bit of character-painting the women of America will have reason to be satisfied with their representative in the second lady of the nation.

We are also permitted to offer an illustration of Mr. Colfax's gift to his bride, which seems to us a striking index of his own character. It is a necklace, bracelet, and brooch of the finest and purest pearls, most artistically arranged by Messrs. Browne & Spaulding, of New York. This exquisite ornament—so chaste, tasteful, and rich, and withal unpretending and open neither to the charge of niggardliness nor mad prodigality—is a fit offering from a Republican chief to his bride. Among the numerous bridal gifts, we may mention two from Messrs. Browne & Spaulding—a magnificent clock of verd antique bronze, formed of two sturdy Cupids bearing up the world, with the dial on one side, and adorned with appropriate symbols; and a beautiful Ar-gand lamp representing the July Column.

Mr. Colfax is perhaps the most popular man in the United States. Of political foes he doubtless has many; of personal enemies none. His frankness, integrity, and ingrained courtesy win him friends every where; and the whole nation join in congratulating him on his marriage, and wishing him and his bride a future of unbroken felicity.

MONOGRAMS.

IT is noteworthy that folks are curiously careless in the use of monograms, if not ignorant of the true meaning of the term, which they give with indifference to mere ciphers, or compositions of intertwining letters, which have no "mutual" relationship beyond that of neighborhood, which their designers arbitrarily gave. Now, monograms proper are very different from these; they must be composed of letters one or more of the elements or limbs of which serve the purposes of two or more letters; thus, a diphthong is commonly written and printed as a monogram, while, for example, the combined letters A. D., of Albert Dürer's signature, do not always take the form of a true monogram, but, most frequently, are simply imposed the one upon the other, or one within the other.

This practice of uniting may be called the primary law of monogrammatic existence, without obedience to which the thing is not. Other laws dictate for it elegance of form, the artistic or calligraphic quality, and legibility, for no mere puzzle is worthy to be called a monogram. Elegance and legibility may be found in ciphers, i. e., compound and intertwined letters. Reversing letters and employing different alphabets in one combination, whether monogrammatic or not, are childish expedients.

FASHIONS IN HAIR.

IN the early Saxon period long hair seems to have been in the ascendant. In the later Saxon period, notwithstanding Mr. Tennyson's assurance that the Lady Godiva

"Shook her head,
And shower'd the rippled ringlets to her knee," the law of growth had ceased to operate, and the ladies who moved in the courts of Edward the Confessor and Harold could scarcely find tresses enough to hide their snowy necks. With the Normans came better times; but at a later date there was another falling off, and the belles of the time of Richard the Second and Henry the Fourth and Fifth wore no more hair than could be conveniently gathered into the shallow nets of golden thread that depended from their wimples. After the fourteenth century the hair once more fell in ringlets down the back, but by the reign of Henry the Eighth the soil had again become so barren that the close-fitting velvet head-lappet, studded with pearls, was sufficient to hide every lock of it—thereby, in virtue of what modern philosophers would no doubt term a "beneficent law of compensation," relieving the "Bluff King's" headman on several occasions of a very delicate difficulty. With Queen Elizabeth came a prolific and peculiar growth, the hair no longer rippling down the back, but springing upward and outward after the manner of a hardy shrub; and from that time to the present, the same law seems to have operated in the same intermittent manner, either ceasing at intervals and suddenly springing into existence again, or acting by an undulatory method, like the law of tides. The eighteenth century, perhaps, furnished the heaviest growth ever known. There was, indeed, so fine a crop in the reign of William and Mary, that the ladies were driven to make it up into what the common people chose to term "a tower;" but it was in the Georgian era that hair sprang up in its greatest profusion. I have a picture before me now of a lady whose coiffure rises to the height of at least two feet six inches; and I read that so difficult and so costly was the operation of dressing the mass, that it was not at all unusual for the belle of the period to sleep sitting upright in a chair for three or four nights, lest she should disturb the symmetry of the huge structure fashioned by the barber out of her tresses.

EARLY MORNING.

MISTY all is the beautiful sea,
And misty the dreams of life to me;
Who knows what the perfect daylight brings?
Better this haze of imaginings.

Castles are shrouded within the mist,
With glints of sunshine and rose lights kissed,
Mountain paths they are wandering on,
Elysium enfolds them and they are gone.

Whether they lead by crag or fell,
The morning light is too tender to tell;
Whether the castles are rock or cloud,
Is only known to the slumberous shroud.

But to live in the mist-world fair is best,
And to let the beautiful dream-land rest;
So soars the gull with her snow-white wing,
And skims the surface of each fair thing.

Alas! alas! for the sunlight strong,
Dissolving the visions we moved among;
Yet joy, oh, joy for the fierce heats passed,
And the haven gained through the mists at last!

RACHEL'S THANKSGIVING.

IT was Thanksgiving Eve. Thanksgiving Eve, with its low sun setting behind a bank of purple-black cloud, and throwing long bars of orange light athwart the dreary pasture-fields and down the valley that skirted the slow ripple of the Housatonic River. Thanksgiving Eve, with a moaning, restless wind that stirred the drifts of yellow leaves in the chestnut-copse, long ago rifled of its glossy treasures, and rustled sadly among the dead fronds of the sweet-fern on the "huckleberry lots;" where the golden-rod and the blue-fringed aster had faded, and the sharp frosts had touched the vines with a crimson as vivid as if every leaf had been dipped in blood!

Yet, notwithstanding the keen touch of the bleak November blast, growing keener still as the sun dipped lower and lower behind those violet masses of cloud, Elam Barstow stood leaning against the stile of moss-enameled bars, just where you left the road and struck into the "cross-cut" through the woods. It was a sylvan spot in summer-time, full of dense shadow and vague, delicious scents; nor was it entirely without a certain rude fascination even on the very outskirts of winter. The old trees, with their moss-grown and lichened trunks—the network of bare branches creaking overhead at every gust of wind—the carpet of rustling leaves instinct with aromatic odor, and the sweet, mournful hush of the November twilight—Elam Barstow could scarcely have defined all these influences, yet he felt them stirring in the depths of his soul as he stood there, whistling softly to himself, and watching a bright-eyed squirrel as it glided up the trunk of a gigantic old chestnut-tree beyond. And then Elam shaded his eyes with one broad, sun-burnt palm, and looked eagerly off to the westward.

"It beats all she don't come!" he muttered, uneasily.

He was a tall, athletic man, somewhat past the boundaries of middle age, with rude yet not uncomely features, thick black hair, oddly waved and crimped, and an eye keen as a falcon's—an eye which lighted suddenly up as a slight figure became outlined for an instant against the western gold of the sky, where the woodland path opened, far away, and then disappeared into the valley.

Yes, it was Rachel Rivers coming from her daily work in the great brick factory in the vale beyond. Many and many a night he had watched for her, and he would have known her light footfall had he heard it at the very world's end!

She came up, shrouded in the sunset, like a pictured saint which had stepped from the window of some great cathedral—a fair, slender girl with that brilliant type of New England beauty which is at once so exquisite and so curiously unfitted for the bleak climate in which it sometimes expands. Her hair was brown, lighted with gleams of burnished gold; her eyes, deep liquid hazel, bordering on black, had in them a dreamy, languid glitter, stolen from the Orient; and her skin was tinted as delicately as an oleander-blossom, while her lips, red and ripe and velvety, were like fresh coral! And with all this, our calico-dressed damsel carried her small head right royally upon its slender throat, and moved like a princess of the blood, worn and faded as was her shawl, and shabbily trimmed as was her coarse straw-hat with its fluttering blue veil.

"Rachel, let me carry your basket?" But Rachel repulsed him with piquant dignity.

"I can carry it myself, Elam Barstow!"

Elam was a little annoyed; he bit his lip.

"I suppose I may walk with you a part of the way?"

"I suppose you may, if you please. The road is open to all!"

Her hazel orbs shot out a mischievous gleam as she spoke. Elam Barstow felt its soft, defiant flame.

"Rachel!"

"Yes."

"I wish you'd stop a minute."

"Stop here? What for? I'm in a hurry to get home."

"But, Rachel—I must know—I can't endure this suspense, blamed if I can—there now! Why don't you tell a fellow out and out—yes or no?"

Rachel stooped to loose a red maple-leaf from the fringe of her old worsted shawl.

"Tell a fellow what?" she questioned, somewhat imperiously.

"Whether you love me or not."

"That is easily told—no!"

"But, Rachel—little Ray—you can't mean it, I am sure! Just listen to me one minute! I've got a good farm and a good house—you should be a lady, Ray, and never cross the factory threshold more. I'd make the old folks welcome at my fireside as flowers in May—you know I would, Rachel, for your sake. And Hepsy, she'd love you like a sister; she's told me so, time and again! You'll marry me, Rachel—say you will!"

"I shall never say that, Elam Barstow."

"But, Rachel, why?"

She looked at him with that royal way she had. "I do not think you have any right to ask me that question, Elam! But I will answer it, nevertheless. Because I love another—because I have promised to wait for Charles Wayland, your own cousin!"

Elam Barstow's countenance fell visibly.

"I thought you had forgotten that boy-and-girl fancy long ago."

"I have not forgotten it—no, nor ever shall!"

"Do you believe he will ever come back to claim you?"

"If he lives—yes!"

"And if he should be dead?"

"Then I shall live and die true to his memory!"

The words dropped in low-sounding, silver syllables from her lips. She had spoken them very quietly, yet Elam Barstow felt that all the world could not move her one hair's-breadth from her resolve. And the sun went down behind the clouds, and a gloom and shadow seemed suddenly to enwrap the twilight solitude, just as it darkened round his own soul.

"Very well, Rachel," he made answer, sadly.

"I can't press you any more; but Rachel—"

"Yes?"

"You'll come to our house to-morrow? Your father and mother have promised Hepsy to eat their Thanksgiving-dinner with us. You'll come, Rachel, just to show you don't bear any malice for the foolish words I've spoken?"

"Yes, Elam, I'll come!"

So Elam Barstow left her, when the red light from the brown cottage under Beech Mountain shone out across the lonely road, and Rachel went home alone.

The light from the great wood-fire gleamed cheerily upon her as she opened the door, disclosing a quaint little room, low-ceiled, and fragrant with the resinous sap which was bubbling out at the end of the blazing logs—a room wainscoted half the way to the ceiling, and covered with a well-worn rag-carpet, woven by Mrs. Rivers's own thrifty hands. There were two rockers, cushioned in rainbow-colored patchwork, and an old clock all festooned with red-berried asparagus, and a spindle-legged table, and a fat copper tea-kettle swinging from the crane, and a gray cat purring softly on the fire-bricks—the various elements of the picture which constituted home in Rachel Rivers's eyes.

Mrs. Rivers glanced up from her work—a fat, rosy little woman, with cheeks like winter apples, and eyes that still sparkled brightly behind their spectacle-glasses.

"Seems to me you're arly to-night, Rachel!"

"No, mother, I'm a little late."

"Do tell! and I've been so busy tryin' to cut a vest out o' your father's old butternut coat that, somehow, I havin' even heard the clock strike!"

Mr. Rivers chuckled from his station at the right-hand corner of the hearth.

"Mother's dretful smart at contrivin'," he said, "but even she can't make somethin' out o' nothin'; and that old butternut coat comes the nearest to nothin' of any created object I know on! May's well put up your shears, mother—you won't make it go!"

"I'll bet a big apple I will, then!" retorted the plump little matron, briskly. "Look, Ray—a cross-piece here, with the fronts right off the tails, and there'll be enough for lapels and to cover buttons, without ever touching them worn spots!"

Rachel looked down at the melancholy remains of the old butternut coat.

"Oh, mother," she said, with a sudden impulse of loathing at the petty trials and pinchings of her lives, "I wish we were not poor!"

"P'raps we sha'n't be always," said Mrs. Rivers, regarding her daughter keenly over the tops of her spectacles. "There's Elam Barstow, says—"

"Don't, mother—don't!" interrupted Rachel, throwing off her shawl, and hurrying to the fire as if to warm her slender little hands. "Elam Barstow is nothing to me!"

Mrs. Rivers smothered the sharp pang of disappointment at her heart.

"You take me up so quick, Ray," she said, petulantly. "I was only a sayin' Elam's folks has invited us all to their house to Thanksgiving, and I'm glad on't, for somehow our turkeys don't grow fat, and Lyme Dartmouth has sold every one o' them pumpkins upon the mountain, and—"

"And we're poor, mother, and can't afford to set a Thanksgiving-table like we used to—why don't ye speak out at once?" demanded Seth Rivers, with a tremulous motion of his poor old paralytic hands. Come, darter, let's have supper—the kettle's boiled over long ago!"

And Rachel moved about the little room with a sinking at her heart—a vague sense of uncertainty as to whether she were doing wholly and altogether her duty.

"I will work all day in the factory—I will bind shoes all the evening," she thought, within herself. "I will sell my time and my strength and my toil, but I will not sell my heart!"

She sat up late that night, long after old Seth and his wife were in bed and asleep, working at her needle by the sickly light of the solitary tallow-candle, to try and earn a little more money.

"For mother's bonnet can not be bleached again without falling to pieces," she mused, "and father's over-coat is far too shabby to wear another winter!"

So Rachel stitched on at the heap of shoes she was binding, and tried to disguise from herself how weary and sleepy she was, while the crickets chirped shrilly underneath the hearth-stones, and the fire simmered and crackled through the silence.

The clock struck eleven when at last she rose up and glanced out of the window.

"How dark it is, and how the wind howls!" she murmured to herself, with an instinctive feeling of pity for stray travelers toiling along the solitary road. "Thank Heaven, we are not so poor as some in this world!"

And when Thanksgiving morning dawned the chill gray air was full of lazily falling flakes of starry snow.

"I knowed it was goin' to snow," said old Seth Rivers; "I felt it in my bones last night. Well, I do like seasonable weather."

The same snow, falling faster now, and with a persistency which threatened a prolonged storm, clinked against the window-panes of the huge kitchen in Elam Barstow's hospitable farm-house, and fringed the boughs of the old hemlocks in the door-yard with ermine whiteness; while Miss Hepsy, a spare maiden lady somewhat above forty, hurried back and forth, intent on festive preparation.

The Thanksgiving table, already set in the "big keepin'-room," was worthy of Miss Hepsy's reputation as a thorough-going housekeeper. The damask table-cloth, white as snow, hung in scarcely-disturbed folds; a few late chrysanthemums were disposed among sprays of evergreen box in vases at either end; there were plates of crimson, shining apples, streaked with gold; dainty cranberry tarts peeping like red eyes from behind bars of flaky crust; exquisitely browned pumpkins; glass preserve-dishes, where amber-clear quinces and quivering moulds of currant jelly shone and glimmered; and plates of elaborately cracked butternuts and hickory-nuts. For Miss Hepsy did not believe in the modern custom of bringing on the dessert as a separate and independent affair.

"Let folks see what they've got afore 'em to eat at once," she said, "and manage matters accordin'." That's my doctrine!

With a last glance at that royal bird, the turkey, now peacefully browning in the huge brick oven, and dispensing a most savory odor round his funeral pyre, Miss Hepsy hurried to the window to look up the road, now half obscured by the veil of fluttering snow.

"They'd ought to be here pretty soon," she said, reflectively. "Did you tell 'em dinner was at twelve, exactly, Elam?"

Elam, who was sitting by the fire, evidently ill at ease in his new blue suit, nodded, and poked the back log with his foot.

Miss Hepsy chuckled gleefully.

"How Rachel will stare, to be sure! And if 'twan't the luckiest thing you happened to be out there with your lantern just at the precise minute the stage passed! I tell ye what, Elam, I guess we two'll hev to live it out together, old bachelor and old maid."

"Yes," growled Elam, "cause we can't neither on us help it."

Miss Hepsy bridled a little.

"Now, Elam Barstow, you know that ain't so; I never telled ye the hull story 'bout Squire Lounsbury—"

"I know it well enough," interrupted Mr. Barstow, rather ungraciously; "how you and Seliny Fairweather pulled caps 'bout him, and how finally he give you both the slip an' went off and married Ruth Ann Parker, out to Danbury."

Miss Hepsy bit her lip.

"Elam Barstow," she began—but, luckily for honest Elam, the storm about to break on his devoted head was averted by his sister's happening to spy through the window her approaching guests, and, stopping short in her wrathful oratory, she ran to open the big front-door and bawl a welcome long ere the new-comers could hear it.

"Do come in!" she shouted, hospitably pulling plump little Mrs. Rivers across the threshold. "I'm proper glad to see ye. Walk in, Squire, and you too, Rachel. You do look jest 's pretty as a posy to-day, with the snow all over your hood!"

Miss Hepsy was undeniably right. Rachel did look flower-like in her fresh, bright loveliness. Her "best dress" was nothing very extraordinary—a simple crimson delaine, with snow-white linen bands at throat and wrists, and a little gold brooch forming her only ornament; but not all the moiré antique or velvet that ever glistened behind the plate-glass windows of Broadway "maisons de mode" could have improved her appearance.

"Set down—set down afore the fire," said Miss Hepsy. "Elam, take Mr. Rivers's hat. Do let me rid you of your shawl, Mrs. Rivers. Rachel, you just go in the front-room—you're young, an' I'll want to fix up a little, likely; and there's a fire there. Go—quick!"

"I can take off my things just as well here, Miss Hepsy."

"Oh pshaw! no, you can't. Here—in there!" Rachel wondered a little at Miss Hepsy's evident anxiety to get her into the "front-room," but concluded that probably there was a new carpet or curtains, or something which the thrifty housekeeper had on exhibition. So she walked slowly in, with her shawl on her arm, and untying her hood as she went.

Yes, Miss Hepsy Barstow had something there, but it was neither carpet, curtains, nor new china vases. And Rachel's astonished glance fell on a tall, good-looking young man, who stood before the blazing hearth, looking down upon her with a world of happy mischief in his brilliant black eyes!

And the next moment he had caught her in his arms, smothering her astonished cry with a shower of genuinely lover-like kisses!

"Rachel! my love! my dear little blossom!"

"Charlie Wayland!"

For it was Charlie's self, bronzed and travel-worn, and perhaps a trifle more self-reliant and dignified, but the same Charlie still, who had wooed and won her two long years ago!

"Did you think I was never coming back, Rachel? Did you begin to fancy I was false? Oh, my little queen, if you could but know how I have looked forward to this hour!"

"I have sometimes fancied you might be dead, Charles," she answered, simply; "but I never thought you false."

He folded her mutely to his breast, and there was silence for a minute or two.

"I have come back to stay now, Rachel," he said, quietly. "I went away to seek my fortune, and I have found it. There shall be no more partings, dear!"

"Does Elam know?" whispered Rachel.

"Elam brought me home here last night when I alighted, chilled and half frozen with the cold. He would not allow me to go to your house, but told me that I must spend Thanksgiving with him—that you must first look upon my face underneath his roof. Bless the old fellow's noble heart! I believe he is nearly as happy now as I am."

Rachel winced a little; the roses deepened on her satin cheek; but in her inmost heart she too could have invoked blessings upon the sturdy farmer who had loved her so dearly and so utterly in vain; while Charles Wayland, unconscious of what was passing through his betrothed's mind, went on:

"For two years I have suffered all the pangs of homesickness among the orange groves and scented breezes of the Spanish vales; now I shall spend Thanksgiving in spirit and in truth in my own old New England home. Oh, Ray, if you could but know how beautiful the rugged mountains look, with their bleak crags and draperies of pine forest!—if you could feel the exultant leap of my heart when the first snow-flakes began to drift down among the yellow leaves! and—"

But here Miss Hepsy's voice interrupted them. "Dinner's ready," she announced, "and you've been talkin' a full half hour here."

"Now, Hepsy, that's simply nonsense," cried Charlie, incredulously.

"Well, if ye don't believe me, you may just look at the clock. Come, Rachel, there's no use lookin' sheepish and hangin' back: they know all about it in t'other room, 'cause Elam's told 'em. Come, Charlie! I don't know whether they raise turkeys in Spain, but if they do I'll stump 'em to beat the one I've got on the table to-day."

And Miss Hepsy, ushering her guests into the banquetting apartment, pointed triumphantly at the unctuous bird, which lay, with smoking sides and skewered wings, upon the very centre of the board.

"There's a turkey for you!" quoth Hepsy.

But we are very much afraid, speaking veraciously, as all chroniclers should, that Rachel Rivers did not properly appreciate Miss Hepsy Barstow's Thanksgiving dinner. She sat at the table like one in a dream, thoughtful, absent, but blushing ever and anon, until, as Elam sagely observed, "the currant jel" wasn't a circumstance to her cheeks."

They walked home together, just "on the edge of the evening," as the quaint old expression goes. Farmer Rivers trudged on first, arm in arm with his plump helpmate, and Rachel followed with Charles Wayland. The night had set in stormy and cold; the wind "keened" sorrowfully through the boughs of the hemlocks and leafless birch-trees that skirted the road; and the snow fell fast and noiselessly around them; but to Rachel it seemed as if she passed over roses, with the sunshine of the tropics raining its gold around her.

For she knew that this Thanksgiving-day, whose sun had gone down behind the dreary mountain-tops, would shine forever in her heart.

VELOCIPEDES.

THE velocipedists have stolen a march on the coming flying man; for while he is busy adjusting the wings with which he intends to navigate the clouds, they have attached wheels to their legs, enabling them to skim the earth with the speed of a fast-trotting horse. The resurrection of velocipedes—a ninety years' old invention—is due to the petits crevés and cocottes of Paris. At the present moment, however, they are a mania with all classes, and count among their more fervent partisans princes, dukes, and other titled personages, several high functionaries, and even one staid member of the French Academy. Every alternate Sunday or so velocipede races have taken place in the environs of Paris—at St. Cloud, Vincennes, Enghien, Pantin, and elsewhere. Mounted, too, upon these flying horses, amateurs dash along the crowded thoroughfares of the capital, while adepts at the risk of their lives drive their velocipedes of two wheels—one directly in front of the other—along the narrow stone parapet at the side of the Seine, and down the hundred and one steps of the Trocadéro; rising up in their seats, lying down on their backs, letting go the handle of the vehicle, and throwing both legs over it while performing these daring feats. Government employés living in the suburbs ride to their offices every morning on the new iron horse. You may see them on their return journey at night, steering in between the throng of carriages with lighted lanterns swinging in front of them, and with other velocipedes sent out by enterprising tradesmen displaying illuminated advertisements before and aft. The compositors of Galignani's Messenger and other newspapers are said to go to and return from work on velocipedes; and several of the collecting clerks of the Bank of France have begun to use them. Provincials stare aghast at these modern centaurs dashing in and out the whirl of vehicles, much as the country people of old did at the apparition of the Thessalonians mounted on the horses which they were the first to tame; while the cabmen of the capital exhibit their hostility by dodging in front of the velocipedists whenever they get the chance, and by chaffing such amateurs as are not sufficiently expert to give them a wide berth. Prices of velocipedes are advertised on the walls, outside the kiosques of the Boulevards, and in all the papers, and announcements of lessons on the art of managing them may be met with in almost every journal, and posted up in all quarters of Paris. The public schools, too, are to have professors to lecture on the new method of locomotion, and to teach the youth of France how to manage the willing steed. Meanwhile the Prince Imperial has been furnished with a "vélocipède de luxe" mounted in rosewood and aluminum bronze.

Paris is in a perfect state of frenzy with respect to its new toy. The newspapers call upon the government to order a supply of velocipedes to save the overworked legs of the rural postmen and of the messengers attached to the provincial telegraph bureaux; and even advise a limited number of these vehicles being furnished to infantry regiments, to enable outposts to reconnoitre and to communicate rapidly with the main body of the army. Some, carried away by their enthusiasm, ask why a species of light cavalry, mounted on velocipedes, should not be instituted. It is suggested, too, that life-boat crews on thinly-populated coasts should be provided with velocipedes, by means of which a more rapid assembling of them in time of need might be effected; and, moreover, that gardes champêtres, and country doctors and curés who can not afford the expense of a horse, should travel about on the new vehicles, which, by-the-way, have already penetrated to the provinces, for sea-side loungers, mounted on them, were to be seen at all the Norman and Breton watering-places, and on the shores of the Mediterranean, coursing along the coast. Eccentric sportsmen, too, chase their game with velocipedes; artists use them to go sketching tours, and photographers employ them on distant expeditions. Guests at country châteaux organize races with velocipedes among themselves, just as here they do games at croquet; and at a recent election contest in the department of the Var, on its being discovered that the government had hired all the public vehicles in Toulon for the day of the election, the partisans of the opposition candidate procured a supply of velocipedes, on which the liberal electors dashed to the poll. Dramatists introduce velocipedes into their pieces; and at several Parisian theatres they play a prominent part in some of the more striking scenes. Caricaturists, however, have turned them most to account, for every week brings forth some pictorial skit in which they occupy the first place. The toy-dealers, too, have not been idle, for you can not pass along the Boulevards without getting your feet entangled in a toy velocipede, mounting a large red lantern—at present a prohibited emblem in Paris—and with the rider working his arms and legs up and down like an ordinary scaramouche, which some enterprising hawk, the better to display its attractions, has set going along the asphalt pavement.

The velocipedes about which the Parisians have run mad at the present moment are of various kinds. Some have two and others three and even four wheels; all have either pedals or reels on which to place the feet, and usually either breaks or levers to regulate the speed. The two-wheel velocipedes, the bicycles as they are styled, are intended for the male sex only, and are by far the swiftest machines. They are usually of wrought iron, and have pedals or reels attached to the front and larger wheel, and the working of which, by a light movement of the feet, gives the requisite impulsion to the vehicle. The saddle is poised on a bar of iron suspended a few inches above the top of the fore-wheel. The hands rest on a handle in front of the machine, which, working on a pivot, serves as a balancing-pole, the equilibrium being preserved by giving a slight twist to this handle. The break, which at once stops the revolving motion of the wheel, is applied by means of a sharper twist. Here are the rules which one of the most skillful amateurs has drawn up for the guidance of beginners:

"Run beside your iron horse, leading it, as it were, with your hand, so as to familiarize yourself with its movements: this will be an affair of a few minutes merely. Then commence practicing with it on a slope, and after mounting it, let it move forward of its own accord, while you occupy yourself with studying the effects produced by the inclination which you give to the balancing-pole or handle of the machine. When you thoroughly understand the action of this, place one foot on the pedal and follow its movements without assisting them. The difficulty with beginners is to restrain the unnecessary expenditure of muscular force; they ordinarily perform ten times the labor that is requisite. Next repeat the experiment on level ground, having both feet on the pedals, and working them alternately with scrupulous regularity. Speed is obtained by simply accelerating this movement.

"After an hour or two's practice the tyro will be able to accomplish a distance of from thirty to forty yards without running the risk of an upset. Should the machine incline on one side, all that is necessary to be done is to remove the foot on the same side from the pedal and place it on the ground. This can, of course, only be accomplished when the velocipede is of a moderate height, which, by-the-way, is the proper kind of machine for beginners to make their first essays with.

"To alight, both feet are raised from the pedals at the same instant, which has the effect of slackening the speed of the machine; the feet are then placed simultaneously on the ground without the handle being let go."

THREE-WHEELED VELOCIPEDE, WITH CHECK, LEVER, AND ECCENTRIC STOP.

The tricycle, or three-wheel velocipede, is easier to guide and safer to use than the bicycle; its speed is, however, less rapid, still it can be made to pass a carriage going at full trot. As the fair sex largely patronize this vehicle, the seat is more commodious than that of the bicycle, having sides and back of wicker, and a horse-hair cushion to sit upon. The hind-wheels, though large, are light, and revolve with facility; the fore-wheel, which is smaller, serves to guide the machine, being acted on by means of the handle, which causes it instantly to turn in the direction indicated by the rider. The pedals are shaped like slippers, which facilitates the movements of the legs, and at the same time admits of the foot being disengaged instantaneously. The movement required to impel the machine is a perfectly natural one, analogous, in fact, to that of walking—that is to say, without the slightest pressure of the foot, and certainly without producing any unusual fatigue, for the motion of the leg develops itself, as it were, until the limb becomes fully extended, entirely without effort. In addition to all these advantages, the larger three-wheel velocipedes have a lever which follows the line of the eccentrics attached to the pedals, and fits on to the axles. By assisting the movements of this lever the speed of the vehicle is considerably increased, and a simple pressure against it checks the rotary movement of the wheel, and stops the progress of the machine. This lever is, in fact, both a means of impulsion and a break.

Ordinary two-wheel velocipedes range in price from two hundred up to four hundred francs, according to the completeness of their fittings. Vélocipèdes de luxe mount up almost to any sum. Three-wheel machines are priced at from one hundred and sixty to two hundred and fifty francs, while smaller sizes for children can be purchased for fifty francs. The somewhat numerous et cæteras comprise the requisite instruments in the event of the machine getting out of order on a journey, with a lantern, a grease-box, India rubber cushions for the iron bar in front of the machine on which the legs are generally allowed to rest when not in action, and an indicator to mark the distance traveled.

TWO-WHEELED VELOCIPEDE.

The speed attained by the swifter kind of velocipedes averages from twelve to thirteen miles an hour; adepts find no difficulty whatever in accomplishing fully fifty miles within five hours without once alighting from their vehicles. A couple of amateurs making a tour through a part of France challenged each other as to which could perform the greatest distance within four-and-twenty hours. One gave in after having accomplished eighty-seven miles; the other went on an additional six-and-thirty miles, making one hundred and twenty-three miles in all. On the 21st of last September a party of nine quitted Rouen early in the morning mounted upon velocipedes, and arrived in Paris in time for dinner the same evening, having performed the distance of eighty-five miles, exclusive of stoppages, at a rate of speed averaging between ten and eleven miles an hour. It should be understood that in impelling a velocipede the limbs are not constantly in motion, as on level ground when the impetus is at the average rate, or when the machine is descending an incline, the feet may be removed from the pedals, and the legs be placed on the bar fixed in front of the velocipede for this purpose. A slight impulsion given to the vehicle from time to time suffices to keep up the speed. The ascent of any incline greater than 1 in 25 is said to be impracticable. When the rider, therefore, encounters a hill of more than average steepness, he has to dismount and lead his velocipede with his hand, which we are told he can do with almost the same ease as he can carry an ordinary walking-stick.

The velocipede races in the suburbs of Paris are ordinarily rather exciting affairs. Advantage is generally taken of some fête-day, when the village selected to be invaded will be certain to be in holiday guise, with tri-color flags flying from the tops of tall Venetian masts, and decking the "Mairie" from roof to basement; when property pasteboard eagles, and laurel wreaths, and imperial crowns and ciphers as brilliant as Dutch metal can make them, and hired for the occasion, will be certain to meet the eye at every turn; and when across the streets a few score colored lamps will be seen suspended, to imply that a fête de nuit, in other words, illuminations, fire-works, and dancing and drinking in the booths until midnight, may be counted upon. Perhaps Monsieur le Maire in his tri-color scarf of office will favor the races with his presence. Sapeurs-pompiers, with their broad belts, their big brass helmets, and affected military swagger, are certain to be particularly grand on these occasions, rendering the tall gens d'armes in their large cocked hats, their bulky breeches, their long sabres, and their somewhat ferocious-looking mustaches, more than a trifle jealous. The racing-ground is all marked out with flags, and there is certain to be a large cluster of banners flying at the starting-place, near to which, in some reserved enclosure, scores of velocipedists are exercising their docile steeds. A certain number of them wear jockey-caps and jackets of various-colored silks, and all appear to have their legs incased in high leather boots. The moment of starting arrives, and the competitors are duly drawn up abreast, with as great a distance between each as the width of the course will allow. The fair sex mount on chairs, and wave their little hands, and flourish their pocket-handkerchiefs, and laugh and almost scream with delight as at the grounding of the starter's flag their several favorites dart off, working their legs up and down with such an amount of energy that one can not help thinking a fortnight's exercise upon the tread-mill would be admirable probationary training for this sort of contest. Spite of the exertions of the tall gens d'armes, the crowd closes in behind the competing charioteers, who are consequently soon lost to sight. After the lapse of a few minutes, however, distant shouts and cheers announce their return, and the crowd opens to allow of the passage of the victor, who, drenched in perspiration, and with his legs working up and down with equal regularity and greater speed than the piston of a steam-engine, the safety-valve of which is fastened down, passes the winning-post amidst the cheers and laughter of the crowd, who enjoy the sport more than they would the finest horse-race, and as soon as he has dismounted proceeds to dip his sun-burnt beak into a foaming glass of Strasbourg beer.

At these races the average length of the course is 1800 mètres, nearly a mile and a furlong. At Enghien this distance was traversed—a portion of it being over a stone-paved road—in 4 minutes and 25 seconds by a velocipede with two wheels, and in 6 minutes and 28 seconds by a velocipede with three wheels. At Vincennes the same distance took 5 minutes and 5 minutes 45 seconds respectively to accomplish, two-wheel velocipedes only competing. Greater speed was attained at St. Cloud, when the course of 2400 mètres, almost equivalent to a mile and a half, with an incline of 3 in 100 for a third of the distance, was traversed in 4 minutes and 50 seconds; whereas the final race at Vincennes over a level course of 3600 mètres—20 yards short of 2 miles—took 9 minutes and 10 seconds to accomplish. But at these races prizes are not given for speed alone; they are also accorded to those who occupy the longest time in traversing a specified distance, a far more difficult proceeding than accomplishing a mile in a few minutes, as when going at a snail's pace it is almost impossible to preserve the proper balance, and horse and rider are usually both capsized. In a contest of this character at Vincennes, over a course of some 160 yards in length, out of six experienced amateurs who started only one succeeded in reaching the goal. In another race over the same course, where the competitors were deprived of the means of steering their vehicles, out of seven who started only two arrived at the winning-post.

The prizes given at the foregoing contests have been usually gold and silver medals and silver cups; now and then, however, money prizes of 500 francs are awarded. Several efforts have been made to induce the fair sex to compete at these races, but hitherto without success, although they are ready enough to engage in a contest with any casual cavalier whom they may encounter on his velocipede in the Bois de Boulogne. The latest novelty in the velocipede line is the podoscaphe or vélocipède-marin, as it is called, formed of a couple of canoes covered with canvas and joined together by two iron bars, between which is a paddle-wheel put in motion by means of two pedals placed at the extremity of the arc. These machines may be constantly seen in action on the lake of the Bois de Boulogne and on the lake at Enghien, and even on the Seine itself opposite the Tuileries. The inventor is sanguine that these machines will eventually attain the same rate of speed as the land velocipede already accomplishes. Quite recently an enterprising amateur offered to wager 10,000 francs that he would cross the channel between Boulogne and Folkestone on a velocipède-marin within the limit of three hours—wind and weather, we presume, permitting!

BOUND TO JOHN COMPANY; OR, THE Adventures and Misadventures of Robert Ainsleigh.

CHAPTER XVII.

OMICHUND, THE ENGLISH ALLY.

THESE conversations, in the course of which Mr. Holwell thus acquainted me with Indian politics, took place in the leisure intervals of two busy lives. My patron's own numerous duties and high responsibilities kept him employed during all the working hours of the day, and during many weary hours in which no one but himself would have cared to work; while I, stimulated by his example, labored as unremittingly in my own humbler function. Nor did I confine myself to a clerk's drudgery, for I had taken to heart Mr. Holwell's remarks on the importance of an acquaintance with the native language, and I devoted a great deal of my spare time to the study of Persian, Hindoostanee, and the vulgar Bengalee, under the tuition of a mild-faced moon-shee, who came to my quarters nightly to instruct me in those tongues. With this learned man I read the original Shastah, and its more modern and corrupt versions, and thus became familiar with the theogony of Hindostan, between which and the Greek system, as recorded by Hesiod, I did not fail to find occasional coincidences. It was, indeed, to hard mental labor that I could alone look for distraction from the painful reflections which oppressed me in this early period of my exile. I had now been a year and a half in Bengal, but had received no letter from England, though I had written three times to my benefactress, in each several letter setting forth my griefs with all the persistence of despair. Immediately after my removal from the garrison I had taken advantage of my liberty to write and dispatch two other letters; the first to Mr. Swinfen, of the Temple, to whom I related my sad story in its fullest details, and whom I entreated to take possession of the books and other property I had left in my chambers, among which was the Spanish translation of the Imitation of Christ, given to me by Dorothea Hemsley. I did not, of course, fail to inform Mr. Swinfen how kind a friend I had found in Mr. Holwell; nor did I omit to ask his advice upon the legality of my shameful marriage. My second letter was addressed to my old guardian and tutor, Anthony Grimshaw, in whom I scarce doubted I yet possessed a friend, however foully I might have been slandered in his hearing. From him I entreated tidings of those I so fondly loved, and so cruelly had lost. To him also I gave a full account of my adventures, for I was determined that if my wrongs could be righted, the opportunity of righting them should not be lost by any omission on my part.

Having done this I felt somewhat easier in my mind, and better able to devote myself to my daily labors. That was for me a most favorable hour in which my grandfather, Colonel Ainsleigh, had the good fortune to rescue Mr. Holwell's father from the enemy's fire, for I found in this gentleman a constant and affectionate friend. Amply did he repay the debt which he owed my ancestor. He rescued me from a living death, far worse than the swift annihilation of a cannon-ball, and taught me to hope when every circumstance of my life tempted me to despair.

"Your moon-shee gives me a most glowing account of your progress, Bob," he said to me one day, after I had been six months an inhabitant of his house. "That old book-worm house-steward, of whom you tell me, seems to have grounded you admirably in Sanscrit, and you have, I think, a natural talent for languages. Rely on it, that a familiarity with the native tongues is the safest stepping-stone to success in this country, and the young Englishmen who neglect such studies are stone-blind to their own interests. Dupleix has profited greatly by the assistance of his Creole wife, who was born and educated in Bengal, and whose familiarity with the language and usages of the people, to say nothing of her natural talent for diplomacy, has enabled her to aid and abet him in all his Oriental intrigues. The day will perhaps come when you will have reason to bless Providence for your forced voyage to the East. The stagnation of affairs in this presidency is but a false calm. Be sure we shall have stirring scenes enough by-and-by, and a hard fight to hold our own. But whatever struggles await us I hope every thing from the English spirit when once fairly aroused. The British lion is a beast that sleeps long and soundly, but God help his enemies in the hour of his awakening! The French have been for a long time past trying to show us the road to glory, and I think young Clive is beginning to show them that we are capable of learning the lesson. And now, Robert, I want you to put aside your respectable moon-shee for to-night, and come with me to a festival that is to be given by our friend and ally the Omichund, a Gentoo merchant, and one of the most remarkable men in this country."

"I shall be proud to accompany you, Sir. But, pray, in what does Mr. Omichund's chief merit or genius consist?"

"Why, faith, Bob, if the truth must be told, I think his chief gift is that which most rapidly wins a man distinction at home, in our native country, as well as among these unenlightened heathens. He has the true Gentoo genius for making money, and for the last forty years has devoted all the forces of his mind to that delightful occupation. Our Company has allowed him to provide more of our investments than any other contractor, and by this indulgence on our part—which is against our own rules—and sundry other privileges, he has become the richest man in the colony. His trade extends to the uttermost limits of Bengal and Behar, and his influence with the officers of Allaverdy's court at Muxadavad is so considerable that we sometimes stoop to employ him as our mediator when we want to get the ear of the nabob. Not a very honorable position for John Company, is it, Bob? But I live in hope the day will come when John will no longer prostrate himself with eight members before the Mahometan musnud; but will stand erect and defend his hardly-won privileges at the point of the sword. In the mean time we are about to make a serious change in our house, round which a crowd of natives were clamoring, with angry gesticulations and frantic cries. This, Mr. Holwell pointed out to me as the Catwallee, a minor police-court, where petty grievances are redressed, and a kind of rough-and-ready justice administered.

We found the Gentoo merchant's house a handsomer edifice than any I had yet seen, and brilliantly illuminated. A mixed crowd of guests and lookers-on were congregated at the gates, through which we pushed our way into a spacious hall or quadrangular court, occupying the centre of the house, and surrounded by two galleries with innumerable doors, opening into small apartments. The upper story Mr. Holwell pointed out to me as devoted to the women of the household, who, although invisible to us, were watching the entertainment from the covert of their Venetian lattices. I had afterward good reason to remember this upper story, and one of its beautiful inhabitants.

The court, which, like a Sevillian hall, is at ordinary times open to the sky, was for this occasion roofed-in with red cloth, and lighted with countless lamps. The white-muslin draperies and rich embroidered costumes of the guests; the necklaces and aigrettes of rainbow-tinted gems that flashed in strange contrast to their ders, I can but deprecate the bad taste of Herod as much as I abhor his cruelty. Both Mr. Holwell and myself grew heartily weary of this performance, during which we discovered that the splendor of Omichund's palace did not exempt us from the natives' scourge of mosquitoes, which venomous insects tormented us throughout the evening.

Immediately upon the conclusion of the dance, the great Gentoo merchant espied us, and advanced to welcome Mr. Holwell with demonstrative respect. They talked together for some time in Hindoostanee, and I had ample leisure in which to observe Mr. Omichund. He was a man of advanced years, forty of which he had spent in the harassing pursuit of wealth. Time thus employed had left its traces upon a countenance that had once been handsome, and which was of the most refined native type. But in the expression of that countenance I read only evil. A crafty nature had set its seal upon every feature of the Gentoo's face. While the flexile mouth expressed only meekness and submission, the restlessness of the observant eyes belied its amiable tranquillity; and in those bright and watchful eyes I fancied I could discover a latent fierceness that augured ill for Mr. Omichund's enemies.

He had evidently got wind of the discussions respecting him that had taken place in council, and of the intention to reduce his privileges, and it was with reference to this that he shaped his conversation to-night.

"I have been a faithful servant to the Honorable Company, Mr. Holwell Sahib," he said, "and have stood between my honorable masters and the nabob's anger many times. The English do not know the nabob as Omichund knows him. These Mahometans are all false; they are false as lies. With one hand they will sign a treaty, while with the other they invoke Allah's vengeance on the party to the bond. Do not let the Honorable Company trust the nabob unless they have a friend at the Durbar—an Indian like Omichund, who has spent his life among these Mahometans and knows how to deal with them. The Honorable Company have hidden enemies at the Durbar. The French governor, Dupleix, is very powerful—oh, he is great and powerful, like the old Nizam, and has a head like him to plot and plan. Governor Dupleix and Jan Begum, his wife, have their spies every where. She writes many letters—clever letters—that win friends for Dupleix and the French; for she knows these Mahometans, but not as Omichund knows them. She has not had forty years of dealings with them, as he has. The French are better liked in Bengal than the English; and if the Honorable Company does not keep a friend at the Durbar there will be danger, much danger."

"From what quarter, Omichund?" asked Mr. Holwell, quietly.

"From the French, from the old nabob, and still more from his grand-nephew, Mirza Mahmud, who will succeed him, and who hates the English. He has the heart of a tiger, that young man, with the courage of a rat, and he loves only evil. Let the Honorable Company trust Omichund, and he will by-and-by show them wonderful things and gain them great friends. It is not so sure that Mirza Mahmud shall succeed to the musnud."

"Indeed! And who is the pretender?"

"It is too soon to tell you that; Omichund knows many secrets, and has much power. It will be well for the Honorable Company if they treat him generously. But if they rob me of hard-won privileges—nay, Sahib, I am not the man to threaten," said the merchant, checking himself suddenly, but with an ominous light in his eyes that was in itself a threat.

"I know that Omichund also has enemies," he went on, in a more tranquil tone, "enemies who grudge him the wealth he has earned by prudence and unremitting toil and faithful service to his honorable masters, and those slanderous tongues would do him evil with the honorable council. But his honorable masters are too wise to listen to such base whisperers. They know they have a good friend in Omichund."

To this, and much more to the same effect, did Mr. Holwell listen with that inscrutable calm which was one of his finest gifts. He had indeed a rare aptitude for business, and a genius for coping with the difficulties and niceties of a perplexing position.

"I am but an insignificant member of the council, Omichund," he said at last, "and have little power to influence its decisions. Rely upon it the Company are grateful for all faithful service, and in any thing they may do will be influenced only by conscientious motives. But let me not detain you too long from your Gentoo friends, who will be ill-pleased if you devote all your attention to a single English guest."

On this our host quitted us, but not without many obeisances and Oriental compliments.

"The old fox has been informed of our intentions with regard to him," Mr. Holwell observed to me when Omichund had left us, "and I suspect he means mischief. Nothing could be more unwise than to employ him as we have employed him, except this culminating folly of diminishing his privileges. We suffer the man to become possessed of inordinate power, and choose the moment when he is strongest to offer him mortal offense. Upon my word, Bob, this management of affairs in Bengal is about the prettiest comedy of errors that was ever enacted."

The time came, and but too speedily, when Mr. Holwell had occasion to denigrate the mismanaged business of Calcutta a tragedy, and not a comedy, of errors.

Before he could say more to me we were escorted to the supper-room, where we found ourselves placed at one of the highest tables, to partake of a sumptuous banquet, amidst the hubbub of some five hundred attendants and the discordant noise of barbarous Hindoo music.

OMICHUND'S NATCH.

trading arrangements, and to retrench Mr. Omichund's privileges in a manner which will, I fear, sorely vex that pious Gentoo's soul. Yet it is but one of the trials which he has a right to expect in this ninth stage of purgation. The truth of the matter is, that we have discovered a very serious decline in the qualities of the merchandise provided by his agency, together with as serious an advance in its price. But the man is useful, and it would be a dangerous thing for us to offend him, for which reason I have accepted his to-night's invitation to a natch. Nothing gratifies these people more than the presence of Europeans at their festivals."

We were carried to Omichund's house in palanquins. Calcutta, when I first knew it, had been in existence less than fifty years, and was but a sorry assemblage of bamboo huts and the curious open shops of the natives, interspersed with occasional large and sometimes handsome houses belonging to Armenian, native, and English merchants; while here and there an insignificant building of painted brick and plaster, surmounted by three small domes, proclaimed itself the temple of the Mahometan faith; but how different from the pompous mosque of St. Sophia, or the Jumma Musjeed (chief cathedral) of Delhi, with its rich blending of dark-red sandstone and pure white marble!

At the corner of a road we passed a mean and dirty tawny skins, and shone only less brightly than their piercing black eyes; the crowd of servants, of whom my companion informed me Mr. Omichund possessed three hundred, and who were augmented by the retainers brought by his visitors; the buzzing of many tongues, the confusion of perpetual movement, and the curious inharmonious native music—combined to render the scene one of dazzling bewilderment to my unaccustomed senses. This was indeed an introduction to fairy-land, and its utter novelty for the moment carried me completely out of myself.

Now began the amusement of the evening. A band of public dancing-girls advanced into the centre of the hall, and performed a strange barbaric dance, which had in it few elements of European dancing. Nothing did I ever behold so devoid of loveliness, for while the arms, body, and head were exercised in every variety of contortion, the feet, though constantly moving, never stirred from the same spot. Whatever dramatic story might be told by the performance—and the changeful expression of the dancers' countenances seemed to have some dramatic significance—was beyond my humble faculties, and if it was by such strained movements and monotonous posturings that the daughter of Herodias danced St. John the Baptist's head off his shoulder,

THEY say thee false and do thee wrong,
Jeffray! Jeffray!
Although thou art the properest man
In all Mettray:
They call thee by a name that sounds
Like—popinjay!

Thy doublet's orange-tawny stripe
With azure blends;
Starch of the couleur d'Isabel
Thy ruff distends;
Thy leg, in amber hose, and thou
Art best of friends.

And yet they flout at thee apart,
Jeffray! Jeffray!
A chaffinch hath a larger heart,
Our gossips say,
And would in love feel keener smart;
Alack the day!

To feast thou dost delight, and then
To take thine ease,
Till fair Jehane, who every eye
Save thine can please,
Comes stealing with a barley-ear
To touch and tease.

'Tis said that any living man
His ears would lose
For bright Jehane thy cousin's sake,
Whom thou dost use
No better than to bid her hence—
That thou mayst snooze!

Jehane the fair! Jehane the fresh!
The rose of May!
Art thou so fond of thy sweet self
That, day by day,
Thou seest her and yet seest her not,
Jeffray! Jeffray!

SIMONA.

See illustration on page 924.

A TALE of Florence in the former days;
Of her whose eyes were not the bright bluebell,
No rose her lips, her hair no sunflower's blaze;
Yet happy spring were that, if ever fell
On leaf or flower, in garden, wood, or dell,
Tints, O Simona! warm and bright as thine,
As warm as those which Pasquin loved so well;
And happy earth were that on which should shine
A heaven as deeply blue as thy deep liquid eyne!

A tale of Florence in the olden time;
Of fair Simona, who had little here
But love; and once, in that all-golden clime,
Sat spinning wool till Pasquin should appear Beneath her window. Sudden on her ear
His footstep fell: joy trembled in her eyes;
And as her wheel went round she murmured, "Near, Nearer he comes: to bring me wool he hies!"
And then she kissed her wheel with secret smiles and sighs.

Thus on, from day to day, came snowy wool—
Her web was perfect as her face was fair—
Till the pure moon of their young love was full,
And in a summer morning debonair,
When songs of birds filled all the buxom air,
Her distaff fell upon the ground, and she Gave sweet consent. There was a garden there Without the walls, for love and reverie
A paradise; thither to come they did agree.

And so, on Sunday came. Lagine, her friend,
Was with Simona; he Puccino took;
For base-bred custom to these bonds did bend
True love, who could such bondage scarcely brook.
So, long time on the setting sun did look Simona and her fere; but when Lagine
Wandered far westward with her friend, a nook,
A mossy nook, o'erarched with glooming green,
Made a brief silent twilight for their loves unseen.

O Love, who makest life sweet and yet so sad!
What fate directed Pasquin, canst thou tell,
To that fair-seeming midnight weed, and bad
His burning lips to press it, till he fell Prone, dying, on the grass in that green dell?
Night's lasting shadow sudden from his bride
Divided him—from her he loved so well:
He saw her not, but felt from side to side
With quivering hands; once called her dearest name, and died.

She thought it but some transitory pain,
Till Death with hasty touch his roseate hue
Defiled with livid spots, the poison's stain;
His brow, so bright but now, so loathly grew,
That she, even she, recoiled; Hope, sighing flew,
Last consolation. Curious neighbors came,
As men will come to see some sorry view,
In numbers; and Lagine, with face of flame,
Cried, "Thou hast poisoned him, to thine eternal shame!"

Simona nothing heard; but dumb and still,
Still as upon a grave a frozen stone,
Sat with her sunny head bowed down, until
They hailed her to the judge; where, all alone
In that cold crowd, she wept her darling gone.
Already more than half condemned she stood
Before him, who, touched by her constant moan,
Could not but think of her less ill than good;
And so, by his command, they came to that drear wood.

Drear now, though purified still with azure bells
And white, to her who sees no more their bloom;
And there, with many a tear, she slowly tells
The story of her love, its early tomb;
How happier told than now! but still the doom
Of death was urged by that blood-thirsty crowd,
Whose holy hate for mercy left no room;
And still upon her hands her head she bowed,
While ever for her blood that Moloch murmured loud.

Again, with pleading eyes, she searches round,
But reads no faith in this her simple tale;
Then, where her love lay stark, there from the ground
She plucks a leaf of that dire weed, and, pale,
Lays it upon her lips—fond lovers, wail!
Yet, no; for she has gone where Hope no more
May fear misfortune. Happy pair, to fail
In that same hour, and walk that silent shore
Together; happier still if with that love of yore!

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

WINNIE AND OTHERS.—We will soon give full information about evening dresses. Your sample was too small to give any idea of the pattern.

ANNIE JENKINS.—The glove should match the traveling suit in color. Wear a standing collar of linen with Valenciennes edge. A lace bow in front. Fichus of the material of the dress are worn in the house. Young married ladies wear lace caps as a part of their morning attire. The article you mention is commended by those who use it.

NELLIE.—As you are slight you can wear a loose polonaise belted in at the waist. Trim with a plaited frill of corded silk raveled at the edges about half an inch. Trim only on the cuffs and arm-holes. Belt of narrow folds of silk and a short sash with quilling at the ends.

B.—Gros grain and faille are heavy corded silks. Three or four dollars will buy excellent gros grain, though there are much finer qualities. Make a black cashmere petticoat. Striped petticoats are frequently made without flounces. Trim your poplin with a pleated ruffle of silk.

FRANK MARCUS.—Make your wrapper a long, loose Gabrielle with hood. The back is almost tight-fitting, the front quite loose. A belt with loops and ends behind. Coat-sleeves. The trimming is white braid an inch wide, with three narrower rows above it, surrounding the entire garment. White silk quilted in revers on the front is also pretty. Satin pleated frills would trim your brown silk handsomely, made in small box-pleats sewed top and bottom, then caught together in the centre, forming a honey-comb pattern. Gray cashmere is being used for traveling dresses. It is trimmed with folds of satin and fringe.

MRS. G. L. M.—A French cashmere shawl at $50 is probably the wrapping you want. You will find it at any of the large Broadway stores.

GEORGIE GRANT.—You can easily make the tresses yourself with some rings and cord purchased at any fancy store. Use chambery gauze, gilt or silver shot with a color over your silk. If this is not thick enough to hide the soil turn the silk dress. The gauze is from $1 25 to $2 75 a yard.

ANGELA.—Your empress cloth will make a very nice suit, trimmed with bias silk bands and fringe, or merely scalloped and bound with silk. Make the upper skirt with five widths gored and looped high on the sides. A flounce on the petticoat. The bonnet matches the over-garment.

MRS. E. A. W. C.—The book can be obtained from France by any importer. It has never been translated.

CONSTANT READER.—Quilted silk or satin hoods are either fanched shaped or square, trimmed with a narrow band of fur of the same width all around.

ADAL.—White lace over your silk skirt will be suitable. Make a low square corsage of silk with inside chemisette and sleeves of tulle or lace. Two long strands of short flowing curls are placed between small finger puffs of your own hair. The front is arranged in crêpes, or a Pompadour roll with frizzed curls on the forehead. Flower jewelry is still worn.

ION.—You will find information about a Watteau cloak in the Supplement of Bazar No. 55. The prices of velvet are given in the New York Fashions of the same paper.

VIOLANTE.—Pale blue or lavender silks will suit for your evening dresses. If you have natural color you can also wear the sulphur green. Make a trained skirt with panier. Trim with white satin and lace. White muslin over colored silk will continue in favor during the winter, and is suitable for debutantes. Short dancing dresses will be greatly worn.

HOUSEKEEPER.—We know nothing of the vaunted cement you speak of, but it can hardly be better than the famous "diamond cement," the composition of which is thus given by Dr. Ure: "Take of isinglass one ounce, distilled water six ounces, boil these together until reduced to three measured ounces of liquid; then add a fluid ounce and a half of rectified spirit of wine. Boil the whole together for two minutes; strain it, and while hot add to it, first, half an ounce of strong milky emulsion of gum ammoniacum, and then five drachms of an alcoholic solution of mastic."

MOTHER.—Doses of medicine are regulated according to age. Thus if a table-spoonful is required by a grown person a child of one year will require one-twelfth, a child of two years one-eighth, a child of three one-sixth, a child of four one-fourth, a child of seven one-third, a child of fourteen one-half, etc.

NURSE.—The proper temperature for a warm bath is 98° Fahrenheit, if for a child it should never exceed this. The time to remain in it varies from ten minutes to an hour. Twenty-five minutes is a medium.

BABE.—In Bazar No. 24 you will find a pattern and full description of an infant's cloak. Lace hoods for small infants are illustrated in the same paper. Hoods knit of white zephyr, in patterns imitating lace, cost from $2 50 to $4. The handsomest are ornamented with pearl beads, and overcast with floss. White cashmere hoods cost from $6 to $12. Satin from $10 to $20. "The small red mark between the upper eyelid and eyebrow" should not be interfered with, at any rate by any one but a capable surgeon. It is probably one of those harmless spots called "moles" or "mother's marks."

MRS. J. B. B.—We have said repeatedly that we can not promise special patterns.

R. M.—Send your order to any of the establishments whose names appear at the end of our article on that subject (lingerie). Colored paniers and tunics are worn over black dresses. A black silk panier looks well with any dress, either colored or black. A kind of peasant waist, made low and square, should be made of the material of the panier. Make a jockey basque or else a large fan-like bow to be worn at the back of your black silk, or add panier puffs in the way described in Bazar No. 52. Get a brown cloth or a gray poplin for your street suit. We have frequently given directions for making such suits. Your hand is remarkably small. The Venus de Medici, considered the most beautiful model of the female figure, is five feet two inches in height.—This is a good lotion for the "little black spots" called worms that sometimes appear in the pores of the face:

Borax 9 grains.
Rose-water 2 drachms.
Orange flower water 2 drachms.
Mix.

An infusion of tea or peppermint, and water with a few drops of Cologne, applied warm, are also good.

MRS. WILLIAM J. T.—Make a round cape falling to the waist. Wear a belt with short sash ends behind trimmed with lace.

ADA.—Make your blue silk a single skirt with train trimmed with wide bias ruffle. The corsage is square necked, with Maria Theresa sleeves. See illustration in Harper's Bazar No. 52. The black silk is also long with a tunic or paniers. Round waist. Coat-sleeves are small at the wrist like a gentleman's coat. Your bonnet should be white uncut velvet.

MRS. M. E. G.—Make either the Watteau or Camargo cloak. Patterns in Bazar No. 55. Velvet waists are still worn. Handsome gros grain at $6 a yard is now preferred to moiré antique. Twelve yards make a trained dress. Read the answer to Ada. We gave in the Answers to Correspondents in Bazar No. 50 directions for dressing natural hair. Hooped skirts worn with trains measure about three yards around the bottom. Gored petticoats made with train, and flounced on all but the front width, are worn over the hoop skirt. Make your house sacque short and loose with revers front, coat-sleeve, and trimming of bias silk with several rows of machine stitching.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Your question is too general for a specific answer. Make known your particular wants and we will attempt to satisfy them.

B.—The course of instruction in the School of Design of the "Cooper Union" of New York is as follows: Drawing from Casts; Drawing from Life; Painting in Oil and Water Colors; Design and Composition; Modeling in Clay; Elementary Principles for Teachers; Lectures upon Art Anatomy, Composition Anatomy, etc.; Lectures upon Systematic and Structural Botany; Lectures upon Primitive Forms, viz.: Action, Motion, Proportion, etc.; Lectures upon Manners, Customs, Implements. The instruction is gratuitous, and all that is required for admission to its privileges is satisfactory reference as to character. Pupils of both sexes are received.

ABBOTT THE HISTORIAN.

CAMBRIDGEPORT, MASS.,

June 1, 1868.

Messrs. Hall & Ruckel:

I consider it to be my duty to speak in the highest terms of ALBERG'S GALAKTINE, which we have obtained through you for our little boy. It has been very largely his meat and drink for some four months, and now, at the age of six months, he is wonderfully strong and well. No child could be healthier than he has been while using it. As a substitute for, or a supplement to breast-milk, it is truly invaluable, and every mother of young children ought to know of it, and where to get it.

Yours, truly, EDWARD ABBOTT.

Send your orders to HALL & RUCKEL, Agents, 218 Greenwich Street, New York.

MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN.—Now is the time to clear the complexion for the winter from those disagreeable discolorations, by using PERRY'S MOIRÉ AND FRECKLE LOTION. Sold by all druggists.

BURNETT'S COCAINE is a perfect hair-dressing for preserving and beautifying the hair, and rendering it dark and glossy. No other compound possesses the peculiar properties which so exactly suit the various conditions of the human hair. It is the best and cheapest hair-dressing in the world. For sale by all druggists.

FRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS.—MORVILLER'S "Sunlight in Winter" is probably the finest work of art and execution which has ever proceeded from any chromo bureau. No parlor should be without this masterpiece.—Zion's Herald.

A DISTINGUISHED Methodist minister and prominent temperance lecturer once remarked that go where he would, from one end of the country to the other, he hardly ever failed to find PLANTATION BITTERS, and while he condemned the practice of using those Bitters too freely, he could not conscientiously say that he would discard them from the side-board, for he had himself experienced beneficial results from their use; and that, from a long and close observation, he was convinced that when used moderately, and as a medicine exclusively, they were all that was recommended. At the same time, he warned his hearers not to pull the cork too often, for they were far too pleasant a tonic to trifle with.—Evening Post.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR REMOVED from any part of the body in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by UPHAM'S DEPLIATORY POWDER. $1 25 by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, 115 South Seventh St., Philadelphia.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR removing FRECKLES, TAN, PIMPLES, and all other blemishes, use Phalon's "PAPHIAN LOTION." Sold by all druggists. Price $1 25 per bottle.

FOR the Toilet, Bath, and Nursery, use Phalon's "PAPHIAN SOAP," 25 cents per cake. Sold by druggists and by PHALON & SON, 517 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S CHEAP MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS. Complete Operas, Oratorios, and large collections of Vocal and Piano-forte Music, in Books, 50 cts. each. "A Complete Pictorial History of the Times."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

The model newspaper of our country—complete in all the departments of an American family paper—HARPER'S WEEKLY has earned for itself a right to its title, "A Journal of Civilization."—N. Y. Evening Post.

This paper furnishes the best illustrations. Our future historians will enrich themselves out of HARPER'S WEEKLY long after writers and printers and publishers are turned to dust.—New York Evangelist.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY from week to week form a remarkable series of brief political essays. They are distinguished by clear and pointed statements, by good common-sense, by independence and breadth of view. They are the expression of mature conviction, high principle, and strong feeling, and take their place among the best newspaper writing of the time.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure,

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Supplement containing numerous full-sized Patterns of useful articles accompanies the paper every fortnight, and occasionally an elegant Colored Fashion Plate.

HARPER'S BAZAR contains 16 folio pages of the size of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superfine calendered paper, and is published weekly.

HARPER'S BAZAR contains, besides pictures, patterns, etc., a variety of matter of especial use and interest to the family: articles on health, dress, and housekeeping in all its branches; its editorial matter is specially adapted to the circle it is intended to interest and instruct; and it has, besides, good stories and literary matter of merit.—New York Evening Post.

It has the merit of being sensible, of conveying instruction, of giving excellent patterns in every department, and of being well stocked with good reading-matter.—Watchman and Reflector.

To dress according to HARPER'S BAZAR will be the aim and ambition of the women of America.—Boston Transcript.

SOZODONT.

An Eminent Chemist says:

489 BROADWAY, N. Y., July 5, 1866.
I have made a chemical analysis of the preparation for the teeth known as "SOZODONT," for Messrs.
HALL & RUCKEL, the object of the analysis being to ascertain whether it contains substances detrimental to the teeth or gums.

An impartial sample of the "SOZODONT" was purchased by me personally from a leading Drug House of this city, and carefully analyzed for acids and other corrosive or injurious ingredients likely to have a detrimental action on the teeth or gums, but nothing of an objectionable character was found in its composition. JULIUS G. FOHLE, M.D., Analytical Chemist,

AMERICAN BELLES.

ALL women know that it is beauty, rather than genius, which all generations of men have worshipped in the sex. Can it be wondered at, then, that so much of woman's time and attention should be directed to the means of developing and preserving that beauty? Women know, too, that when men speak of the intellect of women, they speak critically, tamely, coolly; but when they come to speak of the charms of a beautiful woman, both their language and their eyes kindle with an enthusiasm which shows them to be profoundly, if not, indeed, ridiculously in earnest.
It is part of the natural sagacity of women to perceive all this, and therefore employ every allowable art to become the goddess of that adoration. Preach to the contrary as we may against the arts employed by women for enhancing their beauty, there still stands the eternal fact, that the world does not prefer the society of an ugly woman of genius to that of a beauty of less intellectual acquirements.

The world has yet allowed no higher mission to woman than to be beautiful, and it would seem that the ladies of the present age are carrying this idea of the world to greater extremes than ever, for all women now to whom Nature has denied the talismanic power of beauty, supply the deficiency by the use of a most delightful toilet article known as the "Bloom of Youth," which has lately been introduced into this country by GEORGE W. LAIRD, a delicate beautifier which smoothes out all indentations, pock-marks, furrows, scars, and imparts alabaster skins, blooming cheeks, and furrowless faces. With the assistance of this new French trick of a lady's toilet, female beauty is destined to play a larger part in the admiration of man and the ambition of woman than all the arts employed since her creation.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward
by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the custom-house stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

N. B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the express charges) by sending directly to the

"GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

FACETIÆ.

An honest countryman presented himself the other day at one of our noted photographer's. "I wish you to take my father's picture," said he. "Was your father ever photographed here?" asked the artist. "Not that I know of." "Well, bring him as soon as you like." "But I can't," rejoined the countryman, wiping away a tear; "he died a fortnight ago." "Why didn't you say so at once?" exclaimed the photographer. "You have a picture of him, of course?" "If I had, what should I want of another?" answered the countryman. "Here is a description of him," drawing a paper from his pocket, "and try to make it as like him as you can."

When does a man overcome the inactivity of an inanimate object?—When he makes an umbrella stand.

THE SPHINX.—An uninformed Irishman hearing the Sphinx alluded to in company, whispered to a companion, "Who is Sphinx?" "A monster man," "Oh," said our Hibernian, in order not to seem unacquainted with the family, "a Munster man! I thought he was from Connaught."

We met with an odd misprint in a country newspaper the other day. It stated that a young lady at an amateur concert had won a well-deserved encore by the exquisite taste with which she sang the well-worn old song, "An Angel's Whisker." This is nearly as good as the famous paragraph which, by the substitution of a "c" for an "h," made a railway train run over a cow, and "cut it into calves." We read once, too, in an account of an assault case, that the medical witness, on examining the complainant's head, found an incised wound there which was "two inches long and some feet deep." "Some feet" was a misprint for "somewhat," very badly written. The reporter was a Scotchman, and, having missed the exact depth of the wound, had cautiously indulged in a vague generality. Dean Stanley stated at a public meeting a few months ago, that a correspondent once wrote to him to ask what he meant by a passage in one of his works containing the words "the horns of the burning bush." On reference, he found that this was the humorous way in which a printer had chosen to reproduce "the thorn of the burning bush."

AN INHUMAN ACT.—Pulling down "the blind."

NEW MUSIC.—An ugly old bachelor suggests that births should be published under the head of "New Music."

This epitaph is found in a Western church-yard:

"Here lies the Mother of Children five;
Two are dead and three are alive,
The two that are dead preferring rather
To die with the Mother than live with the Father."

Heavy, this, on the father.

COLD WETHER.—Mutton.

DESIRABLE RESIDENCE.—A few days ago a suite of rooms was advertised at a sea-side resort as having among its attractions "A splendid view over a fine garden adorned with numerous sculptures." On application at the address given it was found that the garden adorned with sculptures was the cemetery.

TO THOSE IN WANT OF A PET.

An excellent opportunity is offered by the sale of a menagerie. Thousands wish to possess a wild and even dangerous animal, particularly those residing in the suburbs, where burglars abound. Boffin has, to our knowledge, made overtures for the purchase of a panther, which he proposes to keep in a kennel in the back-garden to look after the cats. He objects to pet vultures, he says, as their propensities might prove detrimental to the heads of families. Spooney people are informed that for twenty-five dollars they can procure a bright gazelle, to glad them with its dark brown eye; and that such animals are warranted, on coming to know them (the spooney people) well, not to go and pine or die. Should they prove guilty of pining, the money will be returned. Boa constrictors are cheap and ornamental; also useful to those possessing an inconveniently large family. Any lady or gentleman possessed of three sets, twins, will find a boa constrictor really economical in the end—in fact, at both ends. Any lion, moose, or rampant zebra found strolling about the public streets after purchase, without a muzzle, will immediately be avoided by the police. Bears and seals are good things for ladies to buy, for when you get tired of them you can cut them up for winter jackets. People having expectations from maiden aunts are advised to invest in an ant-eater.

"THE LIGHT OF OTHER DAYS"—Wax-candles.

EACH TO HIS POST.—A good story is told with regard to a "daft" man and a somnolent congregation. Whenever any of his hearers began to "nod," the minister observed that "daft Jamie" aroused them somewhat sharply by shooting peas at them. Catching the eye of the delinquent at last, he shook his finger at him reprovingly; but "Jamie" responded, not a whit abashed, "Just gang on wi' your sermon, minister, and I'll keep the beggars waukin'."

A FAMILY LIKENESS.—Not (as a rule) a Family Picture.

"AYE, MARRY IS IT!"

MR. BOFFIN (fiercely). "And you must remember, Miss, that it is a very solemn thing to be Married."
MISS BOFFIN (reflectively). "Well, I should think it's a much more solemn thing not to be Married, Pa."

OLD LADY. "What a beautiful little Darling, to be sure! Is it a Girl, Nurse?"
ARISTOCRATIC NURSE. "No, Mum."
OLD LADY. "Then it is a little Boy, the Dear?"
NURSE. "No, Mum."
OLD LADY (astonished). "What on earth is it, then?"
NURSE. "A Young Gentleman, Mum."

FIRST MONSTER IN HUMAN FORM. "I mean to have a run over to Paris next Week."
SECOND MONSTER IN HUMAN FORM. "Are you going for Pleasure, or d'ye take your Wife with you?"

HOW TO ACT IN THE EVENT OF A BURGLARY.

1. Lie very still, and draw the bed-clothes over your head.
2. Sit up and listen.
3. Pinch your wife, and tell her she ought to be ashamed of herself.
4. Tell her to go down stairs and see what's the matter.
5. Call out for the servant to order the robbers off the premises.
6. If the burglars still persist in their nefarious occupation, go on the landing, and ask them if they know what they're about.
7. If they don't desist now, make your wife tell them that in your opinion they are wicked men, and that you have a great mind to be very angry.
8. Say you are very dangerous when you are once roused.
9. Beg them to leave quietly, and so obviate the necessity of a disturbance in the house.
10. Ask them if they wouldn't like some cold meat and pickles, and a glass of beer and a pipe.
11. Let them have what they like, do what they like, and give them a dollar each besides. When they've gone, bring out your pistols and send for a policeman.
12. Go to bed again, and say that the only reason why you didn't go down stairs at first, punch all their heads, shoot them, and take them prisoners, was that you didn't want to disturb the neighbors.

CRUEL.—A man was dying. He had a friend—an author. The friend came to him. To comfort him? No! to read a manuscript. He produced a packet, and drew his chair to the bedside of the dying man. "Only a few chapters," he said, insinuatingly. "But, my dear friend," urged the faint voice of the departing one, "I've only an hour to live." What was the reply? "Yes, yes, I know all that, but this will only take you twenty minutes."

EXPERIENCE OF TRAVEL.—A rather fast youth was relating the experience of his voyage across the ocean to a sympathizing friend. Said he, "I tell you what, old fellow, there's one good thing about it, though. You can get as tight as you please every day, and every body thinks you're only sea-sick."

A poor Irish cripple sat begging at a bridge, urging his appeal to the charity of passengers with the eager and versatile eloquence of his country. A gentleman and lady—young, gay, handsome, with that peculiar look of gratified and complacent consciousness which indicates the first few weeks of married life—crossed the bridge. They regarded not the petition of the beggar; so, just as they passed him, he exclaimed, "May the blessing of the Lord, which brings love, and joy, and wealth, and a fine family, follow you all the days of your life!"—a pause; the couple passed heedlessly on, and the beggar, with a fine touch of caustic humor, added, "and never overtake you."

GRAPHIC NAME FOR A HORSE.—A professor of Alma Mater, having purchased a horse to go a journey, wished to give his Bucephalus a classical name, and applied to a friend to help him with an appellation. "Call him Graphy," said his friend. "Graphy!" exclaimed the professor: "do you think I am going to write upon his back?" "Pshaw!" replied the collegian, "the name is perfectly applicable. First, you purchase the horse—that is bi-o-graphy; second, you mount him—that's the top-o-graphy; lastly, you make your journey, and that's the geo-graphy."

QUESTIONABLE SATISFACTION.—A lodger looked very discontentedly at a beef-steak, and the landlady having observed him, said, "Don't the steak suit you?" "Yes," said the lodger, "it's good enough what there is of it; and there's enough of it, such as it is."

AN AWFUL DEFORMITY, POOR THING.—Three-handed Loo.

SHAKING HANDS.—At a duel the parties discharged their pistols without effect, whereupon one of the seconds interfered, and proposed that the combatants should shake hands. To this the other second objected as unnecessary; "for," said he, "their hands have been shaking this half hour."

THE HEIGHT OF SATISFACTION.—Handling a dentist's tweezers when the tooth is out.

RINGS IN DEMAND.

- What ring do the ladies most desire?—The wedding ring.
- What ring is most pleasing to every body?—The ring for dinner.
- What ring is most profitable?—The whisky ring.
- What ring is best in time of trouble?—The ring of the true metal.
- What persons wish they had been out of the ring?—The "lame ducks" of the late "corn ring."
- What ring is the most powerful?—The gold ring.
- What ring do children most enjoy?—"Ring around a rosey."
- What ring is most fashionable?—The ring in the ear.
- What ring should be sacred to us all?—The ring of the church bells.
- What ring startles every one?—The ring of the fire bells.
- What ring is most detestable?—Trying to "wring in."

An imaginative Irishman gave utterance to this lamentation: "I returned to the halls of my fathers by night, and found them in ruins! I cried aloud, 'My fathers, where are they?' And echo responded, 'Is that you, Patrick McCarthy?'"

Bridal Toilettes.

THESE bridal toilettes are partly for young girls and partly for widows. Those for young girls require a veil. The dresses are of white gros grain or satin, or they may be of fine India or Swiss muslin. The skirts are gored and with trains. The waists are mostly worn high, though they are sometimes cut very low in front and finished with a high chemisette, or a blouse may be worn instead of the waist, in which case it is cut out in front. Sashes are always of the same material as the dress.

Fig. 1. BRIDAL TOILETTE FOR WIDOW.—Dress and sash of white satin trimmed with wide silk fringe. The wreath and bouquet are of myrtle. Cut the skirt from the pattern given for the Nordey Dress in Harper's Bazar, No. 30, p. 473, making allowance, however, for the train. Cut the waist from Figs. 41-44 of the Supplement. The illustration shows the manner of arranging the trimming.

Fig. 2. BRIDAL TOILETTE FOR YOUNG GIRL.—This dress is of Swiss muslin. The waist is high and cut out in front; the neck, wrists, and shoulder seams are trimmed with a narrow ruche of muslin. The chemisette is high and of guipure. The skirt is gored and trimmed with four muslin flounces in the manner shown by the illustration. Cut the waist, which is lined with silk, from Figs. 41-44, Supplement. The front is cut out along the straight line on this pattern. Wreath and bouquet of orange flowers. Veil of plain silk lace.

Fig. 3. BRIDAL TOILETTE FOR WIDOW.—Dress of white gros grain with high waist. Marie Antoinette fichu of white Valenciennes. Myrtle flowers in the hair. Cut the waist from Figs. 41-44, Supplement.

Fig. 4. BRIDAL TOILETTE FOR YOUNG GIRL.—White satin dress with high waist and sash. The trimming is of wreaths and sprays of orange blossoms. Orange flowers form the wreath on the head. Veil of silk lace. For making the waist cut of satin, and muslin as lining, from Figs. 41 and 42, Supplement, each two pieces, from Fig. 43 one piece, and from Fig. 44 the sleeves. First take up the darts and face the fronts; put on the buttons and make button-holes; join the back, front, and side pieces according to the corresponding figures on the pattern, and run whale-bones into the side seams and darts. Cord the neck and waist. Having sewed up the sleeves according to the corresponding figures on the pattern, face the wrists, and sew them into the corded arm-holes. Arrange the trimming in the manner shown by the illustration.

Opera-Glass Case.

See illustration on first page.

THIS is a pretty and convenient method of making use of the frame of a worn-out opera-glass case. The foundation is of pasteboard, the cover of black cloth and satin, and the lining of gray silk, which is quilted with a thin layer of wadding. Of pasteboard, satin, and silk cut from Fig. 56 two pieces, and from Figs. 57 and 58 each one piece, always allowing a seam on the edges. Cut besides, of the same stuffs, a strip three-fourths of an inch wide and twelve inches long, for the sides of the cover. Now work on the satin the application of black cloth, which is done by drawing the design on the cloth, cutting out the squares, and then stitching it down on the satin. Having overseamed the two pieces of pasteboard cut from Fig. 56, from 36 to 37, and backstitched together the corresponding outside and lining, sew these and also the pieces cut from Figs. 57 and 58 over the pasteboard foundations, and join Figs. 56 and 57 according to the corresponding figures on the pattern, and also the bottom of the cover with the edge at the same time. For the hinges between the cover and case fasten between the outside and lining of each three narrow pieces of ribbon. Cover the seams on the outside with a fine black silk cord. Next cut a piece of pasteboard two-thirds of an inch wide, and the length of the edges of the upper part of the case, cover this with silk, and fasten it inside, leaving half its width beyond the edge of the case, so that the cover shuts down over it. On the cover set a handle of cloth and satin, and sew on a button and elastic cord for fastening.

Two Candlestick Ornaments.

See illustration on first page.

BOTH these candlestick ornaments are made with beads. The circumference of the upper rings must correspond to that of the upper part of the candlestick.

Fig. 1.—This ornament consists of five leaves, which are made of larger and smaller green beads, arranged in the manner shown by the illustration on a foundation which has been covered first with cotton and afterward with cloth. For each leaf cut of white foundation from Fig. 59 one piece, and on this sew first the veins, which are of little round beads strung on wire, and then cover the remainder of the leaf with the long green beads, which are sewed on in bead satin stitch, though the thread must afterward be fastened down with a cross stitch between every bead. Fasten fine wire on the edges and under the leaves along the veinings.

Fig. 2.—This ornament is of narrow leaves of different lengths. The leaves are of crystal and garnet beads, which have been strung on wire. The ring on which the leaves are fastened is of two wires strung with crystal beads, and afterward twisted together. The long leaves are an inch and three-fourths, and the shorter ones an inch and a half long; join the leaves to the ring by means of the wire ends, and then cover the place these are set on with two strings of garnet beads, which are twisted together.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1868.

The next Supplement Number will contain a rich variety of patterns of Ladies' Pelerines, Muffs, Berets, and Sashes, Children's Dresses, Gentlemen's Knitted Under-clothing, Christmas Gifts, etc., etc.

In our last Number, December 5, we issued a magnificent COLORED FASHION PLATE, prepared expressly for this Paper by the MODE ILLUSTRÉE of Paris.

A LEARNED WOMAN.

IT is quite a mistake to suppose that it was left for this age to discover the capacity of women. Antiquity had already made the discovery, and brilliantly illustrated it with a poetical Sappho, a philosophical Aspasia, and a scientific Hypatia. There have been since innumerable female bachelors, or bachelletes, of arts, as they call them in France, doctors of science, professors, teachers, and writers of all kinds. Italy, since the revival of letters, has never been without learned women, and the professorial chairs of Bologna and Padua have been frequently filled, and with credit too, by them. A famous book-collector of Padua left a library composed exclusively of books written by women, and they amounted to thirty-two thousand volumes.

Of the many women who have vindicated the claims of their sex to rank among the intellectually distinguished none have been more remarkable than the erudite Madame Dacier. Anne Le Févre, for such was her maiden name, was born at Saumur, in France, in 1654. Her father was a famous scholar, and strove to inspire his sons also with a love of learning. Starting with the sensible principle "that it is impossible for children to love study unless it is made agreeable," it is not surprising that the paternal lessons were very attractive and effective. These learned delights were however intended, in accordance with the prejudices of the age, for the male children only. The little Anne's vocation was to be exclusively the spinning-wheel and embroidering-needle; and while her brothers were conning Homer, Terence, and Aristophanes, she was supposed to be absorbed in the involutions of yarn and the intricacies of crochet stitch. Her apt ear, however, was taking in at every moment those charming lessons of her father, and she soon gave proof that she had profited well by them. "Her brother," as goes the story, "was unable one day to answer a question, when his sister, without lifting her head from her work, prompted him what to say. Her father, overhearing her, was delighted, and immediately made her a sharer with her brothers in classical study. She soon gave proof of her facility by taking the lead."

At eighteen years of age Anne Le Févre lost her father, but had already acquired such a reputation for classical acquirement that the learned Huet, the tutor of the Dauphin, invited her to Paris to aid him in the preparation of classical text-books for his royal pupil. She thus became one of the principal editors of that long series of the classics, Ad Usum Delphini, or Delphin editions, which were the text-books for generations of students throughout civilized Europe and America. Will any scholar after this venture to scorn the claims to recognition of learned women, and thus deny the very mother who suckled him? Latin and Greek were equally mastered by this marvelous girl, and she published in quick succession translations of the classical works of both languages. Queen Christina of Sweden, in acknowledging a copy of her Florus, wrote: "Are not you, who I am told are so beautiful and agreeable a girl, ashamed to be so learned? Indeed this is too much; and do tell me by what secret you have succeeded in reconciling the Muses with the Graces?"

In 1683 Mademoiselle Le Févre married M. Dacier, who also was a scholar, and had been a promising pupil of his wife's father. Madame Dacier was recognized by all but herself as the superior of her husband, to whom she would have willingly deferred the whole glory of the common name. The critics, however, did not fail to discover her greater strength, and Boileau said that "of all their mental productions Madame Dacier was the father."

The great work of this erudite woman was her translation of Homer, which gave rise to the famous war between the Ancients and Moderns. Madame Dacier and La Motte were the foremost champions, but a long array of valiant scholars followed each leader, and they began a furious battle not yet decided. Madame Dacier, with all her devotion to study and fondness for learning, remained true to her womanly duties and sympathies. In the preface to her Homer she thus speaks of a daughter of whom she had been suddenly bereft: "I have lost a friend and a faithful companion; we have never been once separated since her birth. What readings we have had, what talks, what pleasures! She shared in all my occupations; she often settled my doubts.....All is now vanished like a dream; to this communion, so full of charms, solitude and horror have succeeded; every thing for us is now turned to bitterness."

Madame Dacier died of apoplexy, brought on by intense application to study, in 1720. Saint Simon, in his memoirs, thus records the fact: "The death of Madame Dacier was regretted alike by every philosopher and worthy person. She was the daughter of a father who was both, and had educated her. He was named La Févre, a Protestant of Caen. His daughter became a Catholic after his death, and married Dacier, who was the royal librarian, a member of all the academies, a Greek and Latin scholar, an author and translator. His wife was supposed to be his superior as a linguist, an antiquarian, and a critic, and has left a quantity of highly esteemed works. She was the learned woman only in her study or among the learned; every where else she was simple, unaffected, intelligent, and agreeable in conversation, but no one would ever have suspected that she knew any more than the most ordinary woman."

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of the Grecian Bend.

MY DEAR POLLY,—I see that you have at last surrendered to the fashion, and it was you, I am told, whom I saw yesterday walking up the Avenue in that extraordinary form or contortion or step or halt or imbecile stumble called the Grecian bend. Is it a dress or a gait or a mere deformity, or what is it? Of course you have no idea what a pitiful and absurd figure you were, or no fashion could coerce you into such a mortifying position. It was more painful indeed than ridiculous. The movement of those who fall victims to this folly is chiefly that of an ape. The long arms hanging helplessly in front, the paws paddling the air, the movement a doubtful hitch and jerk. Have you ever, my dear Polly, seriously remarked the appearance of any of your friends who are subject to it, and did it stimulate you to emulation? Well, you smile, I understand it. You mean to say, "Is it possible that so experienced and shrewd a gentleman as my friend Mr. Bachelor really thinks that it is of any use to protest against our following the fashions? Has he yet to learn that all papas have always sneered and snarled at every new fashion, and have been about as wise as old dogs that bay at the moon?"

Oh no, my dear Polly, I have perhaps a little more experience than you upon the whole subject, and I should protest as soon against an east wind as against the Grecian bend, so far as any hope of stemming a fashion is concerned. But answer me one question. If you are the generally sensible young woman that I believe you to be, would not you despise the young men around you if you saw them given wholly up to no interest and occupation but that of devising changes in their clothes? And do you suppose they don't have that feeling for you? Seeing you frivolous, do you wonder that they treat you with a kind of contempt? We men have fashions, and we follow them, but they are slight and gradual variations. As long as any man of forty or fifty can remember, for instance, a man's full dress has been black broadcloth with a white cravat. The collar of the coat has been a little higher or lower, the trowsers a little looser or tighter—that is all. But if the situation were changed, if there were the same extraordinary absorption in the business of dressing upon our part that there is upon yours, there would inevitably be upon your side that good-natured consciousness of superiority which you now perceive upon ours.

If I were you, Polly, I should protest with all my heart against the assumption of the men; but I would do it by showing that my soul was not wrapped up in a ribbon nor in a chignon. Don't you see that multitudes of women aim to please men by being, or seeming to be, what a poor kind of man thinks women ought to be? One of these ineffable gentlemen, who believed himself to be the very Prince Charming, who smiled as benignly upon a belle as the Sultan when he prepares to throw the handkerchief, said to me one day at dinner of Flora MacIvor in her younger days, when she was of the most delicate beauty, "Weally, Mr. Bachelor, Miss Flwowa is twoly fascinating. She is like a shy young fawn just bursting into the full-blown wose." Prince Charming said this of one of the most superb of women. He thought that was the way to win women. And he had learned it of too many of your sex, dear Polly, whose sole aim is to be the clinging tendrill which the sturdy oak must support—the shy fawn which must be protectingly gathered in to nestle in the manly bosom of Prince Charming—the rose-bud which must flower in the warm air of his lofty protection.

Prince Charming made a memorable mistake in this instance. Flora MacIvor was to him what Queen Elizabeth would have been to Sir Piercie Shafton; and when driving home with her in her carriage one night, after a ball, he said something in the tone which so many of your sex encourage, she stopped the carriage instantly, and bade him step out. Prince Charming was discomfited; but he did not say a word. He descended into the midnight street, and when he returned to his home he had been to school rather than to a ball. Of course, you all say that it was outrageous for him to say what he said—whatever it might have been; you declare that he was no gentleman. True, all of it; but who encouraged him? Not Flora certainly, but the general feeling and conduct of your sex, my dear Polly. If you don't respect yourselves why should you expect us to respect you? Here are the laws about women's property, the laws of marriage, the laws of divorce—you don't know much about them—but while they have always been, and in many respects still are, unjust and outrageous, it is you women who are greatly responsible.

I wish I could have taken you up bodily as you toddled along the Avenue in your Grecian bend, and, putting you before a Psyche glass, have asked you whether you thought that was a figure which would persuade an honest man to esteem the person who was content with it? He would smile at it and feel toward it precisely as toward a whimsical child. Dear Polly, if you and your friends are content to be flowers and ornaments, to be weak and helpless and inexpressibly silly, you must pay the piper. My friend Peter Paul Pry insists that the ideal life of most of you young women is only Mohammed's Paradise. They want to be houris, he says; they are quite content to bask in the benign smile of the faithful who are the masters. The Grecian bend and the rest of it are only signs of their willing submission. "We have no minds worth speaking of," they seem to say, "so we will decorate our bodies to please you. And if we become grotesque and absurd, don't laugh at us too severely, remembering that it is in token of our inferiority, and that even so weak creatures as we must have some employment adapted to our capacity." That, says Peter Paul Pry, is what every woman in the Grecian bend, or in any of the wild extravagances of a fashion, says to every man she passes.

Then, my dear Polly, if you in your Grecian bend hear of what is called Woman's Rights, you laugh as merrily as Prince Charming at your side at the grotesque people who wish to unsex themselves. You in your Grecian bend, with your arms hanging, with your pinched feet clumping, with every man laughing at you, are afraid that some body will unsex herself. Polly, dear, suppose you let your charity begin at home. The women who wish to have the laws changed, the women who demand to vote, may be unsexing themselves. Harriet Martineau, a great force in the public opinion of England; Miss Somerville, one of the wisest of scientific philosophers; Jenny Lind, Florence Nightingale, Dorothea Dix, Anna Dickinson, each using her God-given talent, may also be unsexing themselves. But what, in the name of pity, are you doing, my precious Polly, sitting at supper with a circle of Prince Charmings, joining their choruses, filling their glasses, lighting their pipes, shouting at the gay description of Marm Martineau in spectacles and leaning upon a baggy umbrella, and finally toddling off in your Grecian bend? If it is a question of unsexing—of making your sex appear contemptible in the eyes of men—I advise you to reflect upon it maturely.

To tell you a secret, Polly, I once ventured quietly into one of these "unsexing" meetings. I had been to a good many balls in my life. I had assisted at a great many little suppers, of men and women. I had dined a hundred times in houses where I saw the mistress voluntarily, and as a matter of course, assume the position of the Sultan's favorite, or upper slave. I had watched for many and many a year you and your predecessors yielding to every incredible whim of fashion. And I thought that, to complete my experience, I ought to see and hear one of those droll performances, those meetings in which women talk and claim what they call their rights—"As if," says Prince Charming, "they hadn't a right to be admired and to have us at their feet!" I did not communicate my intention to any body, but I slipped into the meeting. I remembered that I had been in very delightful company, of the most feminine of their sex, when I went to hear Rachel act, or to hear Sontag sing; but now, when certain other women were to insist that all women had the same right to do what they had a talent for doing, exactly as Rachel and Sontag did, it was somehow a thing not to be mentioned except with a smile.

Well, now, Polly, you will, perhaps, not believe me when I say that there was just as much good sense talked by those women; they were just as earnest and sincere as if they had been men; and the meeting gave me as much respect and confidence in human nature, and seemed to me just as little disgraceful and ridiculous as a meeting of men exclusively at Tammany Hall or the Cooper Institute, or any other great and favorite popular resort. What can be the explanation of this extraordinary fact? I asked Peter Paul Pry about it yesterday as we were walking, and he said: "Have you ever reflected upon the great question, what it is to unsex one's self? The word is rather ridiculous, but I think the meaning is plain enough. When a man makes himself a brute he unsexes himself, does he not? He makes himself despicable. Well, when a woman makes herself ridiculous, is not she equally unsexed? To unsex yourself is to do that which is unbecoming your sex. But as talent is of no sex, and as the proper use of talent is a duty—if a human being has received a talent, the duty of using it is conceded. A man, for instance, who has no gift for public speaking, for preaching, or for any similar function, unsexes himself when he tries to speak more than a woman who has the gift and exercises it. If you say that perhaps he does a foolish thing, but that he can not be said to unsex himself, I reply that he does so quite as much as a woman can, under the same circumstances, because sex has nothing to do with it in either case. You unsex yourself only by doing that which is unworthy of your sex; but it can not be unworthy for Mrs. Siddons to act, nor for Miss Blackwell to cure, nor for any woman whose interest in human society is greater than yours and mine, poor old Bachelor, to feel that she ought to have a voice as well as an influence in its regulation."

So said Peter Paul Pry, and you may imagine how I listened. Somehow what he said seemed to me very reasonable. I met Mrs. Grundy as I left him, and was walking meditatively away; but when I repeated his words to her I thought the old lady would have fainted upon the sidewalk. Indeed, I am very sure she would have done so but for the extreme inconvenience and the scandal. "How can you, my dear Mr. Bachelor," said she, "how can you countenance those odious and ridiculous people? Women who—excuse me—who want to wear the breeches are my abomination. The man is head of the woman, and she ought to be very grateful that she has so noble a head." As my dear Mrs. Grundy spoke Prince Charming passed by, shaking two fingers at you—yes, at you, my dear Polly, tottering along under your Grecian bend. "My dear Madam," said I to

Mrs. Grundy, "is the Grecian bend an antediluvian fashion?"

"Bless your soul, Mr. Bachelor, it is the newest of the new. Why do you ask such an absurd question?"

"Because, Ma'am, if the world before the deluge was filled with such men and women as Prince Charming and the Grecian benders, I don't wonder that the Almighty wiped them out with a flood."

Polly, I ask you, as a reasonable woman, to lay aside that deformity, and to answer me the question which of the two most truly unsexes herself, Harriet Martineau, nobly using every God-given power she has, and asking that women may be as free to all honorable duty as men, or Mrs. Tilbury and her train of followers making the town turn and laugh at their Grecian bends?

Yours,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

WEDDING DRESSES.

THE bridal toilettes of the present brilliant wedding season are remarkable for their elegant simplicity. The richest materials plainly made embody the correct idea of a dress for a bride. The more girlish attire she has hitherto worn is abandoned to her bridesmaids, and something of the new wifely dignity is foreshadowed in the costume of the bride.

White satin and lace are, as they must ever be, the first choice for the wedding dress. Bridal satin in the popular three-quarter width costs from $7 to $12 a yard. Thirteen yards is required, and the modiste charges about $30 for making. Simple tulle trimmings and flowers add but little to the expense. It is the rich laces that increase the bills. A lace tunic with garniture for corsage, a combination of round point and point appliqué, is marked $500. Lace trousseaux, containing a flounce, shawl, barbe, handkerchief, trimming lace, and covers for fan and parasol, are sold at the wide range of $600 to $2100. More costly sets with a bridal veil of corresponding pattern are only imported to order.

But such extravagances require a full purse; and we write for brides-expectant less lavish of expenditure, who will be content with a gros grain or a poul de soie at $7 a yard, or else a lustrous taffeta or faille at $4. If a still lower price is desired we commend an Irish poplin at $3, rather than a flimsy, cheaper silk. The texture is the best of its kind, and when selected with fine lustre and even, heavy cords is almost as handsome as gros grain. Alpaca and other woolen goods are better suited for shrouds than wedding dresses, and the white crape sometimes worn by brides in mourning is too sadly suggestive for a wedding occasion. Economy and poetry combine for once in the traditional bridal dress of soft, flowing muslin. Fine organdy adorned with filmy Valenciennes is at present the fashionable acceptance of the poetic idea.

Paniers are not popular for wedding dresses, though occasionally worn. Long trained skirts, gored closely at the sides and very full behind, trimmed with a wide flounce of tulle or satin, are the prevalent style. High bodice and close sleeves are most frequently worn when the ceremony is performed at church. Low corsage with panier skirt for home weddings. Tulle tunics are in favor, edged with a ruche of the same. Grecian folds are in vogue for low corsages, and lace epaulets and cuffs, with flowers in the centre, for high waists.

Bridesmaids' dresses are of tulle and tarlatan in successive puffs, with a tulle over-skirt looped with flowers. A different flower and a becoming color of trimming is assigned to each bridesmaid. The bride furnishes the gloves and flowers, and, if her means admit, the dresses of her maids.

FLOWERS, VEIL, ETC.

Orange blossoms are losing prestige for bridal flowers. The buds are stiff, and the full-blown flowers large and coarse-looking. They are prettiest and least unbecoming when mingled with other small flowers, such as clematis, jasmine, or the bridal spire. In Europe myrtle blossoms are worn by young girls, and orange flowers only by widows on bridal occasions. A flower set consists of a diadem, with long sprays falling on each shoulder, a corsage bouquet with a chatelaine attached for looping the tunic, and sprays for the shoulder. These cost from $20 to $28. Simpler sets, merely a wreath and bouquet, are $10. A brooch and ear-rings may be added. A lovely set for a bridesmaid is of pink eglantine at $22, another is of blue convolvulus, and a third has a tiara and necklace of dark green leaves of the pond-lily, with a bouquet and chatelaine of white lilies and crystallized grasses.

The veil is a large half circle of tulle, the width of the tulle forming the length of the veil. It is placed over the diadem, the front falling over the face, or else a short veil is added, and this is thrown back by the first bridesmaid when the ceremony is ended. A wide hem or a pleated ruche may border the veil, but the soft gossamer tulle is prettiest without trimming, the undefined edge losing itself in the rich folds of the dress. $12 or $15 purchases a handsome veil. The shorter veils sometimes worn by bridesmaids are in the same shape, but merely drape the back of the figure. These are $4 50, and should be provided by the bride. A widow marrying again does not wear a veil.

The front hair is crépé. Soft, light, airy curls float at the back over small finger-puffs formed of the natural hair.

The bridal fan is of white silk or satin under lace, with pearl sticks. Handkerchief trimmed with lace of the kind used in the dress. Gloves of softest kid, and boots of the material of the dress buttoned with Roman pearls and trimmed with blonde lace.

JEWELRY.

Pearls are always the accepted bridal jewelry, and a prominence is given them in wedding parures even when associated with diamonds. The fancy at present is for the Moorish styles, large pearls in a knife-edge setting of polished gold. A modest set, merely pin and ear-rings, may be bought for $125. A set of strung pearls without gold is only $75.

The engagement ring is a solitaire diamond or pearl in crown setting without enamel. If the donor can not afford at least a hundred dollars for a small diamond he is advised to substitute a pearl for $50. The wedding-ring is a plain hoop not very wide, made of twenty-four carat gold, and worth from $15 to $25.

MODEL TOILETTES.

A wedding dress of gros grain lately made has a high round corsage and coat-sleeves. An intricate trimming of satin shells and ruches defines a square on the front of the waist and covers the arm-hole seams. Point lace and satin shells standing around the neck and wrists, and a butterfly bow at the throat. The long trained skirt is bordered with pleated satin and a ruche of tulle headed by the shell trimming. Belt of satin folds with a small bow in front. Tulle veil and wax orange flowers and jasmine. The modiste should always arrange the petticoats worn beneath, as she is responsible for the way the dress skirt hangs. A muslin petticoat, short, gored, and trimmed with a wide flounce, was furnished in this instance. Over this was a trained petticoat of stiff corded muslin, also gored, and flounces from the belt to the edge on all but the front breadth. The material and making for this toilette at one of the best establishments in this country costs $350.

A white satin dress for a Washington bride has a low corsage trimmed with Grecian folds of tulle. Immense train with a panier covered with tulle, to give a soft appearance. Belt and small bow. A wide tulle puff around the skirt.

A poplin dress has a long train untrimmed. Sprays of orange buds on the high corsage.

OUTDOOR TOILETTES.

The bridal bonnet worn when returning calls, and on occasions of ceremony, is usually white, though this is not de rigueur, as many prefer a bonnet matching the dress in color. If white it should be of royal velvet and misty blonde lace, a diadem of ostrich tufts or marabouts, and a cluster of wild roses or of clematis, but never an orange flower. The carriage dress of poul de soie or of satin, either mauve or violet, has a full train flounced with black lace. A velvet basque a darker shade than the dress. Light kid gloves. Lace collar and diamonds. A MacFarlane of striped plush for a carriage-wrap. A less wealthy bride should select a silk or an Irish poplin of becoming shade, with bonnet to match, and a black velvet polonaise that will serve with other dresses. Pink coral jewelry or Byzantine mosaics.

A handsome short suit is indispensable for the street and for church, where a train should never enter. There is no prescribed color for this suit. A woman of taste does not wish her dress to proclaim her brideship to the passing crowd. An economist will select a skirt of rich material to be worn with her velvet polonaise, and a velvet pouf of blue or other becoming shade in harmony with the skirt. Wood-brown kid gloves or dark maroon suffice for almost any suite. French kid boots buttoned at the side.

In the spring a bride selects a gray poplin for her traveling dress. A golden brown or the dead-leaf shade is preferred for autumn. Cloth rivals poplin this season. Fine woolen serge or cashmere is less expensive. Fur is the best trimming for cloth, satin quillings for poplin, serge, braid, and bullion fringe for twilled goods. The outer garment is flannel, lined or wadded. A MacFarlane of Scotch tartan serves for additional wrapping. The velvet bonnet or the round hat of felt, and the undressed kid gloves match the dress in color. A wealthy blonde of quiet tastes was recently married in her traveling dress of lapis-blue serge, chosen for its unbridalike color, that she might escape the annoying notoriety of a bride on a tour.

MORNING AND AFTERNOON DRESSES.

The prettiest inexpensive morning dresses are of white alpaca or merino in the Watteau style, bordered with ruches of color. The tiny breakfast cap is a mere rosette of Valenciennes with ribbon, leaves, and strings. Short plaid dresses, or merino of self-color, made with gored skirt and wide bias flounce and a small pelerine cape, are homelike and serviceable. Crosscut bands of silk for trimming. Afternoon dresses of colored poplin or of black are made with demi-train and trimmed with plaid velvet bands and sashes. Surplice and Pompadour waists, with muslin chemisette. A black silk over-skirt looped or puffed, and a small bodice or bib back and front is worn over colored dresses for giving variety to a small wardrobe. A velvet bodice, a sleeveless jacket of black satin and lace, plaid sashes, and bretelles are all graceful additions to home dress.

The hair is arranged in a braided chignon with a flowing crimped tress. A velvet band surrounds the chignon and is tied with a bow on top.

EVENING DRESSES.

The wedding dress without the veil is worn to parties as a complement to the hostess. Lavender, pearl, a delicate gray, and the light Pompadour fawn are trousseau colors. Chameleon gros grains in these shades shot with white and a faint tinge of rose color were recently made for a bride. The skirts have the demi-train, fashionable for all but wedding dresses, low round corsages filled out with lace and tulle, or else high square corsage and sleeves ruffled at the elbow. Neither sashes nor paniers adorn the skirts, which are very full at the back. A lavender dress is trimmed with white guipure lace dotted with seed pearls and jet, headed by white satin folds with a centre piping of the dress silk. A chameleon, in which cuir color prevails, has a wide Chantilly flounce extending up the front to the waist with pointed revers of velvet of exactly the shade of the dress. Low corsage with bertha of velvet and lace.

White kid boots serve with almost any dress, and are therefore economical. A light glove faintly tinged with color is preferred to pure white.

LINGERIE.

A bride should have a liberal supply of under-clothing, yet it is scarcely wise to provide a great profusion of garments, to be packed away and left to turn yellow or rotten with starch. It is safe to premise that any young lady of average industry keeps herself supplied with six or eight suits of body linen that are good enough for "second best" in her trousseau. The same number, newly added, will be quite sufficient for a daily change if desired, and will be quite as many as can be well taken care of. We saw recently the trousseau of a lady who is a member of one of the wealthiest families in the country. The additions to her wardrobe, furnished by a New York house, consist of eight suits of the three important pieces—the chemises of linen, percale drawers, and cambric gown—all trimmed alike, eight flannel skirts, ten muslin skirts, a hair-cloth petticoat instead of hoops, six corset covers, six French peignoirs, and six plain muslin chemises extra. The bridal suit alone costs $75. It is trimmed with diagonal puffs of linen cambric, and bands of needle-work and Valenciennes. The yoke of the gown is lined with rose-colored silk. The hair-cloth skirt costs $15. All the materials are furnished of the best quality, the fit is perfect, the trimmings fine and on some suits elaborate, and the sewing done in the most beautiful manner; yet the bill only sums up about $500, which is not a great deal more than many a careless shopper would pay for the material.

A careful bride, who makes her own outfit with the assistance of her mother and sisters, is advised to purchase pure linen of the Richardson brand, Wamsutta muslin for most garments, and Lonsdale cambric for skirts and gowns. By way of trimming let her use her own embroidery, wider bands neatly stitched with the machine, pearl tating, a little strong Valenciennes, and an abundance of tiny ruffles and puffs, not bought ready-made in the present lazy fashion, but with rolled hems and gathers made by her own fingers. The thick linen cambric sold at $1 50 a yard is fine and durable for this purpose.

Of cambric handkerchiefs with broad hems, linen collars and cuffs edged with lace, tucked chemisettes, and hosiery, there should be no stint.

WEDDING INVITATIONS.

An inexpensive wedding invitation now used requires but one card. The formula is:

MR. AND MRS. SMITH

Request the Pleasure of your Company at the Marriage of their Daughter to

Mary

Henry Johnson,

ON THURSDAY, MAY 5, AT 9 O'CLOCK P.M.

999 Jefferson Street.

For information received thanks are due, for dresses, to Mesdames DIEDEN and VIRFOLET; for bonnets, to Miss PAGE and Madame FERREIRO; for veils and coiffures, to Messrs. BRAITEAU, BARKER, and DIBBLEE; for lingerie, to Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co. and LORD & TAYLOR; and for jewelry, to Messrs. BALL & BLACK, TIFANY & Co., BROWNE & SPAULDING, and STARR & MARCUS.

PERSONAL.

MR. COLFAX is a wag as well as a politician. Just before his marriage with Miss WADE one of his friends remarked to him, "The newspapers have you married as well as chosen Vice-President." "Yes," replied Mr. COLFAX, "elected but not sworn in, in either case."

The Baron ROTHSCHILD, just deceased, when he heard of the death of the head of the AGNADE family, asked, "How much does he leave?" "Twenty millions." "You mean eighty," "No, twenty." "Dear me! I thought he was in easy circumstances!"

A few personal friends of Miss ALICE CARY manifested, a few evenings since, an appreciation of her genius as a poet and her worth as a woman by presenting her with $1000. The presentation talk was felicitously done by Mr. GREILEY. Mr. G. is a warm personal friend of the CARY sisters, whom we account to be among the cleverest and most delightful women on this continent.

Mr. SAUNDERS, the accomplished and urbane librarian of the Astor Library, and author of the piquant "Salads for the Solitary" and the "Social Mosaics," etc., has been collecting the current information about Woman, Love, and Marriage, into a handsome volume, which will prove valuable to seekers of information on these topics. One sage remark deserves to be especially quoted: "Marriages," he says, "are not so commonly unhappy as some people suspect. Most of those who complain of conjugal miseries generally have themselves to blame; they have as much satisfaction as their natures would have been susceptible of in any other condition."

"What does the General say about his Cabinet?" "Why, that until he receives the formal notification that the Congress of the United States has declared him to be elected President he will have nothing to say about it. To an old military friend he is reported to have said: 'The idea of making up my Cabinet now! Why, General, I have not yet received a certificate of election, and until I get that little document I don't think I will trouble my head much about my future constitutional advisers. No use to plan a campaign until you have a war, you know, General. No use to expose your order of battle until the moment of action arrives, eh, General? When I get my certificate I will make my Cabinet, and nobody is going to know of it until it gets into print."

The so-called "private view" of the Academy's winter exhibition was thronged with the intellect, beauty, and fashion of New York. Among others were seen there the venerable Professor MORSE, the founder of the institution, P. B. WIGHT, the architect of the superb structure which forms its local habitation, EASTMAN JOHNSON, the prince of American genre painters, T. C. FARRER, the high-priest of Pre-Raphaelitism, EDWIN WHITE, E. W. NICHOLS, and many others of the artists who are not new in Europe, whither a host of them are flown; the urbane Dr. BELLows, General ANDERSON, Dr. HITCHCOCK, GEORGE P. PUTNAM, HENRY M. FIELD, of the Evangelist, with his accomplished wife, and OLIVER JOHNSON, of the Independent; and last, but not least, the gentle-looking critic, CLARENCE COOK, whose pen deals such sharp thrusts. The portraits of ELLIOTT, LEUTZKE, and the brothers MOUNT, shrouded with crape and surrounded by their works, reminded the Academicians of the havoc which death had made in their ranks during the past year. Three sides of the great south room are hung with the works of ELLIOTT and LEUTZKE, chiefly portraits. On the whole, there are few pictures of marked interest; but the winter exhibition is always of a miscellaneous character, and second in importance to that of the spring, which admits only pictures which have never before been exhibited.

The Duchess of SUTHERLAND, who died last month, was the mother of ten children, and one of the handsomest women in England; and very "spacious." Retaining the fashion of the low-necked dress even when nearly sixty, she did nothing to break the impression of immense size which her figure was calculated to convey. She was a little queer about some things, one of which was faith in Dr. CUMMING, the prophecy man.

Mr. CORCORAN, the opulent banker of Washington, is about to emulate Mr. PEABODY in a benevolent work. He proposes to erect, at his own expense, in Washington, an asylum with apartments for sixty old ladies, of good family, who have lost their property and become needy. It is understood he also purposes to endow the asylum with sufficient means to provide clothing, food, and attendance for its inmates.

The Rev. Dr. LITTLEJOHN, who was only three weeks ago elected Bishop of the new diocese of Central New York, has just been elected Bishop of Long Island, which latter he will doubtless accept. So far as the diocese of Central New York is concerned we suppose he don't "see" it.

Professor GOLDWIN SMITH has expressed the opinion that there have been but four really great orators in English history—PYM, BOLINGBROKE, CHATHAM, and JOHN BRIGHT. The speeches of BRIGHT, like the speeches of DEMOSTHENES, are, says Mr. SMITH, not declamations, but counsels given to the nation of his time, and as such they will live.

Mr. ISAAC WALKER, of St. Louis, who died in this city a few days since, left to his heirs, seven or eight in number, a million of dollars each. He was the architect of his own fortune, commencing with naught but his two hands and a clear head. He was an eminently just man, a kind husband, a good father, and in all the relations of life blameless.

M. F. SARSEY, a French writer, went recently to M. VICTORIN SARDOU's beautiful country seat at Marley. He said: "What a charming place to work at!" M. SARDOU replied: "Oh, dear, no! A good place to dream in; but when I want to work I slip on my overcoat, take the railway, and in fifteen minutes I am in the Chaussee d'Antin—there I get in the humor for work."

ROSSINI, who has just died at the age of seventy-seven, enjoyed as much perhaps of the pleasure and fame of the world as any man of his time. We make a president or king every four years, or less; but a great musical composer—our daily delight—comes but once or twice in a lifetime. ROSSINI wrote "Tancredi" at the age of twenty-one; the "Barber of Seville" at twenty-four—the best comic opera ever written; "Otello" at twenty-five; "Mose in Egitto" at twenty-six; "La Gazza Ladra" at twenty-seven. His active labors terminated nearly or quite thirty years ago, when the "Stabat Mater," the last work worthy of his fame, was written. Since then he has been living in luxurious retirement, at first in and about Bologna, but more recently at Paris. He possessed many coupons and other assets.

A Chicago gentleman, who professes to speak by the card, says General GRANT will certainly nominate an officer to succeed him as General, and that the choice is more than likely to fall on General GEORGE H. THOMAS. Several prominent military men incline to that opinion.

They pay the head of the British army—the DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE—fair wages. He receives as General Officer £16 a day; as Commander-in-Chief, £7 a day; as Colonel of the First Regiment of the Line nearly £1000 a year; as Colonel of the First Regiment of Engineers, £800 a year; and as Colonel of the First Regiment of Artillery, £600. Besides these neat little rills of income he possesses a big, clean stream of £12,000 per annum. On these he is obliged to rough it.

Good old (very old) Mrs. LYDIA MEADE, of North Brookfield, Massachusetts, completed her one hundredth birthday on the 9th of November. A fine old celebration was held in honor of the event. The old lady retains her faculties to a remarkable degree. Her eyesight is good, hearing but slightly impaired, and her general health so good that she has promise of years to come. Four generations were present at the meeting. Mrs. MEADE goes to bed in the dark, and sleeps alone, and hopes to live until she completes a crochet tidy for each of her grandchildren.

The illness of the son of the King of the Belgians has brought to the public some fine traits in the character of his parents. Recently the King, having, while standing at his palace window, observed the funeral of a small infant passing by, burst into tears, and ordered a wreath of immortelles to be carried from him to the sorrowing parents; "for," said he, "we are all alike in grief. We are not kings or plebeians, we are parents."

Gentlemen's Cravats.

THESE cravats are very pretty and new, and are easily made. They are of velvet, gros grain, striped satin, etc. The cravats, Figs. 4-12, are buttoned to the neck of the shirt by means of an elastic cord on the back, and fastened by means of an elastic cord or hooks and eyes. The cravats, Figs. 1-3, are finished with a band, which is so arranged that the cravat may be made tighter or looser at pleasure.

Figs. 1 and 2. BLACK AND WHITE STRIPED SATIN CRAVAT.—This consists of a piece of the stuff four inches wide and twenty-four inches long, which is lined with foundation muslin and black silk. A piece of the same material six inches long and two inches and a quarter wide is arranged over the middle part of the cravat, which is then doubled over it in the manner shown by the pattern. The cravat is fastened on a foundation (see Fig. 2), over which is arranged a band of the material. The foundation is of stiff pasteboard covered with black silk, and is cut from Fig. 29 of the Supplement. It is fastened by means of eyelets, which are fastened over a hook in the manner shown by Fig. 2. Several eyelets may be worked in the band, by which means it may be made looser or tighter at pleasure.

Fig. 3. VIOLET SILK CRAVAT.—The ends of this cravat are each ten inches long and two inches wide, of double material, and lined with foundation muslin. The under ends are pointed, while the upper ends are fastened in a knot, which is cut from Fig. 25 of the Supplement of pasteboard, outside material, and lining, and sewed together according to the corresponding figures on the pattern. The widest part of this knot is on the upper side, and one end of the band, which is an inch wide and twenty-two inches long, is also fastened inside, but the other end is run through the knot, and afterward through a loop under the under end of the cravat.

Fig. 4. CRAVAT OF BROWN AND WHITE STRIPED SATIN.—For making this cravat take a bias piece of stuff ten inches long and two inches and a half wide. On the under side of this set another bias piece in such a manner that it extends half an inch beyond the edge on one side. Then point one end of the stuff, and also the under piece, so that another cravat end is initiated in the manner shown in the illustration. Line both together, and fasten it in a knot three inches from the upper end. This knot is cut from Fig. 27 of the Supplement of outside material and lining, and sewed together according to the corresponding figures on the pattern. The upper part is then pleated and sewed on a foundation cut from Fig. 26 of pasteboard, lining, and outside material.

Fig. 5. GARNET SATIN CRAVAT.—This cravat consists of a strip of satin four inches wide and eight inches long, which is so doubled that the seam lies along the middle of the under side. Both ends are fringed. In the middle it is fastened with a knot of the satin, below which the edges are sewed together with a few stitches, in order to make the ends hang better. Cut the foundation of pasteboard and black silk from Fig. 28 of the Supplement.

Fig. 6. BLUE AND WHITE STRIPED SATIN CRAVAT.—This is arranged on a foundation which is cut from Fig. 30 of the Supplement of pasteboard, outside, and lining. The pointed ends are three inches wide and four inches long, and pleated on the upper ends; the bows are an inch and a half wide and lined with stiff muslin.

Fig. 7. RED SATIN CRAVAT.—This elegant cravat is made of a bias strip fifteen inches long and two inches wide, which is so laid together that it is only half an inch wide. The ends are pointed. It is wound around the foundation in the manner shown by the illustration. Fig. 31 of the Supplement gives the pattern of the foundation.

Figs. 8 and 9. LILAC AND WHITE STRIPED SATIN CRAVAT.—The ends of this cravat are eight inches long by two inches wide, of double material, and lined with foundation muslin. The ends are pointed. About two inches and a half from the upper ends arrange a knot which has been made from Fig. 27 of the Supplement. The ends and the knot are sewed to the foundation made from Fig. 32.

Fig. 10. WHITE CHINA CRAPE CRAVAT.—The ends are five inches long, two inches and a half wide, and pointed on the lower ends. The loops of the bow are each an inch and a half wide and two inches and a half long. The foundation is made from Fig. 33.

Fig. 11. BLACK GROS GRAIN CRAVAT.—This cravat is made of two ends of double material each eighteen inches long and an inch wide. Arrange the loops in the manner shown by the illustration, the under ones first; after which cross the ends and make the upper loops, the one on the right side from the under end, and that on the left side from the upper end. BREAKFAST COLLAR.

FIGURED LACE VEIL.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV, Figs. 8 and 9.

Round Veil with Fringe.

This veil is netted of fine black filoselle silk. On a foundation of a hundred stitches work over a netting mesh half an inch in circumference, always in the round, twenty-eight rounds on the same number of stitches, and afterward ten rounds backward and forward, of which shorten each three stitches on each side, so that the veil shall be rounded and somewhat longer in front. Lastly, work another round over the whole of the stitches on the under edge of the veil, and tie in each stitch a strand of fringe three inches long and composed of ten threads. Through the stitches of the first round run an elastic cord, by means of which the veil is fastened to the hat.

Breakfast Collar and Kerchiefs.

BREAKFAST COLLAR.—This collar consists of a straight strip of muslin twenty-four inches long and an inch and a half wide, the edges of which are hemmed, one on the right and the other on the wrong side. On each end set a bavette of muslin, needle work insertion, and Valenciennes insertion, for the arrangement of which see the illustration. Trim the edges with gathered Valenciennes lace, and double the collar over in the manner shown by the illustration.

KERCHIEF WITH GUILPURE TRIMMING.—This kerchief is made of a three-cornered piece of muslin, which is sixteen inches long on the bias edge (upper edge of the kerchief). In the middle of the back cut a slit three inches deep in the muslin, and hem the edges of the slit and the bias edges. Hem the straight edges and sew on guipure insertion an inch wide, after which edge the whole with guipure lace half an inch wide.

CROCHET KERCHIEF.—This kerchief is crocheted of fine crochet cotton in a design simulating lace, and is bordered with crochet edging. Begin on one side with a foundation a foot long, and work on this: 1st round.—Always alternately 5 ch. (chain), 1 sc. (single crochet) in the third following foundation stitch. Work the following rounds like the first round, but in these the sc. must always be worked on the middle stitch of the chain-stitch scallops of the preceding round. In order to make the bias upper edge crochet at the beginning of every new round the first sc. in the middle stitch of the first chain-stitch scallop of the former round, but at the end the rounds must be ended in a straight line, so as to form the other straight side edge of the kerchief. Edge the finished kerchief with a round of single crochet, in which crochet over the ends of the threads, and afterward edge the kerchief with the following edging: 1st round.—On the first sc. on the outer edge of the kerchief 1 sc., then * 7 ch., 1 dc.

former round, 8 ch., 1 stc. (short treble crochet) in the first of the 8 ch. Repeat from *. 4th round.—In every chain-stitch scallop of the former round 1 sc., after every sc. 7 ch. Lastly, gather the kerchief slightly on the middle of the upper part of the back and on the fronts in the manner shown by the illustration.

Two Designs for Embroidering Lace.

The designs here given serve for covers, curtains, or veils.
Fig. 1.—The stripes of this design are embroidered on coarse lace, one of them with twist and the other with untwisted knitting-cotton. The manner of working is shown by the pattern at the ends of the two unfinished strips. The hole through which the needle is put for the next stitch is designated by a ●, and the one through which it is drawn back on the upper side of the work by a ×.

Fig. 2. DESIGN FOR EMBROIDERING LACE.—The figures of this design are worked with loose cotton or coarse filoselle silk in a kind of quilting stitch in the manner shown by Fig. 3. Always run the thread twice around the designated threads of the lace, but in the second stitch do not bring the thread out where the working of the next thread is commenced, but first in the next hole designated by a ● on Fig. 3. The stitches which are to be worked are shown by a short line on the illustration.

MAURITIAN MARKETS.

TO see the market to perfection you must rise betimes and get there by six o'clock. At that hour all its treasures will be visible, and all its habitués assembled. Long before daylight the vendors of produce have been plodding along the highways, bearing in large tin boxes the things they have to offer. Men gathered from every quarter of the globe here mingle. Mauritius is such a calling-place for the world's shipping as you find nowhere else, and all nations and tongues are represented in its streets. The market itself consists of a series of light elegant sheds, paved with stone or marble, and duly divided into compartments. It is about 300 feet long and 250 feet wide.

Neither counters nor tables are provided for the goods offered, but simply the bare floor. Each stall-holder takes his stand, or rather his seat, upon the stones, where he squats calmly in the midst of his little piles of cabbages, fruit, potatoes, beans, pepper, ginger, tomatoes, and so forth. In the intervals of custom the vendor employs himself with shelling beans or picking roots. He, or she—for the fair sex are much given to the art of selling—do not overpower passers-by with demands for patronage. If you pause nigh, he looks up with dignity, and awaits your pleasure, or possibly he may hazard a remark laudatory of his wares. If you wish to buy, about one-third of what is asked will be a fair approximation to the real price. First prices are only nominal. Fine potatoes are to be had at twopence-halfpenny a pound; eggs, three-halfpence each; celery, fourpence a bunch; brocoli, fivepence each; green mangoes, a penny each; pumpkins, sixpence each, or a halfpenny a slice. Here are balls of tamarinds, most dainty material for a chutney, at a penny a pound; tiny onions can be had at three-halfpence a pound. Tolerably large egg-plants, the insides of which are stuffed with herbs and chopped meat, are the same price. Nine insipid tomatoes can be had for a halfpenny. Haricot beans, of all colors and sizes, are present every where. Of fruits there is a poor show, the only noticeable one being the delicious litchie—a little-known but most delicious fruit, growing in a large shrub-like tree, having a hard sheath, which comes off readily, showing something like a strawberry. In taste it resembles a muscadelle grape, but there is a large stone in the centre. They are sold at about two for a penny.

In the meat market there is more variety and a better quality of produce. Especially is this the case in the fish section. There is a plentiful supply of fresh turtle at a shilling per pound. There are turtle eggs, too, the best being those that are found after dissection. Noble crayfish, two feet long at least, are only one shilling and sixpence each. The crabs are small and untempting. Mangalls, a sort of cat-fish, are offered for one shilling and sixpence. Long-nosed guard-fish can be bought for two shillings each. But these pretty, sky-blue speckled fellows, yclept "skipjacks," are more to one's taste. One instinctively shudders before the young sharks, which look harmless and flabby enough now, but whose budding teeth are really too significant. They are good eating, nevertheless, weigh five pounds, and cost one shilling and sixpence. Other fish are here in abundance, and in strange variety of form and color; scarlet, orange, green, and blue—flashing an hour or two ago, meteor-like, through the limpid waters of the Indian Sea.

Pass on to the flesh-stalls. The beef consumed in the island is very fair to the eye, and far from inestimable as to quality. Prices range, according to cut, from sixpence to sevenpence-halfpenny a pound. Mutton is dearer, and of indifferent quality, being tough, and one shilling per pound. Pork was not to be seen, and for certain remarkable reasons it is not in repute among the white residents. A full-grown fowl sells for three shillings. But then how mean and scraggy, how leggy and skinny is the bird! Turkey and geese, however, are abundant. Many a fine flock may you see cackling or strutting round the shabby hut of some Malabar poulterer. Bread is white, spongy, and threepence a pound; slices thereof you may partake of at the coffee-stalls, where dark Phyllises dispense cupfuls of coffee to large groups of customers, most of whom are sailors or wayfarers.

I ought, perhaps, to have said that all the stall-holders in the market are colored people, either Indian coolies or Chinamen. They are bound to exhibit sign-boards, and the inscriptions on some of these are highly amusing and graphic. Fine pretensions mark them all. These retailers have souls above those of their European rivals, and no plain presentment of a name unadorned by any prefix will do for them. Take, for instance, these literal transcriptions of one or two:

Mr. Scholastique,
Belle Fruit.

The next is a publican. Possibly he may be a noted epicure, and his own tastes are, therefore, a guarantee of excellence:

Mr. K. Montousa,
My Grocer.

A wizened, puckered little Hindoo announces himself as

Mr. Ramsamy.

The following, though puzzling, can be solved:

Mr. Appasamy. Vege.
Tables. Fruits.

Upon a board of scant dimensions appears this declaration:

Mr. Souptave,
N. Vegetable.
S.

We are next introduced to an historical character impersonated by a very small boy:

Mr. Abdool Kader,
Grocer.

Then comes a thrilling announcement. How terse, and expressive of the stout, copper-hued Juno beneath:

Madame.

My last yet baffles my powers of comprehension:

Mr. Troovanga.
Dayachy.
Pakee Kee Padlady.
Draper.

While taking these strange inscriptions down, I became the unconscious cause of intense anxiety to each of the vendors in turn. Anxious looks were cast; low whispers interchanged. At last, unable to restrain their curiosity any longer, one of the "inscribed" inquired of my companion whether I was not a police commissioner, and what dire fate was awaiting them for what unknown offense.

ONE OF THE THANKSGIVINGS.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

A CHARMING room, as we look at it, to which generation after generation had added some conceit in the shape of a window-full of flowers, an alcove lined with books, an arch in which richly glimmered the golden reeds of an old-fashioned organ—simple furniture enough—and inexpensive upholstery, whose dainty chintzes refreshed the eye, and vases and prints and busts that made it seem well peopled with simple and sweet delights; a slight woman sitting by the fire, deep in the mystery of crocheting rose petals round a baby's sacque, the fire-light playing on her braids of hair and turning their chestnut into red gold, and giving a tinge of fresh color to a cheek that had grown too pale; a young man, the size of three of his little vis-à-vis, lolling in an easy-chair, and clothed upon with a luxurious velvet dressing-gown, and contemplating the unfilled pipe between his fingers with more complacent satisfaction than he had any reason to give to the tint of his wife's cheeks, than he ever did give to the tint of his wife's braids, for all they were so much lovelier now in color than any meerschaum could ever hope to be. This young man was Mr. Harry Montresor, a civil engineer, with a respectable business of some few thousands a year, and as many maps as he could draw of townships in the Adirondack and wood-lots around the Great Slave Lake, at five hundred dollars the map, and all necessary journeys taken long ago. An unsatisfied and grumbling young dog though; discontented that his wife was not—no, on the whole, he was well enough pleased with her; how could he help it? He wouldn't have charged her for old Argemum's daughter for that damsel's weight in diamonds thrown into the other scale! But he was totally disgusted with the capricious Fate that had set him down in the old Montresor house that had stood where it now did, and had been inhabited by Montresors without number for nearly twice a hundred years—the idiot!—disgusted that he was doomed to this delightful piece of antiquity of which he ought to have been proud, instead of being dumped into a millionaire's palace on Murray Hill, instead of being boxed up in one of those houses each so indistinguishable from its neighbors in every appointment and appurtenance, both within and without, that it seems as if the whole region must have been custom-made in one piece, and then the various dwellings cut off by the ell Flemish, or some corresponding measure, to order! Yes, Montresor was quarreling with his happiness, quite forgetful of the old proverb that he who quarrels with good luck soon shall make friends with ill, quarreling with his happiness in a way that needed a stirring reproof; and if the slighted old mansion of his ancestors was not about to administer it and give him a lesson for life, it would be only because it was not yet old enough to do so.

He was a handsome fellow though, this Harry Montresor, as he sat there admiring his pipe and his mustache, and alternating the admiration with reflections on his bad fortune that had just cheated him out of a comfortable corner in stocks; handsome enough to make up for a thousand faults in a loving little wife's view, if not in yours and mine, with his head, like a young Greek god's, all sunned over with clustering and massy rings of golden hair, and his gray eyes, keen as an eagle's. And so little Kitty seemed to think, as in duty bound, while every now and then she dropped her ivory needle and pink wools, and gazed up at him in a reverie of as sheer pleasure as if he had been a picture and she had owned it.

"To be thankful for? Just mention any thing, pray!" said Montresor, defiantly, continuing a conversation lately begun, as he thrust his feet into his gorgeous slippers—Kitty's handiwork—beside the comfortable sea-coal fire, on that night before the last Thursday of November, 1868.

"Oh, Monty!" cried his wife, opening her blue eyes in dismay at a sort of new-fashioned profanity which she had never heard from him or any one else before. "Nothing to be thankful for, when you're alive?"

"Ah, you want me to say, with Mr. Spurgeon, 'Out of hell, and complain?' I suppose."

"You wicked boy! Just because a speculation goes wrong now, to be blind to every other blessing—"

"Other! It's one blessing, then, to have a speculation go wrong? I don't see it, I confess—especially when, if it had gone right, I should have moved into a five-story freestone front instead of being obliged to stay here in this old ramshackle concern. It's no blessing to me to have riches slide through my fingers just as I was grasping them, whatever it may be to you, Mrs. Monty."

"No, of course not. I should like to be rich so that I might give away— But then I don't know as I really do want to be rich either," said the little wife, meditatively. "It would be such a care, and such a responsibility—perhaps I might be found wrapping my treasure in a napkin, who knows? instead of using it for others; for after once knowing any great amount of luxury one must be always in fear of losing it—"

"I'll take the responsibility. And as to the care, I wish I had no heavier cares at this blessed minute than looking after a million seven-thirties."

"Why, Monty, looking after them? You couldn't look over them! But then, what cares have you at this blessed minute, please?" said the coaxing little woman, bending forward, with the light of the fire reddening her pretty forehead.

"Cares? Cares enough! Your pale face that the fire is burning now, for one."

"Nonsense! I'm always pale, you know. Real cares, I mean."

"Real cares? Oh, very well; here's a household on my shoulders—that's no care at all; food and shelter, lights and fire for half a dozen people, and only my wits to make both ends meet. Here's the very fire on the hearth fed with bank-bills."

"But the year's fuel was all bought and paid for in the summer, so that needn't trouble you now, dear. And I don't put on the sea-coal all the time, only high days and holidays—when you are at home that is; it does make every thing so cheerful."

"As if I wanted you should stint yourself, you foolish child! Use it all the time. So it does make things cheerful—cheerful as sunshine; next thing at any rate," as he glanced around him.

It did indeed that night; the dancing flames lit up the quaint low room with its old-time arches and niches; the fitful flashes now lingering on the ancient portraits on the wall, and sparkling in the eyes that had ceased to sparkle a century since; now alighting for one moment on the brow of the marble Psyche; now rounding out all the luscious contours of a basket of late fruit, all the delicate half-tints of a dish of flowers; now gilding the antique silver candlesticks with the lustre of rubies (they had held the tapers that burned at his great-grandmother's wedding, Heaven alone knew how many degrees backward in ascent of descent; and though Montresor, at the beginning of the days of paper-money, had talked of having them coined into specie, he would in reality as soon have coined his heart's-blood); and now illuminating the eyes of the little wife, and giving again the bloom to her face that belonged to the days of her first youth. Outside, the winds whistled and tossed the naked boughs cruelly, but the heavy folds of the curtains within shut the whole scene into comfort.

But Montresor had been in an up-town palace that day, and the sheen of damasks, inlaid tables, buhl and ormolu, mosaics and old masters, had cast a blur upon his vision and made it almost impossible for him to see just now much charm in the paraphernalia of his home—his home in a house so full of memories, and where so many ancestors had lived before him that he irreverently declared it seemed to him as if they had been soaked into the walls, or else he were living in a tomb; for, turn which way he would, up started some old dignity of a Montresor till he was sick of the thought of them! and presently he recommenced his grumble.

"I don't know," answered his wife again, and resting her flying fingers. "I don't believe I would care to move into any such grand house if I might—it would be such a job to pack all our things—"

"Things? You don't suppose we'd take these duds with us?" in high contempt.

"Duds? Oh, for shame, Monty, when I love every one of them so like dear old friends."

"Very old friends. You shall have them in a garret all to yourself then. For when we move into a new house we'll start with every thing else new. I'll have all about me fresh and fine for once, and not an atom of rococo between the attic and the lower cellar!"

"Then," said Kitty, laughing, "keeping it all in order would be such a load on my mind as would weigh me into the grave. I had rather live here, where we are the—somethingth generation, where you were born, where we came when we were married, where our children were born—"

"There it is again! Our children! Married a couple of years, doubting how we can take care of a single urchin, and along come two—always send twins to poor men, it's a trial of patience and faith, and fits them for their struggle in life and for heaven afterward! However, it's a blessing they weren't twenty!" said Montresor, shrugging his shoulders.

"Oh, you dreadful man!" cried Kitty, bursting into a shower of tears. "As if it was my fault! As if—" But here the tears very fortunately choked her.

"Who said it was your fault, you dear little simpleton?" asked Montresor, getting up, a trifle unwillingly it must be owned, and coming round where he could lift her face and kiss the tears off from it. "You are as much of a trial as they are. There, do be still, Kitty, or I shall imagine I've said something terrible."

But Kitty had been quite ready to cry upon that subject for a long time, whenever it should turn up apropos of tears, and she had no intention of being still. "You have, you have!" she sobbed.

"Take care, then, or I'll say it again," responded Montresor, turning on his heel. "If it isn't enough to make any man swear, to have to pay twenty-five dollars a week to two monthly nurses for the rest of his natural life—which can't be long, though, at the rate of losing half of every night's sleep into the bargain, as I do at these presents—"

"Oh, perhaps you'll find your sleep a great deal too soon, you unnatural father! God will see how you care for your children, and take them away from you!"

Mr. Montresor paused, and looked at the little woman, who had sprung up from her chair before him and stood speaking so indignantly, with the tears shining like sparks of fire on her cheek. Like most people who are always defying Providence and applying reason to the inscrutable things of religion, he was not a little superstitious, and suddenly the fear lest his wife's words should be a prophecy silenced him. For, in his heart of hearts, and but for the contrary mood of the moment, he was as proud and fond of the twins as if his name had been Micawber.

"Well, well, Kitty," he said then, pacifically, "I'll say no more about it. You know I love the little scamps as much as you do—"

"If you did you couldn't talk so! I'd take them and go away—if I had any where to go to," sobbed Kitty still.

"Well, thank Heaven, you haven't. That is something to be thankful for," said Montresor, gayly.

"I never thought you'd begin to taunt me of that so soon!" she exclaimed.

"Oh, you unreasonable little piece of perversity!" he exclaimed in return, catching her up in his arms and holding her face on a level with his own—an enormous altitude for Kitty to attain—and looking in her eyes till her crying turned to laughing in spite of herself. But she was not going to relinquish the battle for all that.

"I'm sure I don't want your hateful old nurses!" she cried, when he had put her down. "Sitting up there like two mummies, and never letting me go near my own babies! And I've tried to offend them and be rid of them every way I could!" declared Kitty. "And they've gone out to-night to the spectacle; and I hope the cars will run over them and they'll never come back!"

"Mercy on us! Stilettes and poison! What a blood-thirsty wretch it is! I don't see but you're as wicked as I am."

"No, I'm not!" cried Kitty, unable to be appeased. "For I don't want to kill my own children!"

"Want to kill my own children! How do you dare to talk to me in that way, Kitty?" said he, now becoming really angry in his own turn.

"You do, you know you do," said Kitty, confronting him like an outraged bantam fighting for her chickens.

"If you say another word of the kind to me I'll leave the house and not come back to-night."

"I dare say you will! And get a good night's sleep by means of it!" retorted Kitty, breaking down entirely at the harrowing prospect thus presented.

"My getting a good night's sleep seems to be the most unpardonable offense of the whole," said her husband, laughing at that, reflecting that he had always said his wife was the strangest compound of a woman and a child that he had ever fallen in or fallen out with, and taking his chair again quite good-humoredly, after filling the meerschaum, already so beautifully colored that he had that day refused a five-hundred-dollar bill for it. Then there was a brief reconciliation, and then the calumet was lighted.

"There, we'll drop the subject, Kitty," said he, in a superior way. "It doesn't follow that I want to kill the twins, you must remember, because I feel I can't afford to give them all they ought to have. I suppose now those mummies, as you call them, are gone, I can have a pipe in peace without being told that I am playing Othello to the children's Desdemona, suffocating them with bolsters of smoke."

"You grudge them their little life," said Kitty, in a sort of ground-swell after the storm.

"There, there, there!"

"But you don't grudge yourself a pipe that would pay for twenty nurses!"

To this the outraged father condescended no reply.

"Any other man would be thankful for them," continued the incorrigible Kitty. "And instead of complaining now, he would think how much better two sons can be brought up than one, and how much more lively and happy a home will be, a dozen years from now, for the coming in and going out of two great merry boys. If you should lose them, Harry Montresor, you'd be sorry for this!"

"Of course I don't want to lose them now they're here, and I don't mean to if I can help it," said Harry, taking his pipe from his mouth after listening to this tirade, and feeling it necessary to retort lest the dignity of manhood were swamped. "But I always despised philopenas, any way. I don't want any freaks of nature in my path. There's something uncanny about a single life divided between two bodies. If one is sick the other ails, and, half the time, if one dies the other either becomes bedridden or of enfeebled intellect, or else suddenly blossoms out into a double vitality like some murderous thing that has absorbed the life of the other one. I don't like mysteries in daily—"

"Our whole life is a mystery," said Kitty, gravely, for now that the child in her had had its spite, the woman in her must needs react upon penitence and piety.

"That's enough, then. I don't like complications of mystery. Next thing you'll be giving me a Siamese pair, and asking me to be thankful for that. Which brings me back to where we started from, and if you want me to thank Heaven that we have the children any way, I answer that I don't see any reason to be particularly grateful for something that merely comes along with the due course of nature."

"Who made nature, Montresor?" asked Kitty, now quite subdued in the consideration of her husband's evidently dangerous state of mind.

"Oh, go along with your conundrums, and let me smoke my pipe."

"Do you really mean to say, Monty, that now, the evening before Thanksgiving Day, you positively can't find any subject in your own circumstances for thanksgiving? I had no idea you were in earnest."

"Devil a one."

"I was very ill a little while ago, but my life and health were spared to you. Is that nothing?"

"You had a skillful doctor, and nobody expected any thing but your recovery. It was a natural affair, Providence didn't go out of its way to do me any favor. You might as reasonably ask me to be grateful for every breath I draw."

"I am."

"That's exactly the way with women! They imagine that the Almighty has them each individually in some special keeping. I dare say now that you make confidences to Heaven about your jams and pickles—"

"I don't! I'm afraid to hear you talk so. I am. It's blasphemous. I only pray to do my duty as a good wife and mother."

"Which, in your thoughts, you mean to cover all that ground," said Montresor, laughing again. "I fancied as much. But do you really suppose, Kitty, that the great Eye which watches the immense universe, has time to pay much private and peculiar attention to your little affairs?"

"I don't know what is little with God, nor what is great," said Kitty, reverentially. But my dear babies are of as much consequence in his plans as I am, as any king or potentate is. That I am sure of."

"I am not." All the same, he liked to hear her say so.

"Why, Harry," said Kitty, taking her gaze out of the fire, and lifting it to him, "don't you believe that the Lord knows that they are sleeping sweetly at this moment, and has sent two of his great strong angels to fold their wings over them?"

"Well—no—I don't," said Montresor, sending a ring of smoke up the ceiling, and, though pleased, yet rather amused by his wife's earnestness than otherwise.

"Their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven."

"That's all poetry, Kitty."

"It's the Bible!" cried Kitty.

"Kitty, I have come to the conclusion that all this talk about special providences is the most egregious vanity on the face of the earth," said Montresor, laying down his pipe, and stirring the fire impatiently till the flames flew up the broad chimney in a sheet. "Am I, are you, two atoms of dust, of such consequence that I shall believe the natural laws which govern the whole of creation are to be broken and turned aside for us?"

"No indeed," said Kitty, "no indeed, Monty, nothing like it. But when God made the laws he knew that you and I and every body were going to be in existence in our own time; and it follows from what we know of his goodness and loving-kindness that he must have adapted them all with reference to the eternal welfare of each and every one of us—only we are short-sighted, we see through a glass darkly."

"Suppose I fall from the top of a building morrow, and am shattered, by natural laws, of course—they're adapted to me with a vengeance!"

"Why, yes, dear, don't you see—I don't know how to explain—you ought to know by instinct—that God must be living in his laws, now, to-day, or else they wouldn't be laws, acting, living laws; and if, on the one side, natural effects should crush your body, on the other, God would be ready to fill you with his own strength to meet and endure—and then you forget that it may just be that God would teach us so that material bodily troubles are after all but slight affairs, and that the brief life here by which we set such store is nothing when compared with what he has for us further on."

"Oh, all that's a refinement on fact that I don't pretend to know any thing about. If I had the multiplex eyes of a dragon-fly or a locust I might undertake to peer into the Divine purposes; but I haven't, and as my eyes can only see so far, I imagine that I was only intended to see so far. But to make the matter more real to you—you unnatural wife that look upon my falling from the top of a building with such equanimity—what if the chimney should tumble in and put a terrible end to those two babies up stairs, what should you?"

"Oh, Monty, Monty, don't!"

"Come—do you suppose because I imagine a case, that therefore it's going to happen? Why that is running special providences into the ground."

"I don't like to have you talk so, dear. It makes me so uneasy—"

"Well, I won't. I'll ask only this one question, and have done. Do you suppose that the finger that balances the sun, that controls the planets, that measures their spaces to the constellations, has nothing absolutely better to do than to come down and interfere with your trivial concerns, in the tiny infinitesimal affairs of those babies, for instance?"

"Yes, Monty. Just that—"

"I only ask for information. You seem to be up in the matter so much more than I am or am ever likely to be," he said, loftily.

"You mustn't jest about it. For why not? Why not mingle in the affairs of those babies? Doesn't every influence around an infant help to form the character for all the future? I—truly I suppose so. For neither sun nor planets nor constellations weigh as much in the scales as the soul of one of those children—Hark! hark! Oh Heavens! what was that?"

It was a sound as if an earthquake with its appalling rumble had passed beneath the building in one wave, and the sides of the old house had split and opened; an echo as if a clap of thunder had burst upon the roof; a blow as if the roof itself had fallen in. Montresor sprang to his feet as if by an electric shock, uttering a loud cry; but no whisper passed his wife's lips as she dashed up the staircase after her two babies, like the wind itself.

In a moment afterward a shriek rang through the house, and then there was a dead hush. Montresor sprang to follow her, but all was total darkness up there, and a sudden sulphurous blast warned him that something had extinguished the gas and wrenched away the pipes, so that it was flowing out into the darkness, presently to reach the lights below in an explosion that would tear them all to atoms. He had a suspicion that the noise they had heard was the terrific report of gas somewhere escaped, and he made only two leaps before he was in the basement and far out under the sidewalks shutting off the main-pipe. In the succeeding instant the house was in the blackness of night. A match, a candle had been found; the draught through the open doors had carried off the vile air. He was springing up the staircase again, light in hand, and only staying when he reached his wife, who stood ash-colored, staring straight before her into what had just been darkness, half paralyzed, and not daring to take another step forward in order to explore her loss and misery, standing ankle-deep in the fallen lath and plaster of the ceiling of the nursery.

"The children!" gasped Montresor. And when he saw with one swift glance the ruin that might have crushed to death his wife herself had she been a second earlier, then the candle trembled in his hand and would have fallen. It was Kitty who caught it.

"Oh my God, Montresor! Look there!" she cried, breathlessly.

The rays of the candle hardly penetrated the dimness of the room, still filled with the white flying dust of the powdered portions of the ceiling, but she went running with it through all the debris, and stood holding it over the little crib, her face one rapture of prayer and gratitude and triumph. For there, under the light, Montresor saw the two little heads, with their shining silken locks nestled lovingly together, their two little faces rosy with sleeping smiles, the little dimpled arms interlocked, the little breasts rising and falling with the sweet deep breath of their safe slumber.

"Alive?" he cried, with trembling tones.

"Alive?"

"Alive!" she answered him. "Unhurt. For, oh Montresor, just look up!" And she pointed upward where one patch of the ceiling alone remained unfallen. Every where else the old worm-eaten, rat-riddled rafters were bare, but just above the crib this patch of plastering yet hung—had it fallen the blow must have struck the breath from the two children in one second of time. But it had lingered firm and had spared them. The old crack passing by that very spot, out of which he remembered to have seen a wasp crawl one summer's morning, had been the merciful barrier that had saved them. As he looked now—while he looked—he thought he saw a movement in the spot, like the wavering of a shadow; he darted forward and seized both the children at once, clutching them under one arm, careless of the sudden frightened screams, or of untender movement, and catching his wife's gown with the other hand he dragged her away after him, without finding the time or the breath to utter a syllable. In the next moment that remaining section of the ceiling followed the rest in one heavy sheet, falling flatly on the crib, which was full of its big broken fragments.

But Montresor and his wife had safely reached the door, were down the stairs, and by the sea-coal fire again in a very different mood from that in which they had left it; Montresor quieting the cries of the rudely awakened babies with caresses and murmurings that certainly simulated affection most excellently if they were not the real outgushing of a father's love, and by-and-by pacing the room with an agitated step, still keeping guard over them as they lay, one little head fallen on his either shoulder, thumb in mouth, and sound asleep again.

"Oh, Kitty!" he cried, softly then, giving them up to her and to their temporary bed on the lounge. "What a wretch I am! If they had been taken in that shocking way it would have been nothing but justice. I never knew I loved them so. I never knew how black and worthless the world would be without them! Without them and you!"

"That ceiling! That terrible ceiling!" moaned Kitty, living over the moment's fright again. "Oh, how good God has been to us!" And by this time the tiny rose-colored saque was a mere wreck.

"To us?" said Montresor. "To me! Had they but died I should have felt that I had murdered them. That I had killed my own children, Kitty. Talk of your special providences, child—this was a miracle!"

"A miracle, indeed," said Kitty, with a shiver. "Oh, Monty, how we always shall love Thanksgiving!"

"Thanksgiving? My whole life must be Thanksgiving! My dear ones spared to me—alive and safe—my own soul awakened. If I give my whole life up to praising God for it, can I give enough? Kitty, you can never have another such Thanksgiving; you must teach me how to say my prayers," he whispered, "and thank God for the greater miracle of the two—that I have found something to be thankful for!"

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IN October, 1867, a movement was made by M. Duruy, Minister of Public Instruction, to organize in the principal towns of France classes for the education of young women. Recently a report has been published showing the progress of the enterprise. Last year the work was commenced in forty different places. Professors in colleges lent their aid, and in Paris several members of the Institute assisted, and a number of ladies gave lessons in domestic economy, which met with great success. The mode of teaching is the same in all places; a lesson of an hour once a week is given on each of the subjects treated; namely, French grammar and composition; general literature, the history and geography of France, mathematics and astronomy, chemistry, physical science, and natural philosophy. The professors do not put any questions to the pupils, nor require them to prepare written exercises, although they advise them to do so; the young girls, however, take notes, which the teacher usually verifies to see that his instruction has been correctly understood. The average age of the pupils is from sixteen to eighteen. They usually pay a fee, though, if needful, they are admitted to classes gratis. The Empress has taken great interest in this enterprise, and has given medals as rewards to the most meritorious pupils.

According to statistics of the National Department of Education at Washington, there were in 1867 thirty-eight Normal Schools in the United States. Most of these have been established within the last ten years. In the high schools of Boston the aggregate salary paid to twenty-one male and thirteen female teachers for the year would give to each an average of about $1700. The whole sum paid to one hundred and fifty-six teachers of high schools, in eight of the principal cities of the United States, would give to each an average of over $1400.

A "romance in real life" occurred in Boharm, Scotland, a few weeks ago, such as we are accustomed to suppose only takes place in the pages of popular novels. A worthy minister, of three-score years and ten, was stricken with a disease which his medical attendant had told him must be fatal in a few days at most. The sick man had lived a bachelor, but, at this crisis, resolved to marry. A young lady about twenty years old, who was a teacher in the district, was sent for, and consented to the marriage. A justice of the peace was next procured, and the ceremony was performed in the presence of witnesses, the bridegroom sitting in his bed. What strange story may underlie this strange marriage is not revealed.

The anniversary meeting of the New York State Woman's Hospital, on the corner of Fifth Street and Fourth Avenue, was attended by a large concourse of distinguished and influential persons, who listened with much interest to addresses by Dr. Adams, Dr. Bellows, Mr. Beekman, and others. The principal orator of the occasion was Dr. J. Marion Sims, the founder of the institution, who made an eloquent speech. This is one of the noblest and worthiest charities of the city, and deserves a generous support. The institution originated many years ago. The present building, which has been occupied but a year, is only a wing of the proposed hospital; it is, however, a model of convenience and comfort, and augurs well for the future. According to the report of Dr. Thomas Addis Emmet, the distinguished Surgeon-in-Chief, 212 patients have been admitted during the year; of these 130 were discharged cured, or so far restored that there was no special need of further treatment. But six deaths have occurred in the time. Since the foundation of the institution 400 have been cured of a terrible injury, before deemed irre-mediable. Patients are received free of expense, or are furnished with private room and table at varying prices. The consulting physicians and surgeons are among the most experienced and successful medical men in our city. The resident physicians and surgeons are able and faithful. Thus there is in our midst a hospital where refined and educated women may receive such medical attention as they require.

The Herald a few days ago published the following list of public offices said to be held by Irish Roman Catholics in New York city:

Sheriff,
Register, Controller,
City Chamberlain, Corporation Counsel,
Police Commissioner,
President of the Croton Board,
Acting Mayor and President of the Board of Aldermen,
President of the Board of Councilmen,
Clerk of the Common Council,
Clerk of the Board of Councilmen,
President of the Board of Supervisors,
Five Justices of the Courts of Record,
All the Civil Justices,
All but two of the Police Justices,
All the police court Clerks,
Three out of four Coroners,
Two Members of Congress,
Three out of five State Senators,
Eighteen out of twenty-one Members of Assembly, Fourteen-nineteenth of the Common Council, and Eight-tenths of the Supervisors.

This vast political power is believed to be used in the interests of the Papal Church, securing for its institutions immense grants of valuable real estate from the city as well as large sums of money. The church thus in the first place controls the taxation of city property, and then the appropriation of the millions of revenue received from taxation. It wields the entire legislative power of the city, nine-elevenths of the city's representation in the State Assembly, and three-fifths of its influence in the Senate; it controls all our civil courts, all but two of our police courts, and three-fourths of our Coroners; and under its all-potent influence are our Acting Mayor, our Sheriff, our Register, our Controller, our City Chamberlain, the President and fourteen-nineteenth of our Board of Councilmen, and the President and eight-tenths of our Board of Supervisors. The Roman Catholics are said to control and manage the Democratic party.

We are promised at least two interesting courses of lectures this season. The scientific course which has already commenced under the auspices of the American Institute will undoubtedly unfold to the public, in a popular manner, many results of modern science. Some of the most distinguished scientific men in the United States appear on the list of lecturers, and the topics announced are such as Americans should know something about. Such lectures will have permanently good effects upon the people. The scientific lectures will occur about once a week, at Steinway Hall—the whole number being twelve. Another course of eight lectures, on literary and popular subjects, is announced to commence early in December, at Lyric Hall, on Sixth Avenue near Forty-second Street. Some of our most popular lecturers are engaged, and all who attend may expect to be profitably and delightfully entertained.

Some years ago a curious discovery was made by a gentleman of West Roxbury, Massachusetts, and from it a fanciful idea has been developed upon the apples and pears in his orchard. Having observed that an apple did not rot in that part of the fruit where a leaf happened to lie upon it, he cut out letters from newspapers, and when the apples were yet green, he pasted them upon them with gum-tragacanth. The apples would rot in all parts not covered by the pasted letters. When the fruit had reddened to perfection the letters were removed, and they would appear permanently outlined in green. So, again, when he pasted on the apples a paper in which the letters were cut out the parts covered by the paper would be green, and the letters would appear, distinctly turned in red, the green ground surrounding them. The experiment is a very pretty one; and the orchard in Roxbury exhibited this fall many familiar names and inscriptions, all produced in the skin of the fruit, without abrasion or any foreign impression.

Esparto grass, which is exported from Spain and Portugal into England, is extensively used as a material for making paper, instead of rags. The London Times is said to be printed on paper made from this substance.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

R.—We give our patterns with the view of obliging the greatest number of people, and can not make any promises about those asked for separately.

CHRISTIE.—Gore the front and side widths of your moiré, leaving the back widths full. Make the corsage and sleeves in the Maria Theresa style illustrated in Bazar No. 52. Cut your plaid skirt short and gored. Trim with bias bands of silk of the prevailing color of the plaid.

ISABELLE H.—Black ruffles bound with scarlet will trim your dress prettily. Velvet hoods will probably be worn in midwinter. Fanchon-shaped bordered with chinchilla or other fur.

GUSTIE.—Read reply to Christie.

TWO UNKNOWN FRIENDS.—The picture of which you speak has never been engraved or photographed.

W. LE D. C.—There is no better lotion for the complexion than this:

Bichloride of mercury..... 2 grains.
Muriate of ammonia..... 2 grains.
Emulsion of almonds..... 8 ounces.
Mix.

Recollect that this, though innocent when applied externally, would be poisonous if swallowed.

JOSIE H.—It is good-breeding to answer all invitations. The sooner you call the better. We know of no such work.

LACK LUSTRE.—Belladonna should never be used to "add brilliancy to the eyes;" it is a very powerful poison.

A SKATIST.—Gray cloth or flannel trimmed with scarlet is suitable for you. We will give full information on this subject in due time.

CREAM CITY GEL.—We know of no remedy for the case you mention.

RUBY.—A factitious value attaches to the amethyst because it is a fashionable stone. Specimens that could have been bought for a dollar twenty years ago have sold for $80 within a few years. It is again losing its popularity. You write a very good hand. You might live very nicely in a quiet village upon the sum you mention, though it would scarcely suffice in any city.

K. G.—You will be let off cheaply if "your future spouse pays all the expenses," and nothing is left for you but to "grumble." We would recommend you to insist upon doing something more to the purpose. We advise you to preserve your independence to the last moment of your maiden existence.—Add a pointed jockey frill to your basque, made of velvet pleated to the belt, or else wear a broad short sash of several loops. The ends are trimmed to match the cloak.

CARLOTTA AND OTHERS.—A good authority gives the following as the best way of preserving autumn leaves: "If they are slightly withered when you reach home put them in water overnight and they will become smooth. Wipe them carefully with a soft towel, and lay between sheets of porous paper, thin manilla or the common printer's sort is best; only have three or four layers between the leaves. Press these with a moderately hot iron for about three minutes, then arrange the leaves on card-board, fastening them with a solution of gum-tragacanth, which is not so apt to crack as gum-arabic, and when dry brush them with white moss varnish." Use but little starch or polish in washing your shades, else they will not be perfectly transparent. And let them be ironed with great care.

LOTTIE V.—We have nothing newer than the pattern you mention. Consult Bazar No. 50.

MATTIE G.—Read answer to Carlotta. The proper time to call upon strangers depends upon the probable length of their visit to your village.

BRIDEMAN.—Read the New York Fashions of this Number. The bridal fan, an inlaid work-table, an escriptoire, a cuckoo clock, statuettes, a valuable shawl are a few among the innumerable number of gifts for a bride—besides silver. Presents are frequently given to the groom. Of course, a carriage is sent for the bridemaids, though this should be done by the bride's family.

MARY AND HANNAH.—The most serviceable style for you will be a single skirt and pelisse, lined with flannel. Add a cape if you have sufficient material. Put your trimming on plainly as a border.

DAVID, PHILADELPHIA, writes: "You say, in answer to a correspondent, No. 56, p. 594, 'We can not now call to mind any passage from Scripture forbidding suicide.' Deut. v. 17: 'Thou shalt do no murder.' The above is a literal translation from the original Hebrew."

MAGGIE L.—For treatment of the hair see Bazar No. 56. For that of the hands see answer to M. W. For management of the offish wooer we would commend the trial of a little discreet indifference on your part.—Make a white merino chemise Russe trimmed with ruffles of crimson merino notched at the edges. Wear a panier or a tunic of blue or scarlet silk over your evening dress.—Hair flowing loosely is admired for very young ladies, especially if it is of a light color.

M. W.—An excellent wash for the mouth is the French preparation known as Eau de Biot. If this can not be obtained rinse the mouth in the morning, at night, and after each meal with a warm infusion of mint. Freckles are very difficult to remove, but the Lait Virginal, which is highly esteemed by the Parisian dames, may be worth a trial. It is thus composed:

Tincture of benzoin..... 1 drachm.
Rose-water..... 1 pint.
Mix.

The best means to "whiten red hands" is to wear a pair of cosmetic gloves thus prepared:

Fresh eggs..... 2
Oil of sweet almonds..... 2 tea-spoonfuls.
Rose-water..... 1 ounce.
Tincture of benzoin..... 36 grains.

First beat the eggs and oil together and then add the rose-water and tincture. A pair of kid gloves must then be turned, and, after being well daubed with the mixture, put on properly and worn during the night.—Plaid circulars are bias behind. The only seams are at the side where the necessary quantity is sewed on. Be careful to make the plaids fit at these seams. The shape is a perfect half circle. Black Astrakhan furs are worn both for colors and mourning, and regardless of the trimming of the cloak.

PANSY.—Muriatic acid would not be "safe to use," though it might be "effective" in removing the mustache, but it would probably take away the lip or a goodly portion of it at the same time. All depilatories are dangerous.

ECONOMY.—Cut your saque down to a tight-fitting basque. Leave the skirt its present length front and back. Cut off the side points and loop with a deep pleat. A bow or rosette on the side seam over the pleat. Make a cape short and bertha-shaped in front, sloping into a point behind like a hood. Trim with a silk ruche. Quilted garments are occasionally worn.

MRS. M.—Girls of fifteen wear the corsage buttoned in front, trimmed with berthas and bretelles. Short polka basques are also suitable. A merino dress, with puffed over-skirt and peasant waist of black silk, is a favorite style. There is not enough of your plaid to make a circular. Make a scarf burnous or a half-tight basque with hood or cape. Trim your serge with Hercules braid. Make two skirts and a baschlik.

MIRAIL.—Select poplin dresses of gay, solid color and of plaid, with over-skirt and bodice of black silk.

R. M. B.—Make your black poplin with a single skirt and Watteau paletot. Trim with a pleated ruche, the pleats all running one way, and fastened an inch from the edge, top and bottom. The ruche is ten inches wide on the skirt, four inches on the Watteau. Line and wad the over-garment, so that it may serve as a cloak with any dress.—Make the brown velours with two skirts and a short basque. Inch-wide binding of bias velvet of the same color for trimming. Four capes, the lowest reaching to the elbow, and getting gradually shorter to the collar, will give it a stylish look.—The straw-colored silk, trimmed with scarlet velvet, is a gay Spanish combination of colors that will be very becoming to your style. Border the skirt with a bias velvet or satin band, with two rows of piping above.—Black guipure lace will trim your purple silk.

MINNIE T.—Make a single skirt and Camargo to your Empress cloth. Trim with bias velvet and fringe. The skirt of your plaid poplin is just as it should be. The scallops are three inches wide and two deep, bound with black silk, corded with solid-colored merino. It will take about three yards of plush for your jacket. The only trimming is large white pearl buttons down the front and on the pocket-flaps.—To puff your hair, divide into small tresses, roll each up on your finger, and fasten with cap wire; then pin in place with hair-pins. Three strands rolled separately, and then rolled together, form a twisted coil. Long curled-hair tipples are what you need to mount your hair on.

J. M. R., MISSOURI.—We have no knowledge of the book you mention.

MRS. H. L. S., MENDON, MICHIGAN.—We take names from different post-offices in the same club. All additional names can have the paper at club rates.

CARRIE.—We furnish no other patterns than those in the Supplement of the Bazar. The illustrations will suggest styles which may be easily imitated by an ingenious person.

Under-Skirt with Satin Trimming.

THIS skirt is of black alpaca. The under part is covered fifteen inches deep with striped red and black satin. Face with alpaca, and sew a black worsted cord inside the lower edge. The skirt may be cut from the pattern given for the White Under-Skirt, Figs. 21-23, Supplement; but as the skirt is without any train, the back must be cut but little longer than the front.

Horse-Hair Bustle.

THIS bustle is of white horse-hair, and consists of five sloping pieces of stuff which are pleated and overlap each other. The under (larger) piece is twenty inches long and thirty inches wide, and each following piece four inches shorter, so that the upper one is only four inches long and sixteen inches wide. Each of these pieces of stuff is rounded on the under edge and hemmed and pleated on the upper edge, so that the hem stands out. The remaining edges are corded with a heavy cord. Having arranged the pieces in this manner, join them so that the heading of each pleated part shall stand out over and below the preceding one. Through the hem of the under (larger) piece run a cord, which serves for tying on the bustle, and by means of which it may also be drawn up into a closer shirr, thus rendering the panier thicker.

pasteboard, brown velvet, goose feathers (quills), pasteboard, white silk, a mirror, etc.

The mirror shows a new way of using a material which is at once cheap, simple, and effective. The simulated ivory wreath which so prettily borders the hand glass is made of goose-quills. The flowers and leaves are of the feathered part, and the stems and lattice-work on the handle of the smooth part of the quill. The foundation of the mirror is of heavy pasteboard, around the outside of which is arranged a wooden frame-work, which gives the foundation more firmness. Cover the upper side with velvet and the back with silk.

The glass is put in between the pasteboard and velvet, the edges of which are bordered with chenille. The flowers are sewed to the velvet before it is pasted on the frame. For making the flowers cut the feather part from a number of clarified and unclarified quills. (The quills are clarified by holding them a few seconds in flowers are made of the other quills and sewed on singly. The stems of the leaves and buds are made of the smooth upper part of the quill, which is split off in thin narrow pieces. For the cups and centres of the flowers stick on with mucilage some of the little curled bits shaved off. The lattice-work on the handle is made of the strips split from the smooth part, and is sewed on.

An illustration shows another style of ornamentation for a hand glass. This consists of flowers and leaves, which are crocheted of coarse white crochet cotton and coated with brown copal varnish, by which means it presents the appearance of wood carving. Excepting the large pointed leaves all the work is crocheted in the following manner: Make a foundation of seven chain, and crochet a short treble in the third and a treble in the second of these seven chain. These stitches are, however, not completed separately, but after the treble work off together all three of the loops on the needle. According to the size of the single flowers and leaves work treble and long treble stitches, or join two such leaflets for one leaf by means of slip stitches. The illustration shows the number of leaflets in each leaf. Crochet each circle together. Of the five small leaflets which form a twig each consists of only one such leaf-figure. At the point, which is formed by the last two loops, take the needle out the stitch and draw the thread through on the back of the stitch. From here work a few chain for the stem, and at a little distance the next leaf, etc. For the larger leaves make, now, a chain stitch foundation of the requisite length, and crochet on both sides of this slip stitches, double and short treble crochet, corresponding to the form of the mirror. The completed parts are covered with several coats of the varnish till they are dark and stiff enough. When dry sew them on the frame, which may either be covered as shown by the illustration or with brown oil-cloth.

Crocheted Tassel.

THIS tassel is easily made, and may be used in many ways; for instance, for trimming hoods, veils, etc. It is crocheted in chain stitch with fine silk twist. The strands are wound with silk twist in the manner shown by the illustration.

Trimnings for Under-Skirts.

THESE trimmings are made partly of bias strips of the same material as the skirt, and partly of bias strips of bright-colored silk or velvet.

Fig. 1.—This trimming consists of two pleated strips and two clusters of bias folds, all of the material of the skirt. The pleated strips are each four inches wide, and are hemmed on the under edge. The pleats are narrow, and all run the same way.

Above each of these arrange the bias folds, the lower one of each cluster of which serves to hide the seam where the pleated strip is set on.

Split the quills, and soften them in warm water, and while soft cut and bend them into the forms shown in the section given in the engraving. Arrange the single leaves in the manner shown by the illustration. For the large flowers sew the feathers with waxed silk to a pasteboard foundation of suitable form. For the roses take the feather part of the unclarified quills; leaves, buds, and the little terial as the skirt an inch and a quarter wide, which is set underneath. Under this lay a strip of silk like the binding, and sew the scallops down on it. Next cut a strip of the same material as the under-skirt two inches and a half wide and the length of the width of the skirt, cut one side of this in scallops the same size of those on the bottom of the under-skirt, and trim with binding and fluting. Sew this on the under edge of the silk part in the manner shown by the illustration. The facing of the under-skirt must be wider than the trimming and must reach above it.

Fig. 3.—This trimming consists of a flounce three inches wide, the under edge of which is bound with colored silk. Above this flounce arrange a piece of the material of the skirt an inch and three-fourths wide which has been scalloped and bound, also with colored silk, on one side. Above this scalloped piece set bias folds of the same material as the skirt edged with silk piping.

introduced in both, as bordering or ornaments. A glance at the views entertained on these points, by acknowledged authorities on decorative art, may prove useful.

Sir John Robertson, of Edinburgh, in describing a drawing-room which he caused to be decorated with especial reference to what is deemed the proper harmony of coloring in the principal parts, says: "There were only three decided colors throughout, viz.: white, crimson, and green. The ceiling, cornices, wood-work, and canopies of the window-hangings, the ground of the walls, and that of the carpet, crimson, while the pattern on the carpet was a sort of tracery of creeping plants in green. The chimney-piece was of white marble, reaching nearly to the ceiling, with a panel, equal in width to the opening of the chimney, filled with a mirror or looking-glass. The walls of the room were painted in imitation of morocco leather, enriched with roses

ART IN COMMON THINGS.

ROOM DECORATIONS AND APPOINTMENTS.

HARMONY of color and appropriateness of form in the furnishing and decoration of our dwellings are essentials so frequently overlooked that a few hints for general adoption may not be unacceptable. To select what may appear eye-pleasing, without due reference to the relations which ought to exist between the several parts of a room, seems to be the common practice, and so long as this is continued the result can hardly be otherwise than unsatisfactory.

It is only by proper attention to fixed principles—principles by which an artist is guided in painting a picture, that a consistent and harmonious combination of colors can be effected.

in gilding, shaded by hand, and the whole varnished with copal. The wood-work was dead white, bordered with gilt mouldings. The window-curtains were of a very simple form, being merely large curtains without draperies or fringes, and they hung in vertical lines so as to catch no dust. They ran on gilt wooden poles, and inside the cornice was a common French curtain-rod, on which ran a very fine but plain muslin sun-curtain, edged with crimson cherry fringe. The cords for drawing the curtains, instead of being concealed, were made conspicuous, and contributed much to the general effect; they were about the thickness of half an inch, of plaited worsted cord, with handsome termination." In speaking of the general colors adopted throughout, he observes: "The whole of the crimson is, as near as practicable with the different

Taking a room as a whole, and considering its effect as a picture, the colors of the carpet and of the walls form the chief masses in the composition, and necessarily influence every other component part. If the floor and the walls be of the same color, there will be a deficiency of force and of effect from want of contrast; and, on the other hand, if of different colors, equally attractive to the eye, the effect produced would not be that of the whole, because a whole is the result of the co-operation of different subordinate parts with one principal part. While, therefore, they should not be of the same color, they should be of colors that harmonize, or, in other words, look well together. For example, a very brilliant color, such as crimson, in a carpet, may have a drab or other subdued color in the curtains and paper; but, then, there should be a portion of the brilliant color materials, of the same hue, the lake for the walls having been first procured, and the silk and worsted dyed to match it. From this circumstance, and from its being contrasted by the green, and relieved by the white and gold, it has no more of a predominant hue in the arrangement than is perfectly agreeable, while it gives great distinctiveness in the pictures, and a general air of warmth and comfort, without appearing glaring and gaudy."

D. R. Hay, in his "Treatise on Harmonious Coloring," insists on the point that the coloring of rooms should be an echo to their uses. The color of a library ought to be comparatively severe; that of a dining-room grave; and that of a parlor or drawing-room gay; while light colors are more suitable for bedrooms. Apartments lighted from the south and west, particularly in a summer residence, should be of a cool color; while, on the contrary, those lighted from the north and east should approach a warm tone. He adds: "When the tone of a room is fixed by the choice of the furniture, it is the business of the painter to introduce such tints for the ceilings, walls, etc., as will unite the whole in perfect harmony." Here, however, is the difficulty. The colors of the furniture may be arranged by a general knowledge of the laws of harmony, but the painter's part can only be done by the choicest attention to all the minutiae of the art.

Pugin, in treating of the relations which interior fittings bear or ought to bear to each other, visits with some severity the usual mode of hanging window-curtains. He says: "The materials of these curtains may be rich or plain; they may be heavily or lightly fringed; they may be embroidered with heraldic charges or not, according to the locality where they are to be hung; but their real use must be strictly maintained. Hence all the modern plans of suspending enormous folds of stuff over poles, as if for the purpose of sale or of being dried, is quite contrary to the use and intention of curtains, and abominable in taste; and the only object that these endless festoons and bunched tassels can answer is to swell the bills and profits of the upholsterers. It is not less ridiculous to see canopies of tomb and altar screens set up over windows instead of the appropriate valance or baldaquin of the olden time." He goes on to say that the origin and proper application of fringes seems to be but little understood. Fringe was originally nothing more than the ragged edge of the stuff tied into bunches to prevent its unraveling further. This suggested the idea of manufacturing fringe as an ornamental edging, but good taste requires that it be designed and applied correctly. In the first place, fringe should never consist of heavy parts, but simply of threads tied into ornamental patterns; secondly, a deep fringe should not be suspended to a narrow valance; thirdly, no valance should be formed entirely of fringe, as fringe can only be supplied as an ornamental edging; and, fourthly, fringe should not be sewed upon the stuff, but always on the edges. It is allowable at the very top, as it may be supposed to be the upper edge turned over.

In room decorations and window draperies, as in most other things, there is abundant scope for uniting mechanical skill with elegant or fine art, and as the progress of civilization has constantly a tendency to make articles of convenience become objects of luxury, it is important to make the connection between mechanical ingenuity and the higher branches of art more intimate, so as to elevate productive industry to a point far above the standard of mere utility.

TO LIZZIE ON HER WEDDING-DAY.

[WITH AN ICE-PITCHER.]

If I were John Jacob Astor,
And my wife were Myra Gaines,
How easier far and faster
We'd cease to rack our brains,
And seek no mortal suggestion
From aught save Love and Pride,
In reply to the solemn question
"What shall we send the Bride?"

If our purse like our hearts were able
Our cards should lie in sight
On a coral-footed table
Whose top was Malachite;
With mosaic of pearls to inlay it
Like foam on a still green sea,
And a salver should down-weigh it
Of Lapis Lazuli.

No royal lip hath hankered
For a draught from the jeweled rim
Of such an amazing tankard
As on that salver should brim
With punch of Lachryma Christi
And Metternich's oldest crop,
Corked in centuries misty—
Uncorked at a guinea a drop.

And then—lest the potent aroma
To the ladies' heads should fly,
Tea, coffee, and theobroma Should bubble convenient by—Clear, sedative, and corrective,
By spirit-flame each kept hot,
As it stood down the lordly perspective
In its proper golden pot.

In Majolica cups and Sèvres—
In rainbow-glass of Bohème,
These drinks of Olympian flavor
Should catch a diviner flame—
And honey from thymy caskets
Should mix with tropical spice
In jeweled bonbon baskets
Of filigreed rare device.

Alas, how influential
Is that petty conjunction "If, I!"
Alas, for that mood potential,
Of all the moods most stiff!
So then, till your diamond wedding,
And our ships come in to land—
For that gorgeous table-spreading
This pitcher begs leave to stand.

When the Honey-moon's joy supernal
Shall stretch into hot July,
May it yield a freshness internal
To both whom the knot shall tie;
Sent from our hearts' warm fullness,
Though ice must be its doom,
We're sure 'twill cause no coolness
Betwixt the bride and groom!

FITZ HUGH LUDLOW.

OUTGENERALED.

MRS. ASHBERRY was pressing open a seam of dark blue cloth with a great iron goose, on a little press-board brown and scorched with use. She worked like a woman who had the universe to provide for and only one day to do it in—one waning autumnal day. A little girl, hardly old enough to talk, sat in a corner of the room building corn-cob castles; and a blue-eyed baby grunted and nestled in a painted wooden cradle. As Mrs. Ashberry crossed the wide kitchen to put the heavy iron before the open fire again she touched the cradle-rocker with her foot in passing it; and thereupon the uneasy sounds changed to a glad, crowing laugh, for this baby had so few attentions from his busy mother he was prepared to appreciate the least. Then he sucked his thumb good-naturedly till he went off to sleep.

The baby was still asleep, Mrs. Ashberry had half made the little jacket, and the girl in the corner had built a house, a barn, a cattle-pen, a church, a flower-garden, and was busily building a Virginia fence around two chairs and the cradle, when a smart double knock came upon the outer door.

Little Julia looked up eagerly, with a corn-cob in each hand, and Mrs. Ashberry dropped her work and walked across the room, with her shoes creaking an honest welcome at every step.

"Oh, Mrs. Samuels! I want to know if it is you! How do you do this afternoon? Walk right in and take this rocking-chair up by the fire," said she, heartily.

Mrs. Samuels was a little wiry old woman, who looked as though she was made of birch bark and Indian meal. She wore a black woolen gown, and carried her knitting in a bag made of pumpkin seeds strung on a thread. As she had come visiting she wore over her shoulders a small crape shawl which had evidently seen better days, and a great many of them; and on her head a wide-bordered, high-crowned cap tied with purple ribbons; but the poor soul would have felt a deal more comfortable in her woolen blanket and quilted hood.

"Your folks are well, ain't they?" said she, settling herself into the chair and unrolling her work to make herself as much at home as possible, for among that primitive people one would as soon think of sitting without hands as without work.

"Yes, as well as usual, thank you. You know Mr. Ashberry hasn't ever very strong health," replied Mrs. Ashberry, with an air of apology. "But he is rugged for him. And how does the world go with you?" she continued, glancing at the clock, and then at once lifting the heavy iron tea-kettle, as though it had been a pan of feathers, upon the crane over the fire.

"Mrs. Ashberry, I have my troubles, and I suppose we all have our troubles," returned Mrs. Samuels. "I don't know as I have a call to complain of my lot—I don't know as I have—and no more I wouldn't if I was right well and tough; but what with my throat-ail and my cancer-humor I don't feel none too well any of the time. But, after all, I tell them while Amenta and I have a place we can call home we won't say a word. We are rather cluttered, to be sure; only one room, with the bed and cook-stove and all right there; but Mrs. MacKimmie gives us a privilege in her kitchen washing-days, and if we have any gre't work on hand; and then Amenta is gone a good deal."

Mrs. Samuels was like a music-box; when once wound up she went until she ran down; and she kept on without break or pause while Mrs. Ashberry, putting the goose and press-board aside, mixed biscuits that were as big and sweet as oranges, and fried dough-nuts as puffed-out as the ambitious frog.

"Amenta is up to Squire Sprinkle's helping the folks fix off Ariadne," said the music-box, starting off on a fresh tune, with a little click; "and as Mrs. MacKimmie is expecting her brother's wife and children to stay with her for a spell, till her brother concludes on a place, I told them I would take this time to do up my fall visiting, for it will come real handy to them to have the use of my room. Well, they couldn't get along any way comfortable without it, and I am willing to do 'most any way to accommodate, for Mrs. MacKimmie has been very kind to us, and generous too, in her way. You know she isn't of a real generous make. Why, she isn't niggling, but she is prudent."

Meanwhile Mrs. Ashberry drew out the great round table and spread over it a smooth white cloth, which was only last year blue flax-flowers down by the pond. Then she speckled it over with plates of cheese and pickles and butter and stewed cranberries; with honey and dried meat and pitchers of cream and milk; with brown raisin-cake, pumpkin pie, and baked apples; no-wise disheartened at this suggestion of an unlimited visitation. For in that rural, scattered neighborhood, in those legendary days, a guest had never been thought of as any thing but a delight and a privilege.

Presently, before supper was ready, the door-latch rattled as though somebody too short for the situation was trying it; then the door flew open with a bounce, and showed upon the threshold a pair of cheeks red enough to make the fortune of a whole garden of roses, two round gray eyes, and a tangle of light brown curls that seemed to bring a good deal of sunshine into the room with them. This vision, which was dressed in red flannel, stopped in pleased surprise and gazed at the unusual apparition of a visitor. But she was directly brought to herself by Mrs. Ashberry's voice, crying out, "Why, Clara Ashberry! where have you been, and what have you been doing, I want to know?"

At this reception Clara hung her head in ready childish shame, though she had come home with a great deal of pride and satisfaction from her afternoon's work.

"Come here, child, and let me look at you. I should think as much! What have you been into? Why, your dress is full of beggar-lice!" exclaimed the mother. "What in the name of reason possessed you? I would make you pick them every one out yourself if I thought you could do it."

The tangled brown curls drooped lower yet—it was such a downfall to be met in this way, and before "company" too! while the mother, pulling the child to the sunken brick hearth, picked away with quick, impatient fingers at the clinging burs.

That afternoon, when dinner was first over, Clara had been sitting upon the door-stone trying to feed her kittens with catnip, when her brother Philip came whistling out of the house.

"Oh, cats! I am going to kill them!" said he, stopping short.

Clara looked up with a pang of terror, infinitely more alarmed than if he had spoken of killing her, because in that case it was possible he might be joking; but if he said he would kill her kittens, it was certain he would do it. So without a word she gathered up the four precious little lives in her long pinafore and ran as fast as her small speckled stockings and heavy leather shoes could go across the orchard, over the brook, and up the hill beyond. There she sat down among the fragrant life-everlasting and shining laurel leaves, holding fast the mewing, squirming burden that, wholly unconscious of their great peril, had excusable objections to being squeezed to death.

Poor little Clara! Desperately afraid for herself to stay such an immense distance from home—although William Tell might have hit an apple on the tree that overhung the back porch—yet she had more deadly fear for the kittens; so she staid full of terror and courage until she had seen Philip go whistling off to school, thus insuring their lives for another half day. About the same time the mother-cat came stepping through the dead grass, smelling and calling until she found her family; and then the mother and the little ones, stretching themselves together on the sunny hill-side, went to sleep; and Clara, emboldened by the company of the old cat, went about to amuse herself. And this was when, running here and there for white and purple asters, and sunshine consolidated into spikes of golden-rod, she ran waist-high into a thicket of bur seed, struggling through it for a solitary monkey-flower which grew farther up the hill-side. Then she happened to look down at her red frock, spotted over with the brown, sharp-fingered seeds; and back she ran to catch some more. Back and forth, back and forth, till there was not a thread of her flannel gown but was pinned by a ready, persistent seed, and Clara laughed with delight.

"I look just so like the clove-apple upon the chimney-piece in the front-room," she cried, forgetting the kittens for the time and running merrily home to be admired. So one can fancy the unexpected chill of her reception.

But after the burs were fairly picked off, one by one, with a few motherly twitches and words of reproof, they were quickly forgotten; for then presently came the cheerful excitement and bustle of making ready the best bed, which stood, according to another custom of the time and place, in the parlor; and was furnished with the softest pillows, the warmest blankets, and the gayest coverlet in the whole house. And so before nine of the clock all—father, mother, children, and guest—were asleep, and there was no sound in the low red farm-house excepting the heavy ticking of the tall wooden clock, the chirping of a cricket in the hearth, and a mouse gnawing behind the wainscot.

But long enough before any cock in town had dreamed of day-dawn (excepting old-lady Tillman's, that perched on a pear-tree at the end of the house and always crowed at intervals all night long) the farm-house was astir again. Great slices of fresh pork were frying in the long-handled spider over the coals, potatoes were boiling themselves out of their skins in a kettle over the fire, and golden corn-cakes were baking in the shining tin oven on the hearth before the blaze that burst and flamed up the wide chimney as though glad to be about its day's work.

There was not the faintest flush of daylight over the eastern sky when Mrs. Samuels appeared with her knitting in her hand and the music-box wound up and going; but the room was bright with the glare of a great fat pine-knot that stood in one corner of the wide chimney, and cheerful with half a dozen children who would have thought the world had come to an end if the sun should catch them in bed.

"La sakes! So you are all up as bright as buttons!" chirruped the music-box, who felt herself so much at home she had gone comfortably into her blanket and hood. "And you don't say you have killed a ready! Before Thanksgiving! Why, do tell me, Mrs. Ashberry, how you expect to keep your meat? Though, sure enough, your well is deep and cool, and meat will keep down there a good long spell. But then I am not in the habit of seeing folks make up their sausages and smoke their hams before Thanksgiving time; it hasn't been customary about here, unless with you; you always do get your work all out of the way before the rest begin, I know. However, it does seem early. Why there is Mrs. MacKimmie in the greatest suz for some meat to have while her brother's folks are there; but Mr. MacKimmie said it was no use talking at this time of the year about fresh meat. Now I wonder if you wouldn't be willing to lend out a piece to her and take your pay when they kill, along after New-Year's, say? It would come dreadful handy to her, and be a great accommodation, I know, by what I've heard her talk."

Mrs. Samuels was as capable at eating as at talking, and fresh pork being an unseasonable luxury, possibly she overexerted herself. At any rate, before night she fell sick.

"I won't say it is any thing I have e't, and I won't say it isn't; but, however, I aim to be well in the morning, and I won't try any supper, unless it may be a dish of porridge and a cup of tea; and I'll make off to bed early," said she, hopefully.

But morning found her no better, nor the next day, nor the next, nor the next; and so at last her daughter Amenta came to nurse her.

"I didn't meant to stay only a week or so, and then I laid out to make the heft of my visit at Deacon Barkruff's this time. It makes it real hard for you, Mrs. Ashberry, but here I be," said the music-box, which was fast running down.

"I am very glad, if she must be sick, she was taken here instead of over at the Deacon's. Mrs. Barkruff always has her cup full, and a leaf besides, and that would be no place for Mrs. Samuels. I am very thankful she hadn't got away from here," said Mrs. Ashberry, as undisturbed as though she were altogether a lady of leisure, who had not the spinning and weaving and making of the family pants and pinafores depending upon her, as well as the preparing of their daily bread.

Mrs. Samuels lingered several weeks, but even Doctor Sackrider's prescriptions had no power to bring back the ebbing life.

"Gra'ma Samuels is awful sick; she speets to die," said Clara, gravely, to her little sister Julia, who looked up in wonder, having no more idea of death than a snail has of flying.

"Ma hate to have her die, because ma's awful much acquainted with her. She know her awful many years—much as three going on five," continued Clara, who had heard the Doctor talking to her mother as he rolled some pills and folded a paper of powders at the kitchen-table. Then she considered a moment with an anxious little face.

"I could make some pills just like Doctor Sackrider do 'em, and if gra'ma has a whole great big bunch p'aps she will get cured well," said she, thoughtfully.

Then off she trotted into the store-room, and rolling up half a dozen little balls of brown bread in her fat hands, smelt of them, looking wise as King Solomon.

"Them's jus good as the Doctor's, and betterer too; they are bigger. Now I'll fix the powders," she said, with satisfaction, climbing up on the edge of the meal-chest.

Presently she presented herself in the sick-room with six bread pills in one paper and a mixture of meal and rye flour in another paper, which she had measured and sorted till it looked to her eye in color and quantity like the Doctor's powders.

"Here comes my Rosy-posy!" said the sick woman, turning her head feebly toward the bright little face as she stole in.

"I ain't a rosy. I ain't any flower at all. I'm a dirl," replied the child.

"Oh, you looked so sweet and pretty, I thought maybe you were something more than just a girl like Esther Green," said Mrs. Samuels, smiling a little.

"Well," replied Clara, quickly, "if I'm noffin' I'm a bird, if I'm noffin'." Then she turned about to Miss Amenta, a dark, good-natured woman, who wore glasses, because, as Clara said, her eyes weren't plain, and who never said any thing but "Sure enough" and "I never." "I brought some me'cine for gra'ma. I made it," said she, in a flush of glad generosity.

"I never!" replied Miss Amenta.

"Will you give it to gra'ma?" persisted Clara.

"Sure enough," replied Miss Amenta.

Clara went away satisfied, and every day while the poor old body lived she brought a fresh supply of pills and powders. But that was not long. Only, as Clara said, "two more days and two more else days," and then Mrs. Samuels went away; not in the way she came, petty and inconsequential, but in the sublime silence of death.

After the funeral, when every thing was moved for a thorough cleansing and putting to rights, Clara found behind a bureau in the sick-room all her little store of pills and powders still untouched and folded in the papers. In an instant her heart was full of childish indignation.

"Miss Amenta said 'Sure enough,' and she telled a lie; she telled me a lie!" thought the child, who in her simplicity had never suspected before that any one but children did that. "Now I don't care if gra'ma did die. If she'd a-taken that me'cine she might 'a got well, and I don't care she died. I don't care a speck. I'm glad," said she to Julia.

"Dag," assented Julia, who had no more comprehension of what Clara was saying than she had of the march of the stars in their courses.

Clara after this never forgot that men and women sometimes told wrong stories as well as children; but in time she learned that deceiving is not always lying, and there came a day when she put her knowledge in practice.

Years and years after Mrs. Samuels was gathered to her mothers—after the cranberries in the marsh by the pond had ripened so many times that the elm-tree before the little red farm-house had turned from a parasol to an umbrella—Clara, grown to a beautiful woman, went to live on a lovely island a great many leagues away. She was the wife of General Wickware, and the mistress of a handsome stone house, which stood, with its balconies and porticoes, in the midst of a terraced and trellised garden sloping to the river and rich in sweet shrubs and flowers.

On one sunny October day, when the air was full of the fragrance of grapes and peaches, Mrs. Wickware stood by the window of an upper bedroom with a spoon in her hand. She was curly-haired, bright-eyed, and ready of resource as ever, for all the gulf which lay so wide and deep between the rich, elegant lady and the shy country child in home-made gowns and pegged shoes.

"I don't believe you had better take any more of the sleeping-pills, Waldo," said she, turning toward the embroidered pillow where General Wickware lay, pale and petulant from a departing fever. "You ought not to depend on them longer than it is absolutely necessary, and suppose you try to sleep this evening without one."

The General grew restless.

"Clara, I shouldn't close my eyes all day or all night, and I can't see why you are so unwilling I should get some rest. If you realized how nervous I am, and how quickly those pills quiet and put me to sleep, I think you wouldn't feel so," said he, in a tone of injured forbearance.

"Just as you say, of course, Waldo," replied his wife, remembering old Grama Samuels as she came with the spoon and a goblet of iced lemonade.

A week later a similar conversation was repeated in the invalid's chamber, but with a different ending.

General Wickware had made the same protesting plaint in the same tone, reproachful yet forgiving. "I don't see why you should grudge me this little comfort," said he.

"Well, I would not," replied his wife, "only the brown bread is all sour to-day."

"What!" said the General, getting up upon his elbow.

"Yes," answered his wife, calmly. "The Doctor said you oughtn't to get in the habit of depending on narcotics for your rest, so I made the sleeping-pills of brown bread. They seemed to have every effect, and I thought them safer."

If General Wickware had not considered his wife and all her ways wonderful pieces of perfectness he might have been offended; but as it was he forgave her, and went to sleep.

PROFESSIONAL EDUCATION OF WOMEN.

THE last Report of the Trustees of the Cooper Union represent that 1098 young ladies were in regular attendance in the Female Art School in Cooper Institute during the last term, and that the next term will begin with 632 pupils. At the Sixteenth Annual Commencement of the Women's Medical Convention of Pennsylvania—the first in the world chartered for the instruction of women in medicine—ten ladies received the degree of Doctor of Medicine. The University of Zurich has lately conferred the same degree on one lady, and two others are attending lectures there. An American lady, a graduate of the Pennsylvania College, was last year admitted to attend the lectures at l'Ecole Pratique, Paris, and also to all the Paris hospitals. We learn also, through the London Lancet, that the question of choosing a woman to fill a chair in the obstetric section of the Academy of Medicine of Paris is being considered, and that the chief midwife of the Maternité Hospital will probably be so elected. Madame Alliot, the present incumbent of this office, is a woman of profound knowledge and vast experience, a worthy successor of Boivin and La Chapelle, and an honored co-worker with the most enlightened obstetricians of Paris. In England, though the doors of Apothecaries' Hall are closed to lady students, we are informed, upon reliable authority, that Miss Garret, the first graduate of an English school, is doing honor to herself and her profession by the quiet but convincing manner in which she is pursuing her vocation. Her ministrations are sought by noble and intelligent women, while some of the foremost of the honorable profession of London accede, with pleasure, to her calls for counsel.

These are certainly encouraging facts in regard to the important matter of professionally educating women. France, too, has done much in this way, as will be seen from the following account of the "Lay-School for the Technical Instruction of Girls" in the Rue Turenne, Paris:

In May, 1862, a few ladies, animated by the generous aim of affording to girls without fortune the aid of a special or technical education, founded, under the presidency of Madame Lemonnier, the "Society for the Professional Instruction of Women." In October of the same year a school was opened with fifteen pupils. In 1864 it numbered 160, and organized a branch institution at No. 70 Rue Rochechouart. The two schools numbered this year 390 pupils. They received a high encomium from the Minister of Public Education in his official Report of 1867. He declared it most desirable that similar lay-schools should be instituted for females in all the large towns of France.

The age fixed for entrance is 12 years or upward. The fees paid are 12 francs per month; but 12 pupils in the hundred are admitted gratuitously at the cost of the Society, and several others by the aid of a special purse contributed by friends and by former pupils, who form also a society of alumni, auxiliary to the mother institute, called "The Society of Mutual Patronage." They are active in procuring eligible situations for their younger sister graduates; they have contributed and administer a small library and hold meetings monthly at the school, Rue Turenne. These patronesses are all as yet less than 20 years of age. Three of them are actually chief clerks in first-class firms. Several others are cashiers in divers houses of commerce. In other departments we may call attention to the wood-cut illustrations of Buffon's Natural History and of Sir Walter Scott's novels, a recent edition of which attests the skill and taste of the pupils of this female institute. Its paintings on porcelain were admitted in 1867 to the Exposition Universelle. Private orders for ladies' dresses are filled in one of the pupils' work-rooms, but on this condition, that the pupils shall never be hurried, and that no work shall be allowed to leave the school that is not perfect of its kind. Certain hours only are allotted to each kind of work, and no consideration of profit interferes with the regular discipline of studies and exercises. Each of the work-rooms adds something every month to the funds of the Institute, and it is becoming less and less dependent on any contributions from outside. The work of pupils in painting porcelain begins to be profitable in one year, and that of the wood-engravers in a little longer time. All the pupils give an hour daily to practical lessons in taking measure, cutting out and making dresses. Ladies call at the work-room to try them on. There is special instruction in all that relates to the working up of linen goods. The course of studies occupies four years. Three hours in the forenoon are devoted to preliminary and general instruction, comprising calligraphy, linear and ornamental drawing, grammar, exercises in style, and the elements of literature; arithmetic and elementary geometry; history, ancient and modern; geography, general, commercial, and industrial; the rudiments of natural history, physics, and chemistry applied to the useful arts; hygiene and vocal music by the method Paris-Chevé. A still more elementary course is given to outside pupils. The afternoons are devoted to the specialties which form the proper object of the Institution. The commercial course comprehends the study of modern languages and book-keeping, with the forms of exchange and commercial law. The stationery of the school is intrusted to them, so that they make real purchases by wholesale, then retail to their fellow-pupils, and keep accounts of this business, representing a capital of some $400 annually.

Liberal salaries are accorded to the professors in these schools, and no pains spared to engage the best talent. Ladies are preferred, but not exclusively, for the present professor of wood-engraving is a gentleman. A course of pharmacy is being now arranged.

The council of administration is composed of twenty ladies. This council meets every fortnight in each school, and has three committees, one of which superintends the general studies, one the special courses, and the third attends to placing the graduates when they leave the school.

These schools are not only models of feminine instruction, but also of religious toleration, and inaugurate a peaceful revolution in France by creating a standard of education so much higher as well as more practical than that of the convent schools and others controlled by the Church.

American ideas prevail here. Half the pupils are Catholic, half are Protestant or Israelite. No priest, minister, or rabbin is admitted to give lessons in doctrine, but there is a three years' course of instruction in the principles of ethics and morality. During the first year the proofs of the existence of Deity and his divers attributes are taught. In the second is sketched the religious development of humanity from the original form of fetishism to the highest conception of monotheism, and the immortality of the soul. The third year embraces all our knowledge of duty—first, the duties common to all human beings, then those which more specially concern woman in her three-fold estate of daughter, wife, and mother. To this instruction, so imparted as to leave a durable impression in the mind of pupils, are added lessons in domestic economy and of civil legislation, concerning the rights and interests of woman in the social sphere. For the rest, the largest toleration obtains. The girls are taught to respect all religious convictions in their mutual intercourse. They attend such places of worship as their parents designate, and there is a special kitchen for the Israelites, conformably to their usages. Thanks to the influence of their intelligent directress, they all apply without an effort, and as the simplest thing in the world, the precept of the liberty of conscience; and so in these young minds is gradually formed the precious habit of setting humanity above doctrines and above the dissensions which they engender. One day, when education in France shall have become both laical and national, it may be recollected that the first sign of a revolution so desirable was given by a school of poor young girls which generous women had spontaneously established.

The diffusion of practical knowledge, labor in liberty, and life rendered easy by its just remuneration, can alone rescue modern civilization from the evils which overwhelm it. What it is above all important to realize, is such an education for woman as shall assure her honorable subsistence by honorable works, and this not only for her own good, but for that of man who feels her influence at every age.

MÉSALLIANCES.

LOVE-MARRIAGES, made against the will of the parents before the character is formed, and while the obligations of society are still unrealized, are generally mésalliances founded on passion and fancy only. A man or woman of mature age, who knows what he or she wants, may make a mésalliance, but it is made with a full understanding and deliberate choice; and, if the thing turns out badly, they can blame themselves less for precipitancy than for wrong calculation. The man of fifty who marries his cook knows what he most values in women. It is not manners, and it is not accomplishments; perhaps it is usefulness, perhaps good-temper; at all events, it is something that the cook has and that the ladies of his acquaintance have not, and he is content to take the disadvantages of his choice with its advantages. But the boy who runs away with his mother's maid neither calculates nor sees any disadvantages. He marries a pretty girl because her beauty has touched his senses, or he is got hold of by an artful woman who has bamboozled and seduced him. It is only when his passion has worn off that he wakes to the full consequences of his mistake, and understands then how right his parents were when they cashiered his pretty Jane as soon as they became aware of what was going on, and sent that artful Sarah to the right about—just a week too late. It is the same with girls, but in a far greater extent. If a youth's mésalliance is a millstone round his neck for life, a girl's is simply destruction. The natural instinct with all women is to marry above themselves; and we know on what physiological basis this instinct stands, and what useful social ends it serves. And the natural instinct is as true in its social as in its physiological expression. A woman's honor is in her husband; her status, her social life, are determined by his; and even the few women who, having made a bad marriage, have nerve and character enough to set themselves free from the personal association, are never able to thoroughly regain their maiden place. There is always something about them that clogs and fetters them, always a kind of aura of a doubtful and depressing kind that surrounds and influences them. If they have not strength to free themselves they never cease to feel the mistake they have made, until the old sad process of degeneration is accomplished, and the "grossness of his nature" has had strength to drag her down. After a time, if her ladyhood has been of a superficial kind only, a woman who has married beneath herself may ease down into her groove, and be like the man she has married; if, however, she has sufficient force to resist outside influences she will not sink, but she will never cease to suffer. She has sinned against herself, her class, and her natural instincts; and so has done substantially a worse thing than has the boy who married his mother's maid. Society understands this, and, not unjustly, if harshly, punishes the one while it lets the other go scot-free; so that the woman who makes a mésalliance suffers on every side, and destroys her life almost as much as the woman who goes wrong. All this is as evident to parents and elders as that the sun shines. They understand the imperative needs of social life, and they know how fleeting the passions of youth are, and how they fade by time and use and inharmonious conditions; and they feel that their first duty to their children is to prevent a mésalliance which has nothing, and can have nothing, but passion for its basis. But novelists and poets are against the hard, dull dictates of worldly wisdom, and join in the apotheosis of love at any cost—all for love and the world well lost; love in a cottage, with nightingales and honey-suckles as the chief means of paying the rent; Libussa and her plowman; the princess and the swine-herd, etc. And the fathers who stand out against the ruin of their girls by means of estimable men of inferior condition and with not enough to live on, are stony-hearted and cruel; while the daughters who take to cold poison in the back-garden, if they can not compass a secret honey-moon or an open flight, have all the sympathy and none of the censure. The cruel parent is the favorite whipping-boy of poetry and fiction; and yet, which is likely to be the better guide—reason or passion? experience or ignorance? calculation or impulse? the maturity which can judge, or the youth which can only feel? There would be no hesitation in any other case than that of love, but the love instinct is generally considered to be superior to every other consideration, and to be obeyed as a divine voice, no matter at what cost or consequence.

The ideal of life, according to some, is founded on early marriages. But men are slower in the final setting of their character than women, and one never knows how a young fellow of twenty or so will turn out. If he is devout now, he may be an infidel at forty; if, under home influences, he is temperate and pure, when these are withdrawn he may become a rake of the fastest kind. His temper, morals, business power, ability to resist temptation, all are as yet inchoate and undefined; nothing is sure; and the girl's fancy that makes him perfect in proportion to his good looks, is a mere instinct determined by chance association. A girl, too, has more character to come out than she has shown in her girlhood. Though she sets sooner than men, she does not set unalterably, and marriage and maternity bring out the depths of her nature as nothing else can. It is only common-sense, then, to marry her to a man whose character is already somewhat formed, rather than to one who is still fluid and floating. It is all very well to talk of fighting the battle of life together, and welding together by time. Many a man has been ruined by these detestable metaphors. The theory, partly true and partly pretty, is good enough in its degree; and, so far as the wedding goes, we weld together in almost all things by time. We wear our shoe till we wear it into shape and it ceases to pinch us; but, in the process, we go through a vast deal of pain, and are liable to make corns that will last long after the shoe itself fits easily. We do not advocate the French system of marrying off our girls according to our own ideas of suitability, and without consulting them; but we not the less think that, of all fatal social mistakes, mésalliances are the most fatal, and, in the case of women, to be avoided and prevented at any cost short of a broken heart or a premature death. And even death sometimes would be better than the life-long misery, the enduring shame and humiliation, of certain mésalliances.

CHAPTER XVIII.

BAD NEWS FROM HOME.

NOT many weeks after my attendance at Omichund's natch the English mail brought me a packet of direful news which made me for a long time indifferent to public affairs, and only able to perform my daily duties in the dulllest and most listless manner. To the arrival of every British ship I had for more than a year looked forward with passionate hope and expectation, and behold at last the white sail came that was to bring me, not solace, but the final agony of despair—the coup de grâce that was to end all the weak struggles of my heart with the utter annihilation of my last hope. In Lady Barbara's affection I had trusted as in a strong rock of defense from the assaults of affliction. Had she not told me that she would be my friend through all the changes of my life, and that even ill-conduct on my part should not conceal her regard for her dead cousin's orphan son? During the last two bitter years the memory of this promise had been my chief comfort; and again and again, when the arrival of the English mail had brought me only disappointment, I had said to myself, "I will wait. I know that this one friend is true to me, and sooner or later I shall receive some proof of her affection."

I think I could have existed for years buoyed up by this one hope; but even this was taken from me.

Of the three letters which I so anxiously expected one only came to me, and that was addressed by the hand of Mr. Swinfen. With the letter came a packet, which I found to contain two numbers of the Gentleman's Magazine, and while tearing open the cover of the latter I had time to wonder why he had sent these to me. Alas, I but too soon learned his motive!

Mr. Swinfen's letter ran as follows:

"MY DEAR MR. AINSLEIGH,—I was at once surprised and shocked by the contents of your letter (per ship Godolphin, January 4, 1753) and the shameful infringement of an Englishman's liberty therein described; but find myself unhappily powerless to redress your wrongs. The system by which you have suffered is an infamous adaptation of the tactics of the press-gang to the East India Company's service, and I doubt not is an abuse that will continue to flourish, in spite of complaint from its victims. I bade one of my clerks copy the story of your capture—of course carefully suppressing all private details—and sent exemplars to the Gentleman's Magazine and another journal, but could not obtain either editor's consent to its insertion. The Directors of the E. I. Company are numerous and wealthy, and these slavish journalists do not care to offend so influential a body. There will, I hope, come a day when the English press will be more enlightened, and a British subject may find a prompt hearing, if not a swift redress, for his wrongs.

"Were your present state as pitiable as the condition in which you found yourself on first arriving at Bengal, I should be inclined to move heaven and earth in the endeavor to procure your release and return to England. But, in all candor, I declare that, to my mind, your position at Calcutta, as the confidential secretary of an influential person such as Mr. Holwell, is far superior to any standing you could hope to obtain at home. Pray cherish this new patron and benefactor whom a kind Providence has raised up for you in a land of strangers, and endeavor by your faithful service to become at once necessary and valuable to him.

"And now, alas, my dear young friend, I come to the saddest part of my duty, and the performance whereof I enter upon with a pain second only to that which I know the perusal of this letter will inflict upon you. A heavy loss and affliction has befallen a distinguished English family, and has at the same time deprived you of an affectionate and powerful friend. I will not enter upon details, which you will find related at large in the obituary of the Gentleman's Magazine for December last past; I will tell you only that your kinswoman, Lady Barbara Lestranger, is no more, having expired of a ruptured blood-vessel within a month after the marriage of her step-son, Mr. Everard Lestranger, to his cousin, Miss Hemsley.

"You will perhaps wonder that so kind a friend as Lady Barbara should have made no testamentary arrangement in your behalf, since her fortune was large and entirely at her own disposal, while, having adopted you in infancy, she might naturally desire to extend her care of you beyond the grave, so far at least as to secure your manhood from poverty.

"I can only account for this omission from the fact that the lamented lady was cut off suddenly, in the very prime of womanhood, and that women are ever slow to consider the necessity of legal preparation for that uncertain hour which cometh as a thief in the night. The dear lady left no will, and her estate thus devolves entirely upon her husband, Sir Marcus Lestranger, no doubt to the ultimate enrichment of his only son. It is but a new example of that common fate by which one Pactolean stream flows into and augments another, leaving the barren plains of earth unfertilized.

"Lastly, my dear friend, let me reply to your anxious inquiries on the subject of your unhappy marriage. I regret to say that you have been rightly informed: a marriage so contracted is valid, and nothing but death can loosen your bonds. You will see in this fact another reason for your prolonged residence in India, by which you escape all the pains and penalties of your position.

"I have taken measures to secure the books and other property left at your chambers, and will cause them to be forwarded to you at Calcutta on receipt of your letter to that effect. My paper will permit me to say no more than that I am "Your obedient servant and sincere well-wisher, H. SWINFEN.

"TEMPLE, January 30, 1753."

I lay for hours stretched upon the floor of my chamber, with Mr. Swinfen's letter crushed in my clenched hand, sobbing like a child. And I had thought that evil Fortune had shot all her arrows at my devoted head, while this envenomed dart yet remained in her quiver!

It was dark when I rose from the ground, remembering that I had yet to learn the details of my affliction. I groped for a lamp, and having lighted it, seated myself at my desk, and began to examine the magazines Mr. Swinfen had sent me.

In the record of marriages printed in the number for November, now ten months past, I speedily found the following passage, marked in the margin by the sender:

"On Tuesday sennight was solemnized, with much splendor, the marriage of Mr. Everard Lestranger, only son and heir to Sir Marcus Lestranger, of St. James's Square, London, and Hanterville, Berks (late plenipotentiary to his Britannic Majesty at the court of Madrid), to Miss Dorothea Hemsley, a young lady of fortune, whose beauty and numerous charms of manner and accomplishment have attracted much attention both at court and in the upper circles during the last two seasons. Several of the most distinguished members of the Ministry were present at the ceremonial; and the amiable prime minister himself honored the occasion by his presence. The bride and bridegroom are to pass the fortnight immediately succeeding their union at Thorpstone, in Yorkshire, the seat of a member of Sir Marcus Lestrangle's family. It is pleasant to record a marriage which in its auspicious circumstances recalls the experience of Arcadian fairy-tale rather than the harsher precedents of common life. The union of Mr. Lestrangle and his fair cousin is a pure love-match, the young people having grown up together in a tender and most perfect sympathy of inclinations and sentiments, under the approving eyes of their kindred. A violent fit of hysterics which overtook the bride at the conclusion of the ceremony testified to the intensity of her emotion. Mr. Lestrangle is designed for a diplomatic career, and will, we believe, be the bearer of dispatches to her Imperial Highness the Empress of Russia, with a view to the more satisfactory adjustment of the late subsidiary treaty, for which distinguished mission his elegant manners and agreeable face and figure eminently adapt him."

To me what a satire lurked beneath the hackneyed scribbler's florid paragraph! Love, sympathy!—yes, such love and sympathy as can exist between the tender lamb and its devourer the wolf, between the helpless transfixed bird and its fatal fascinator the snake.

Among the obituary notices in the December number of the same magazine appeared a paragraph of more tragic interest:

"LADY BARBARA LESTRANGE, only daughter and sole heiress of the late Earl Hauteville, and wife of Sir Marcus Lestrangle, late plenipotentiary to the court of Madrid. It is with heart-felt regret that we record the decease of this lady, who expired on Friday, November 19, at her husband's mansion in St. James's Square. Her death was awfully sudden, and occasioned by the rupture of a blood-vessel; but Lady Barbara Lestrangle's health had for some months given cause of alarm to her friends. She had but sufficient time to bid a hurried farewell to her family, the principal members of which, namely, Sir Marcus Lestrangle, his son Mr. Lestrangle, and his amiable lady, were with her at the time of the sad event. Lady Barbara Lestrangle was born in 1712, and was therefore only forty years of age at the time of her lamented decease. She was remarkable for her beauty among the belles of his Majesty's court some twenty years ago; and was distinguished during a long residence at Madrid for the urbanity of her manners, the charm of her conversation, and the unaffected piety of her life. Sic transit gloria mundi!"

In another part of the same magazine I found the notice of an event which accounted but too sadly for the failure of any reply to my letter from my old friend, Anthony Grimshaw.

"Burglary and murderous Outrage at Hauteville, Berks, the Seat of the late Lady Barbara Lestrangle.

"On Saturday, the 20th November, a frightful outrage was committed by a gang of ruffians upon the person of Mr. Grimshaw, house-steward in the employment of Sir Marcus Lestrangle, who narrowly escaped with his life from their brutal assaults. A party of three masked robbers broke into the noble mansion of Hauteville between eleven and twelve at night, no doubt with evil intent upon the plate-room, which is situated in a stone vault under the hall. They seem, however, to have made their entry at an upper window, as it was in an apartment on the first-floor—the morning-room of Lady Barbara Lestrangle—that Mr. Grimshaw appears to have encountered them. What occurred between the armed ruffians and this unfortunate gentleman is known but to himself, and he is in no condition to relate the circumstances of the encounter. But there are ample evidences that the struggle was a desperate one. A valuable Chinese cabinet of inlaid ebony and ivory was found shattered into a thousand pieces, while the steward lay to all appearance lifeless beside it, his skull cruelly battered by some blunt instrument. The villains contrived to escape by leaping from the window to a terrace below, unperceived save by a frightened house-maid, who, not having seen their faces, has no power to describe or identify them. They were happily disappointed of their hopes of booty, nothing being missed except a tray of antique coins from the broken cabinet, where the burglars no doubt hoped to discover valuable jewels, or they would scarcely have made this their first point of attack. Some faint hopes of Mr. Grimshaw's life are entertained, but it is considered doubtful if he will ever recover his faculties, as the injuries done are likely to exercise a permanent ill effect upon the brain.

"This event happened, by a strange coincidence, within four-and-twenty hours after the sudden death of Lady Barbara Lestrangle, to whom the mansion and estate of Hauteville belonged in her own right, and from whom this noble property devolves to her husband and next heir, Sir Marcus Lestrangle, the lamented lady having died intestate."

"A strange coincidence," I repeated, brooding over this passage in the report. "Was this midnight attack upon my lady's private room no more than a coincidence? I have heard her say that she kept family papers in that very cabinet; and before she is cold in her coffin that cabinet is broken open by masked ruffians, who go near to murder her most faithful servant and my only friend. And my benefactress dies intestate, without care or thought for the orphan youth she had adopted; she, whose carefulness for others revealed itself in the smallest thing. O God, it is a strange and wicked world; and I know not whether the treachery of Mahometan revolutionaries in this Eastern Hemisphere is much darker than the plots and stratagems of so-called Christians at home!"

ASIA IN 68.

NOTHING NEW UNDER THE SUN, LADIES!

DAME BADGER AND THE CHILDREN.

THE BEAR IN THE BEECH-WOOD.

ONCE upon a time a king and a queen were obliged to take a long journey, so long that probably years would pass over before they could return to their own kingdom. The Queen wished to stay behind with her children, a boy and girl, but the King would not hear of this, so the children were left to the care of an old nurse, who lived in a pretty little cottage in the middle of a beech-wood. The thatch was covered with green and brown and orange moss, and over this and on the white walls of the cottage were great clusters of purple and white grapes. Inside the cottage there were so many toys that it took the Prince and Princess three days to count them.

But at the end of that time they had grown tired of toys, and then they found out, what every one else had forgotten—there were no sugar-plums in the cottage. They went to the door and put their heads out, but there was nothing to be seen but the beech-wood.

"I say, Bette," said the Prince, "I see brown sugared almonds among the leaves."

But when he found they were only beech-nuts, he began to cry.

"Hush," said his sister, whose name was Bettelinda, though her brother called her Bette; "I can't bear cry-babies, Tim, especially if they're boys." The little Prince's real name was Timoleus. "There is fun to be had without sweets; think of something else."

Tim was a good boy, though as the Queen always carried a silver box of sweetmeats hanging at her girdle for his special use, it was natural he should cry the first time he missed them.

"I tell you what, Bette," he said; "we'll tease old Badger."

Now Dame Badger was their nurse, an old woman with a double chin, and large spectacles with tortoise-shell rims. She wore a high cap with a broad black ribbon round the crown, and high-heeled shoes with silver buckles. She was just like a picture of Mother Hubbard, and when she was cross her chin wobbled like jelly that is not stiff enough.

Bettelinda said: "Oh, Tim!" but she laughed and followed Tim indoors.

There sat the Dame pretending to knit; in reality she was half asleep. She was nearly always asleep, and she hated to be waked up.

"I say, Dame," said the little Prince, close at her ear, "I'd look after my grapes if I were you."

Wobble, wobble, wobble went the old woman's chin, and she grumbled, "Tiresome children," as she went out at the door.

She had left her spectacles on the table, and Tim put them on Bettelinda's nose, and then he made her climb upon the round table with him, where they danced a jig hand in hand, singing as loud as they could:

"Badger's a bate—Badger's a bate;
She scolds all day, from early to late."

But the table was rickety, or they were too riotous, for down it came. They rolled over on the floor, and the spectacles were broken to bits.

How the old woman did scold, and how her chin did wobble when she came back! Tim and Bettelinda saw it as they got up from the floor, and they burst out laughing.

"You nau-au-au-uty chil-il-il-dren, I'll whi-i-i-p you-ou-ou," she said; for you see her chin went on wobbling all the time.

"No—no; we are sorry we broke your spectacles," said the little Princess; "but we are too old to be whipped. Come along, Tim, to the woods."

The old woman had shut the door after her as she came in, and now as the children reached it there came a strange sound all over it; it made Bettelinda's and Tim's hair stand on end with fright. Even Mrs. Badger's chin left off wobbling. There was the noise again, scratch—scratch—scra-a-atch—this time as if a gross of tenpenny nails were scratching against the wood.

"Oh! it's the bear," said the old woman, and she immediately put her face down between her knees, as she had been told that that was good for fainting fits.

Now it happened that a cruel, savage White Bear lived among some crags not far off; but Dame Badger had been too lazy and sleepy to caution the children against him.

They had been used to play with all kinds of animals at the palace, and they thought a bear would make a famous playmate, so they ran again to the door and opened it.

There was no bear, but a very handsome young huntsman, in a green suit trimmed all over with rich brown fur, stood there, and he pulled off his hat to Princess Bettelinda.

"I've lost my way in the wood," he said; "can you give me a drink of water?"

"No-o-o-o-o-o—go-o-o-o-o!" screamed the old woman. She did not raise her head; but the children knew her chin must be wobbling still.

"I'll get you some water," said Bettelinda; "and I'll give you the cake I was to have had for supper," said Tim; and the little maid trotted round to the back of the cottage with the handsome stranger, and drew some water up from the well. It was a wonderful well—so deep that when you threw a stone down you had to wait quite two minutes before you heard it splash in the water below, while the stony sides sent up a prolonged chorus of groans, as if they were grievously tormented; its mouth and throat, too, for that matter, were clothed with long, shining ferns, like wavy green satin ribbons.

"You are very kind children," said the huntsman, when Tim brought him the cake—such a capital cake, full of candied peel and raisins—"and I will give you a bit of advice: When you are out in the wood never stray far from a beech-tree; there are so many of them that you won't find it hard to remember this; and, above all, never gather any of the ferns from this well. Remember, I can't advise you twice over, and I may not see you again. I must go."

He disappeared suddenly, and it seemed to the children that they heard a growl, and then something very like a huge Brown Bear peeped for an instant through the beech-trees which surrounded the garden.

But they paid no heed; they talked about the stranger, while they strolled into the wood, hoping to see him again.

It was very pleasant there; the glossy holly-trees showed plenty of red berries, and as to nuts and blackberries, there were little nooks and copses full of them.

"I say, Bette," said the boy, "why should we go back to that cross old Badger? We could sleep quite snugly on the soft green moss, and I'm sure I could live on nuts and blackberries; couldn't you?"

Bettelinda did not quite like the idea of going to bed in her clothes; but when Tim called this a "finnick," she agreed to sleep out in the wood.

They spent a very happy day; they made a hearty dinner off nuts and blackberries, and then they rolled up two little moss pillows, and carried them about under their arms against bedtime.

A deep ravine ran through the middle of the wood on the side next the cottage. The steep descent was covered with beech-trees, as gay as a pheasant's wing when the sun shines upon it; but the ascent opposite was a succession of rough stepping-stones, crowned at the top with dark, gloomy pines.

"I say," said the little Prince, "I'm tired of beech-nuts; are not you, Bette? We might have fine fun pelting each other with fir-apples."

"So we might," said Bettelinda, and they pelted one another with the fir-cones till the sun went down, and till Tim's blue jacket and Bettelinda's rose-colored frock were covered with sticky fir-apples.

"Somehow," said the Princess, "I would rather sleep in the beech-wood;" but just then she remembered the stranger's warning. "Come along, Tim," she said, in a frightened voice, "and make haste."

Alas! she spoke too late. Between the tall, straight boles of the pine forest the children had seen huge masses of rock piled one on another. Now from one of these came a low, threatening growl, like far-off thunder, and before the sound had died away there was the little Prince in the grasp of a huge White Bear.

The boy fought and kicked desperately, but he did not utter a cry, though the bear's close grip must have hurt him. He could not turn his head and look after Bettelinda, but he called out, "Run—run away, darling, and save yourself."

But Bettelinda had a brave little heart; she picked up a stone and aimed it direct at the bear's eye. It hurt him, and he let go Tim that he might rub his wounded eye. Bettelinda rushed up to her brother in hopes of dragging him away; but, alas! in an instant the wicked, hairy monster had clutched her little rose-colored frock, rending off all the pearl embroidery.

"There's no use struggling," he said, with a kind of sneering growl—he meant it for a laugh, but there is nothing really joking in a bear's laugh—and the poor children shook all over.

"You are just the wife I want," he said to Bettelinda; "I have a nice little family for you to take care of; my Ursula and I did not quite agree, so I hugged her to death yesterday. And you, little boy, are as plump and succulent as a young boar-pig. You'll make a prime dish at your sister's marriage-feast; only I can't carry you both at once. Here, Ursonino." And he began a series of awful growls, which made even Tim's heart stand still with fear. As to Bettelinda, she had fainted with fright.

The White Bear threw back his sly-looking ears to listen; but, instead of the answering growl of his eldest born, he heard a strange new voice in the direction of his den. He growled with anger, and tried to drag both the children along with him; but he could not keep Tim quiet, the little fellow beginning to struggle again with all his might. The White Bear stood erect and listened. Again came the strange, angry growl, and, mingling with it, the voices of his children in an agonized chorus. There was no mistaking the tone. The monster gave Tim a hearty squeeze, and then, letting him and the stupefied Bettelinda drop, he trotted off in the direction of the sounds.

THE ENCHANTED PRINCE.

Tim tried vainly to rouse his sister, till he suddenly remembered that he had that morning pocketed Dame Badger's snuffbox, in the hope of making her chin wobble. He pulled it desperately out of his pocket, and put it close to Bettelinda's nose.

"Isha—esha—usha," came violently from Bettelinda; she sat up and looked round her, wide awake; but she had lost all power of movement, and told Tim, feebly, to run away home and leave her to her fate. He knelt beside her and implored her to attempt the descent, but she could only say, "No."

Even while she spoke there came a heavy panting sound. They both started up, expecting their enemy; instead they saw a great Brown Bear trotting up to them.

He did not growl, and the children were too much surprised to run away. He came close up to them, crouched on the ground, and licked Bettelinda's feet, then he looked at Tim with such friendly eyes that the little boy took heart.

He said, "Poor fellow!" and patted his shaggy head; but the bear looked impatient, and pointed forward to the beech-wood. But still he lay crouching.

"I'll tell you what he means, Tim," said the Princess, who was very quick-witted; "we are to get on his back, and he will take us home."

As she spoke there came a fearful threatening growl from the rocks, and the Brown Bear shook his head impatiently. Bettelinda sprang on his back, and put both arms round his great furry neck; and Tim mounted behind her, and clasped her firmly round the waist—not a minute too soon: there came another deep, rolling growl; and then, as their new friend rose and shook himself, the children saw the white coat of their enemy coming quickly through the pine-trees.

But the Brown Bear seemed to have wings; he reached the bottom of the ravine in less than no time, and sprang up the other side.

Under the beech-trees he halted. The children peeped timorously through the leaves, and saw the White Bear glaring up at them from the stony bottom of the ravine. He had no power to hurt them in the beech-wood.

Then the Brown Bear trotted slowly through the trees till he reached the cottage.

The children patted their deliverer and thanked him. Bettelinda even kissed his broad brown forehead, but he only looked sad; and they saw great tears roll out of his eyes. He raised his paw and pointed to the cottage-door; and as soon as Dame Badger showed herself he turned and trotted off without casting a look behind him.

Next day a gold and green carriage drove up to the gate of the cottage, and out of it came first a tall and stately gentleman in cap and gown, and next a lady in a black dress and a flowing white veil. These personages announced themselves as the instructors appointed to convey the Prince and Princess to the places appointed for their teaching.

The children were sorry to leave their wood and their friendly Bear; they had promised themselves many a merry game with him, and many a ride on his broad back; but they were tired to death of old Badger, and Bettelinda had a shrinking dread of the White Bear. Besides, the idea of change was delightful, so they went.

They staid with their instructors till Bettelinda was nearly grown up, and till Tim was seriously thinking of leaving off jackets and taking to coats with tails; although the coats, of course, would still have been velvet, on account of his being a prince.

Bettelinda was more lovely than spring flowers, and she wore a star of brilliants on her bright golden hair. But when she heard that she and her brother were to spend a fortnight in the cottage in the beech-wood, she took off her blue silk gown, and asked for a suit of brown holland.

"I mean to go blackberrying," she said, "and I don't want to take care of myself."

Dame Badger was very glad to see them. She called Tim "Your Excellency," and Bettelinda "Your Highness," and she gave them cakes and treacle for tea, and blackberries and cream; but she was just as sleepy as ever.

Bettelinda and Tim had been sad on first arriving; but the sight of their old haunts soon brought back their liveliness.

"Come along," said the Prince; "our first task must be to find out our friend Bruin. I wonder if he will know you again, Bette?"

They went out into the little garden beside the cottage.

"Surely there used to be beech-trees here," said Bettelinda, as they reached the well. "But see, Tim, all around the well there is an open space; there are only two or three fir-trees." While she spoke there came a dismal sob from the wind among the pines.

"It feels chilly," said the Princess; "suppose we wait till to-morrow before we seek out our deliverer. He is only a bear, you know, and he can wait."

There came again the same dismal sound from among the trees: you might almost have thought it the utterance of human sorrow. But, dear me, the young people were much too happy to care about the sobbing, sighing wind.

"Look," said the Prince, "how pretty the fern-leaves are; sit down, Bette, and I will deck your hair with them."

She sat down smiling, and the Prince leaned over the well, selecting the smallest of the ferns for his garland. Bettelinda looked lovelier than ever; the glossy wavy leaves seemed as if made to contrast with her golden hair; her brother laughed, and called her the Queen of the Water Sprites.

Another deep sob among the pines, and then Bettelinda saw that the largest of the drooping ferns that hung down the well-sides were moving.

Slowly they raised themselves, and as they pointed toward the wreath on her head they seemed to grow larger and larger. She tried to scream, but she felt dumb and motionless, and before the Prince saw what had happened the fern leaves had mingled with those in Bettelinda's garland, and had drawn her gradually but gently into the mouth of the well.

There she lay, completely hidden among the long thick leaves; she could not cry out, she could not move, and yet she knew that her brave brother was so close that she might almost have touched him.

"Bettelinda!" he cried; "Bette! where are you?" And she heard his footsteps die away as he went about seeking for her.

Poor Bettelinda, she could not even shed a tear; she seemed frozen with horror; should she stay forever under those clinging leaves, glued by some irresistible power to the damp oozing side of the well?

But a new terror was soon added to her despair. A low growl sounded far off, and as it came nearer and nearer she recognized, with a shudder that almost took away her remaining senses, the voice of the White Bear of the pine-forest.

"Aha!" he said, "my queen cousin, so you have caught my little wife, have you? Give her to me at once, that I may carry her to my den."

Bettelinda tried to call for help, but her tongue was as powerless as her body.

Then a sharp shrill voice came twanging up from the very bottom of the well.

"Not so fast, Ursa Major: our compact was a double one. Where is the young Prince, my promised bridegroom? Unless he too wears my colors I have no power to claim him for myself. No, till you bring him to me, alive and unhurt, I keep this dainty lady to make sport for myself and my maidens."

The White Bear growled fiercely, but he seemed powerless against the Kelpie, and Bettelinda almost felt as if there would be more chance of escape for her from the grasp of the huge monster than from the spiteful malice of the Queen of the Well.

As the White Bear retreated she heard advancing footsteps.

Alas! it was her brother's voice calling tenderly for her, and she had no power to warn him of the terrible fate that threatened him.

"Oh, my sister!" the boy said; "my dear Bettelinda, where have you hidden yourself?" Then came a pause.

The Princess felt that a dreadful misfortune was about to happen. Either terror sharpened her eyesight, or one of the long clinging ferns moved, for she distinctly saw that a leaf from her garland had fallen on the brink of the well, and that her brother had extended his hand toward it. The next minute he had put it in his cap, and then the Princess knew that he was in the power of the Kelpie.

At the same time she became conscious of a change in herself; her arms loosened from her sides, the rigid powerless feeling left her, and, grasping the ferns, she soon found herself at the brink of the well; another moment and she was free, standing on the identical spot from whence the ferns had dragged her.

Her brother had disappeared. Before she had time to move she saw the hated form of the White Bear coming round the side of the cottage.

Suddenly she bethought her of her old friend. "Oh, dear Brown Bear," shrieked the unhappy Princess, "help me—help my brother!"

There came a sharp fierce growl from the wood, and before the White Bear could so much as lay a paw on Bettelinda, behold there stood her friendly deliverer, his coat more glossy than ever, trembling and panting with rage.

Then ensued a terrific combat. The bears grappled with each other, and tried to hug one another to death; but at first they were too equally matched. The growling became louder and louder, and the two huge monsters, erect on their hind-legs, swayed from side to side in their deadly struggle.

Bettelinda stood still in breathless terror, and now she saw the Brown Bear totter and fall backward from the loosened grasp of his foe.

Quick as lightning she sprang forward, and, just as the White Bear was about to deal a finishing stroke, she threw herself on the prostrate body of her defender, so that no blow could reach him except through her.

But to her surprise the warm furry coat slipped from her, and raising her head she saw the White Bear overthrown, pierced by the sword of a huntsman who was standing over him.

"Oh, spare his life!" cried Bettelinda, "until he has delivered my brother from the power of the Queen of the Well!"

But the huntsman took no notice till he had pierced the White Bear to the heart, and then, when he fell on one knee and thanked Bettelinda for his deliverance, she saw that he was the handsome stranger she had drawn water for years ago.

"I could only, lovely Princess," he said, "assume my natural shape once in seven years, for three hours, until a beautiful young lady should offer to save my life at the price of her own. Do not fear the Kelpie, Princess; she is powerless now that her cousin is no more."

He struck the well's mouth lightly with his sword, and Prince Timoleus stepped forth and shook hands with his deliverer. The huntsman announced himself as the king of all that part of the country, and he asked Bettelinda to be his queen. The marriage was celebrated with great rejoicings, and the handsome king appointed Prince Timoleus generalissimo of all his forces. The King and Queen lived very happily ever afterward, and had a large family of boys and girls, all as beautiful as a summer morning.

A CHALLENGE FROM A LADY.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20, 1868.

Messrs. Wheeler & Wilson, 625 Broadway:

GENTLEMEN,—Referring to the challenge of Mr. PRATT, whose WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine has been in use ten years without repairing, I beg to state that I have used my WHEELER & WILSON Sewing Machine, in family sewing, fourteen years, without even the most trifling repairs, and it is now in so good condition that I would not exchange it for your latest number (now upward of 350,000). One needle served me more than a year for fine sewing.

Can any one beat this?

Yours, truly, MRS. ANNE WARNER.

Any one who can give a better report than this will be entitled to one of our new tucking gauges. WHEELER & WILSON MANUFACTURING CO.

FROM A LONG-ESTABLISHED AND WELL-KNOWN HOUSE.—"We have sold BURNETT'S EXTRACTS (for cooking purposes) for several years, and believe them equal to any we have had hitherto, and find them gradually growing in the public favor." ACKER, MERRALL, & CONDIT, Grocers. NEW YORK, September 8, 1868.

JOSEPH BURNETT & Co., Sole Proprietors, 592 Broadway, New York; 27 Central Street, Boston.

These Extracts are for sale every where.

FRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS.—The "Reading Magdalena," after CORREGGIO, drew forth a note from CHURCH, the great painter, in which he said that FRANG'S Chromos were "certainly most skillfully and artistically executed," and that the "grading and tone of the flesh-tints of the Magdalena" struck him as being remarkable. —Wide World.

A BUSY man is a locomotive, and life a track. Every night he drives into "the house," and stops. Every morning he is fired up anew, and away he goes, switching off in one direction, and then in another. In this routine of business he forgets that the physical organization is of the most delicate kind. If a hard iron locomotive needs constant care, and to be well oiled up and rubbed off every day, how much more necessary is it that all men and women should use PLANTATION BITTERS, which are the re-plus-ultra of every thing which is necessary to keep the system in a perfect tone of health. —Post.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR REMOVED from any part of the body in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER. $1.25 by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, 115 South Seventh St., Philadelphia.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MOTH-PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN.—Now is the time to clear the complexion for the winter from those disagreeable discolorations, by using PERRY'S MOth and FRECKLE LOTION. Sold by all Druggists.

WOMAN'S BEAUTY.

LADIES who demand a par-excellent article for the Toilet—or none—generally accept George W. Laird's "BLOOM OF YOUTH," so universally admitted as the best and purest article extant. So say the major portion of the fair sex, and their decree must be law. It gives beauty without gloss, never injuring the skin by application, and causes the daughter of Eve to look as fair and as beautiful as a rose in its richest promise. This delightful and purely harmless Toilet preparation is used by the millions. It has no equal for removing Tan, Freckles, and all discolorations. The "BLOOM OF YOUTH" works like a charm, conquering and dethroning all such blemishes. Ladies, if you desire a pleasant and refreshing aid to nature, do not hesitate in procuring a bottle of this truly wonderful and reliable Toilet article.

Ladies who are careful to obtain the genuine GEORGE W. LAIRD'S "BLOOM OF YOUTH" will certainly be pleased by the effects produced by it. Sold at all Druggists and Fancy-Goods Dealers every where.

SOZODONT.

An Eminent Chemist says:

489 BROADWAY, N. Y., July 5, 1866.

I have made a chemical analysis of the preparation for the teeth known as "SOZODONT," for Messrs. HALL & RUCKEL, the object of the analysis being to ascertain whether it contains substances detrimental to the teeth or gums.

An impartial sample of the "SOZODONT" was purchased by me personally from a leading Drug House of this city, and carefully analyzed for acids and other corrosive or injurious ingredients likely to have a detrimental action on the teeth or gums, but nothing of an objectionable character was found in its composition. JULIUS G. POHLE, M.D., Analytical Chemist, Late of Dr. Jas. R. CHILTON & Co.

FACETIÆ.

TO PRODUCE THE GRECIAN BEND.—A young lady of this place has discovered the most economical way to produce the Grecian Bend, and is anxious that we should give the public the benefit of her discovery. Here it is: Rise in the morning before breakfast, on an empty stomach eat one pint of green chestnuts, two large, hard, green apples, one stale water-melon, half a pound of raw cabbage, and a quarter of a pound of honey. A little milk and vinegar will add to the effect. The bend, in the most approved form, will appear in about half an hour, and the young lady can put a camp-kettle on her back for a lump, and take the street with the most confident assurance that the bend will continue for several hours.

CHEAP GENEROSITY.—Giving a man a piece of your mind.

An inquisitive young man visited the State Prison the other day, and among other questions, asked a girl the cause of being in such a place. Her answer was, that she "stole a saw-mill, and went back after the pond, and was arrested." The young man left immediately.

A WEAK INVENTION OF THE ENEMY.—The coffee we have nowadays.

"How do you like the looks of the varmint?" asked an Arkansian of a Down-Easter who was gazing with distended eyes at an alligator with open jaws on the bank of the Mississippi. "Wa'al," responded the Yankee, recovering his mental equipoise, "he ain't what we'd call a handsome critter; but he's a deal of openness when he smiles."

An old bachelor is a traveler on life's railroad who has entirely failed to make the proper connections.

A Western paper contains the following advertisement: "Wants a situation, a practical printer, who is competent to take charge of any department in a printing and publishing house. Would accept a professorship in any of the academies. Has no objection to teach ornamental painting and penmanship, geometry, trigonometry, and many other sciences. Is particularly suited to act as pastor to a small evangelical church, or as a local preacher. He would have no objection to form a small but select class of young ladies, to instruct them in the highest branches. To a dentist or chiropodist he would be invaluable, as he can do almost any thing. Would cheerfully accept a position as bass or tenor singer in a choir. Would board with a family decidedly pious. For further particulars, inquire at Brown's Saloon."

THE MOST APPROPRIATE WOOD FOR WOODEN SHOES.—Sandal-wood.

FAIR CREATURE. "The Train is very much Behind, isn't it, Dear?"

ANOTHER "WINDOW" FRACAS.

SWELL. "Aw—would you object—Aw—to having the Glass down?"
RUFFIANLY YOUNG LADY. "Oh dear no—in fact, I was on the point of asking you either to put your Glass down or leave off staring at me."
SWELL. "Aw!"

A man, hearing that a raven would live two hundred years, bought one to try.

A person who had been listening to a very dull address, remarked that every thing went off well—especially the audience.

A LONE MAN.—The pawn-broker.

An illiterate correspondent, who is given to sporting, wants to know when the "Anglo-Saxon race," so much talked about, is to come off.

A wife wanted her husband to sympathize with her in a feminine quarrel; but he refused, saying, "I've lived long enough to learn that one woman's just as good as another, if not better." "And I," retorted the exasperated wife, "have lived long enough to learn that one man is just as bad as another, if not worse!"

A DESIRABLE DOMESTIC BIRD.—A duck of a wife.

GOOD PLOT FOR PLAY.—A grass plot.

At a religious meeting among the blacks a colored preacher requested that some brother should pray. A half-witted fellow commenced a string of words without meaning. At this the pastor raised his head and inquired, "Who dat praying? Dat you, brudder Mose? You let somebody pray dat's better acquainted wid de Lord."

Said an Irish justice to an obstreperous prisoner on trial, "We want nothing but silence, and but little of that."

FOOD FOR THE IMAGINATION.—Fancy bread.

A clergyman the other day was lecturing a Sunday-school class on the duty of loving one another. "If I should meet a Frenchman, in what language should I speak to him?" he asked. "French," was the ready reply. "Or a Spaniard?" "Spanish," shouted the boys. "Well, if I should meet an angel from heaven, what language would I use?" "Latin," cried the scholars. The preacher admitted that it might be so, but said he should rather try the language of love.

"Are you a skillful mechanic?" "Yes, Sir." "What can you make?" "Oh, almost any thing in my line." "Can you make a devil?" "Certainly—just put up your foot and I will split it in three seconds. I never saw a chap in my life that required less alteration."

A fresh arrival from England went the other day to a livery-stable, and expressed a wish for a carriage. The man in attendance asked if he would like a buffalo. The cockney seemed startled, and stammered out: "Well, I think I'd rather ave a 'oss."

UNCLE. "I dare say when I take you home again, Charlie, your Mamma will have a nice present for you. What would you like best, my boy—a little Brother or a little Sister?"
CHARLIE (after some consideration). "Well, if it makes no difference to Ma, I'd rather have a little Pony."

"Husband, I can't express my detestation of your conduct." "Well, dear, I'm very glad you can't."

During the examination of a witness as to the locality of the stairs in a house, the counsel asked him, "Which way did the stairs run?" The witness, who was a noted wag, replied, "One way they ran up, but the other way they ran down." The learned counsel wiped both eyes and took a look at the ceiling.

"Employment so certainly produces cheerfulness," says Bishop Hall, "that I have known a man come home in high spirits from a funeral because he had the management of it."

The most precocious child ever heard of is probably the child "that's father to the man."

It is said that the Siamese twins keep away from Chicago because they don't want to be separated.

A young man, meeting an acquaintance, said, "I heard that you were dead." "But," says the other, "you see me alive." "I do not know how that may be," replied he; "you are a notorious liar, but my informant was a person of credit."

"I am so lame from the railroad crash of last week I can hardly stand," said a limping, hobbling chap. "Well, then, I hope you intend to sue for damages," said his friend. "Damages! no, no; I have had damages enough by them. If I sue for any thing, it will be for repairs."

It being hinted to a barrister who was wearying the court with a long and dull argument that he ought to bring it to a close, he angrily replied, "I will speak as long as I please!" "You have spoken longer than you please already," said his antagonist.

A clergyman, after marrying a couple, made a prayer over them, concluding: "Forgive them, Lord, they know not what they do!"

A rich man, who was injured by being run over, exclaimed, with warmth, "It isn't the accident that I mind; that isn't the thing; but the idea of being run over by an old swill-cart, that's what makes me mad!"

A preacher in Berks County, discoursing about Daniel in the lion's den, said: "An' thar he sot, all night long, lookin' at the show for nothin', an' it didn't cost him a cent."

BEFORE THE DOCTOR COMES. CROUP.

THERE is no disease probably which causes so great a fright to mothers as the croup of children. Occurring, as it generally does, at that hour of the night when the house is first hushed in sleep, the loud hoarse cough of the child sends a dismal alarm to the ear of every sleeper, and awakens the soundest to a sudden conception of danger. The fright, fortunately, is generally much greater than the occasion justifies, for in ninety-nine out of a hundred times the disease is only that comparatively trifling one, the false and not the real croup; the former being a very frequent, and the latter a rare complaint.

The false croup is distinguished from the true by the suddenness of its invasion and its occurring almost exclusively in the night. In the false there is no fever; in the real there always is. The false comes and goes with the paroxysm; the real is of a continuous and increasing severity. The false never lasts over two or three days, with intervals of perfect health; the true never ends before a week, and sometimes lasts six. The false is seldom if ever fatal, and the true is most commonly so.

While mothers can take courage from the fact that the genuine croup is so rare an affection that it is probably the false with which they will have to deal, it will be satisfactory to them, if unable to distinguish between the two diseases, to learn that what is proper to be done for one before the doctor comes, is proper for the other.

Though the disease of false croup appears more formidable to the ordinary observer than it is in reality to the patient, it is, however, sufficiently serious, for it occasionally, though rarely, causes death, to call for the use of every means of prevention and cure.

The most common cause of the affection is a sudden change from heat to cold, and among very young infants excessive crying is said to bring on occasionally an attack of croup. Exposure and great muscular and vocal effort must be carefully avoided. The scanty dresses worn by children in this country, leaving the busts arms, and legs bare, greatly predispose to the disease. It is said to be very rare among the Germans, who dress their children more rationally, never exposing their necks and limbs. The daily cold bath properly applied is an excellent fortifier of the youthful constitution and preventive of croup. The water should not be colder than 55° or 60° Fahrenheit, and the child should be thrust rapidly into it and taken immediately out again, well rubbed, and quickly dressed. It is essentially important that children should have the freest opportunity of breathing the purest air. They should never be allowed to pass their time by day or night except in perfectly well-ventilated apartments. The diet should be simple but substantial, consisting of well-baked bread, milk, and a due supply of roasted meats.

During a paroxysm, the simplest treatment is all that is necessary. A flannel wrung out of hot water and wrapped about the neck of the child, and a few tea-spoonfuls of gum sirup, made of powdered gum-arabic, sugar, and water, given from time to time, will be all that is necessary for immediate relief. Most people dose their children with ipecacuanha until they vomit. This is rarely necessary, and it is doubtful whether it is ever beneficial.

DOWN BY THE FIRS.

"Ho, my merry young boatman,
Ruddy and damp from the seas,
Saw ye a child that tripp'd and smiled,
And shook her curls in the breeze—

"Fair brown curls that the sunshine
Kindles up into gold,
Thrown back with grace from a rosy face,
Looking half shy, half bold?"

Spake the merry young boatman,
Staying his sturdy pace:
"I saw no child that tripp'd and smiled,
Nor a rosy and roguish face:

"But down by the firs a maiden
Slowly straying I met:
Her face was fair, but pale for care,
And her downcast lids were wet."

"And her curls were brown, or golden?"
"Her hair was gold in the sun."

"And her frock was white?" "A gown too light
And gay for so sad a one."

Why, this is the same little Nellie:
No longer a child, forsooth!
And she smiles to me, but weeps by the sea!
"Good-morrow, and thank thee, youth."

Ah, Nellie, to me thy childhood
Hath vanish'd with scarce a sign;
And the playful words I said were as swords
To that woman-grown heart of thine!

I will haste, and overtake her;
Ay, there she is, under the firs:
And what if I tried to win me a bride,
With that woman-grown heart of hers?

HONORABLE SERVICE.

IN olden times domestic service was esteemed honorable above all other. The serfs were the husbandmen, manufacturers, and tradesmen; the duties of the household were considered the high function of the first in the land. Noble lords strove with each other for the privilege of waiting at table, and performing the personal service of their suzerain; and to this day many a fair estate in Europe is held by the tenure of bearing a trencher at a state feast, presenting a basin and ewer to the king, or some equally significant symbol. The offices of Lord High Chamberlain, High Steward, Master of the Horse, Mistress of the Wardrobe, etc., are all relics of this régime.

Now, on the contrary, none but the rudest and most ignorant foreigners will consent to undertake the duties which bring them into such intimate relations with our families, and on which so much of our comfort depends. These boorish Irish girls are, as a rule, the best-fed, best-housed, and best-paid of our working-women. With the aid of the numerous labor-saving devices, which they are often too unintelligent to use, their work need be little more than healthful exercise. They are not called upon to trouble themselves about the cost of rent, food, or coals; they live in good houses in healthful locations, have an abundant table, well-lighted and well-warmed kitchens, and airy sleeping apartments, with manifold privileges, and from $10 to $30 per month, besides all expenses for board, light, fire, and washing. And, despite their frequent wastefulness, slovenliness, and dishonesty, their labor is so necessary that they almost dictate terms to their employers, who dread nothing so much as a change for the worse.

All this while intelligent and refined American women, who might be household treasures, are toiling over the needle, or in shops and factories, for a few dollars a week, which will scarcely pay the cost of living in those dingy tenements or cheap boarding-houses in noisome quarters, which are, alas! the sole resort of the New York poor. They prefer this to being called a servant and eating from another table than that of their employer. But is it any more menial to sweep a lady's room and cook her dinner than to make her dress or stitch her shoes? And does the wealthy manufacturer who pays them their weekly wages invite them to his house and introduce them to his friends? If he did, they would probably be as ill at ease there as would the cooks and chamber-maids if summoned from their work to partake of the family dinner. But the latter, as familiar members of a household, are sure of an interest and sympathy which our poor working-women in their desolate homes never receive.

It is clearly a senseless prejudice which shuts American women out of a field where they are so much needed, and where they would be so gladly welcomed. After the present discipline of ignorant domestics, neat-handed and intelligent girls would be treated like household fairies in the families which they might enter. The obnoxious word servant would soon be lost with the elevation of the vocation, and the terms cooks, chamber-maids, and nurses, would become as honorable as seamstresses or milliners. Refreshed by a purer air and more generous diet, the victims of late hours and overwork would regain their health and live out the natural term of their existence, instead of sinking to a premature grave. And the housekeepers of the land would once again find a comfortable home a thing possible of attainment, with this new and valuable aid, and would no longer be driven to take refuge in boarding, that bane of all domesticity. Let women enlarge the sphere of their employments as much as they will, the wider the better, but let them not disregard this eminently natural, healthful, and remunerative one, which lies close at hand, like an unworked mine, and which naught prevents them from entering but a foolish sentiment which they call pride, but which is only prejudice.

CHANGE OF CLIMATE.

THAT climate has an influence upon the human constitution no one can doubt. The distinguishing features of the various races of mankind are attributed partly to this cause, and the characteristics of different individuals of the same family may even be thus modified by it.

Climate, too, has an undoubted effect upon health, and there are some diseases which owe their origin exclusively to this source. The various fevers produced by the miasm of certain regions are illustrative of the fact.

While conceding the influence of climate we question whether it is as great as is generally supposed. Much that is attributed to it might be more justly claimed for the mode of life which depends upon the barbarism or degree of civilization of a people.

We are quite sure that the effect of a change of climate upon disease is popularly much exaggerated. Science has long since modified its views on this subject. For example, at one time it was received as an established fact that warm climates were exempt from that most fatal of diseases commonly known as consumption, and thousands of victims were hurried away from their northern homes to a speedy death in southern countries. It is now known that this affection is quite as prevalent in the tropics as in colder and more temperate latitudes; and all competent physicians tell their consumptive patients that plenty of pure fresh air is the best means for arresting the progress of their ailment. To obtain this it is seldom necessary, in this country at least, to do more than to open the windows or go out of the door. A temperate winter climate has this advantage. It offers more inducement to outdoor exercise, which is especially beneficial to persons who are consumptive. If, therefore, their place of habitation is much exposed to rough weather, it may be well to change it for a more sheltered position; but this can be obtained without crossing an ocean to seek it.

Though a mere change of climate will not have any direct influence in checking the progress of consumption, it may have, through the traveling in search of it, a beneficial effect. The effect of a journey or voyage is good upon most diseased persons, provided they have physical strength enough to endure the fatigue. The benefit which results is, in the first instance, felt by the mind, and subsequently through it by the body. The cheerfulness engendered by the ever-varying incident and scene, inseparable from traveling, gives a tone to the animal spirits, the animation and vigor of which are shared by the whole physical system.

In consumption, as in many other incurable diseases, the physician is very apt to recommend a change of climate, because he has arrived at the narrow limit of his restricted science. Medical practitioners, moreover, not seldom recommend a voyage in easy compliance with the hopes of a patient founded upon the vulgar error of its efficacy. Thus many a poor wretch is made more wretched still by the fatigues and deprivations of a long voyage, and his life brought to a quicker close. In an advanced state of consumption, or in fact of any other disease, there is more chance not only of alleviation but of cure, in remaining at home than in traveling abroad in search of a change of climate.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of a Stitch in Time.

MY DEAR FRED,—When I was a young man upon my travels there were two things that I wished very much to do. One was to pass Easter in Rome, and the other to pass Christmas in Jerusalem. The days seemed to me to belong peculiarly to the places, and I knew that the ceremonies would serve as a kind of illumination to that chapter of my memories. And so it was. Every year since, when Easter morning comes, I perceive another splendor than that of spring sunshine in the air; and when the Christmas chimes ring they usher in that unfolding spectacle of the sad, silent landscape of Jerusalem. It is with the same feeling that I always go quietly away from the city just before Thanksgiving, to keep that festival where it is especially cherished, among the hills where it was first known. It began in Massachusetts, but, like a good many other things of similar beginnings, it did not end there. Indeed, Vermont and New Hampshire already insist that the purity of the faith is departing from Massachusetts; and those States modestly intimate that the orthodox feast of turkeys and pumpkins is to be found in perfection only under their hospitable roofs. They think that Massachusetts is going over to Christmas and other papistical conceits; but I don't find that Massachusetts confesses it. And if jolly family parties, and the closing of shops, and the opening of churches, and secular preaching—as they call it, and hecatombs of turkeys and pyramids of pies may be offered in evidence, it really seems as if Massachusetts could still show a strong case.

There is one fact about Thanksgiving which I am ashamed to say, my dear Fred, that I never knew until this year, and which is a curious and pleasant illustration of that great theme of ours, Manners upon the Road. Thanksgiving and the day before are the favorite days for weddings, especially in the rural parts of New England. I suppose that the thrifty genius of that honest country says to itself: "Here is a noble feast spread, any how; why not turn it into a marriage-feast, and save trouble and—expense?" I think it is a very reasonable view of the matter, and as I was bowling along this very year to bury myself in the heart of the uncompromising Thanksgiving region, a bright, smooth-faced youth sitting before me, clad in new clothes, and of so beaming an aspect as to make the whole car happy, tempted me to say to him, "Pleasant day for Thanksgiving to-morrow, I hope."

"Well, I should rather hope so."

"It is a pleasant day, any how," said I, confidently.

"Rain or shine," answered he.

"Rain or shine," I rejoined.

He looked at me for a moment with a frank, speaking face, and continued, with an apparent conviction of my paternal sympathy,

"You have grandchildren, of course?"

If I winced at this he did not see it; and I said: "Not exactly; but grand-nephews and nieces, lots of 'em."

"Ah well! I'm going to be married Thanksgiving-day."

"My dear fellow," I said, "I give you joy. You're going to give yourself occasion for thanksgiving every day in the year, or," I added, "you ought not to marry."

My neighbor looked at me curiously. But he was an honest soul, as I said, and after studying me closely for a moment, he asked, "Where do you preach?"

"Every where, I'm afraid," answered I; and I laughed so that he joined in.

"Well, the fact is," said he, "your gray hairs, and what you said, and the rest on it, and Thanksgiving, and all, I did kind o' think you were a minister."

"Of course you did, and I don't wonder. And so you are to be married on Thanksgiving-day?"

The young man smiled assent, and then in a bashful tone replied, "A stitch in time saves nine."

That was true enough, but how was it true just then? What relation could there be between his marriage and a stitch in time? I suppose this question was written all over my face, for, after looking at me some time, he said, shyly, "The folks will be all together, and it's a leisure day, and we are all ready, so why not?" There was certainly nothing to be said, except possibly to ask exactly how he applied the proverb. I had a vague impression of what he meant, but it was certainly a queer way of putting it; and I settled myself in my seat, and found that the homely proverb began to unroll into many more applications than he intended. The train stopped at some station far up among the hills, and I heard the ringing click of the hammer against the wheels of the car. The men were passing along under the train, trying the iron every where. I thought of the broken wheels and rails, of the horrible mangling and massacre, and I leaned forward to my neighbor the bridegroom, and said, with a smile, "There it is again, you see, a stitch in time saves nine."

"So I told her," replied my neighbor. But I settled myself once more as the train rolled away from the station, and reflected upon the coming season, the frost, the fire, and all the perils to which railroads are exposed. The really unavoidable accidents are very few, not greater than in other modes of travel, but we are all the time protesting against the horrible disasters and the abominable management. I mechanically opened my paper as I turned the subject over in my mind, and saw a communication by Mr. Shanks upon the organization of our system of travel, which, after the first few words, I did not read mechanically, I assure you. More lives, it seems, are lost annually in this country on railroads and steamboats than in the whole of Europe. There were 313,699,268 persons who traveled by rail in England during the year 1866, and each one of them, our friend tells us, had the remote chance of being killed by accident in just fifty thousand years of constant travel on the same roads. He thinks that with about the same passenger traffic the loss of life in this country is fully a hundred times greater. I was impressed with the peril of my situation at that very moment, for we were rattling along at twenty-five miles an hour, and I leaned forward to my friend and whispered,

"I hope you won't be smashed before you are married."

He smiled feebly, so that I instantly added, "Perhaps upon this road they take the stitch in time."

His smile was still more feeble, as if he had not the remotest idea of my meaning, and rather suspected me of making fun of him, so that I explained. "An ounce of prevention," said I, smiling. "Oh, yes," answered he; "it's worth a pound of cure."

I returned to my paper and found that Mr. Shanks was of the same opinion, for he says that the superiority of foreign management, not only of railroads, but of society in general, lies in the system of prevention. Public effort is aimed not only at punishing criminals, but at preventing crime. These states have adopted the great principle that a stitch in time saves nine. Why doesn't our public think of the wisdom of that rule?

Why, last summer, my dear Fred, I was coming up to see you at your pleasant nest in the region of roses, which is not a hundred miles from Flushing. It was a lovely afternoon, and I repaired to the foot of Peck Slip and embarked upon that pretty little painted chip called the Sylvan Stream—as neat a craft for a small mill-pond on quiet days as you could wish. The boat was not only crowded, it was crammed. Positively it was quite frightful to observe how closely packed we were, and to reflect upon the throng of sail and steam vessels, large and small, that were moving about the East River, and each with a certain degree of resistless motion. The passengers all sat quietly reading their evening papers, when there was a sudden excitement, and we perceived that one of the great Sound steamers was bearing toward us, and that a ferry-boat on the other side made our escape impossible, so that a collision was inevitable. The great steamer saw it also. It stopped its engines, but it could not check its momentum, and its pilot managed the boat as skillfully as possible, and succeeded in forcing her inevitable prow upon our paddle-box instead of our hull. Of course every thing that was touched was carried away, and our poor little boat was so tipped up that one of her guards dipped under water, and for a few moments there was extraordinary consternation. Fortunately the Sylvan Stream was not vitally hurt, and I am told that she still flits up and down the river, as crowded as ever, and with the most lively hope in the breast of every newspaper reader that nothing will happen at least that time, and with the profoundest consciousness that if any thing like the event of last summer does happen there is no probability of avoiding a fearful disaster.

Now, my dear Fred, the good people who travel daily by that little boat are as wise as those who should take a train daily which was compelled to cross a bridge known to be insecure. Nothing might happen for a long time; but when the bridge fell something would probably happen which would find expression in a loud cry of horror and indignation. Why don't these good people of the Sylvan Stream ponder the proverb of my Thanksgiving bridegroom, and insist that a stitch shall be taken and an ounce of prevention secured? There was the Brooklyn ferry accident the other day. The outcry that followed it was in a certain way as ridiculous as an outcry at darkness after sunset. Is there a man who is in the habit of crossing the ferries who has not a thousand times remarked the danger of the rush to the edge of the boat upon approaching the slip? Nothing could be safer as long as nothing happened, but nothing surer than that something would happen. What would I do about it? I would take a stitch in time. I would draw a chain across at a proper point, or I would station men to warn and to keep passengers back, and I would have the chain respected and the men supported by the common-sense of the public.

I have never been able to see, my dear Fred, why the public order should not be as well maintained and human life as much respected in a republic as in a monarchy. Perhaps you have no very profound respect for my political speculations; but I have learned from a good deal of careful reading, and from considerable observation of men and affairs, that common-sense and prosperity are very apt to go together: and as the common-sense of many years and of many people is distilled, as it were, into the one round clear drop of a proverb, a very admirable body of state-craft or sound political policy might be gathered from the most familiar proverbs. Perhaps when I decide to write "a great work" it will be upon that subject. And I am very sure that I should begin with the maxim that my Thanksgiving bridegroom so quaintly applied to his own marriage. If you have a dinner and a party and a holiday all prepared, why not add an individual occasion? reasoned that philosopher. So if you have a great and well-appointed police, why not put them to preventing crime as well as arresting criminals, and so save money? If you have a steamer fit for mill-pond navigation, and insist upon sending it to sea or into a crowd of heavier craft, why not calculate the obvious, necessary peril, and act accordingly?

Indeed, Fred, in a nation of Yankees, why not have common-sense? Thanksgiving is passed—I hope you had plenty of turkey—and my friend of the cars has doubtless verified the proverb that he quoted. Let us all go and do likewise. If I were not at the end of my letter how I could expand upon my text! But think of it, and preach your own sermon in the pleasant Quaker way.

Your friend and the friend of proverbs,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

EVENING DRESSES.

HIGH-COLORED silks are in favor for evening dresses. Red in its various shades is the leading color. There is the Caroubier, sultan, ruby, grenade, garnet, and a dull deep hue called antique red, all of which are sought after by brunettes. The brilliant poppy-red, so beautiful by gas-light, is selected by blondes by way of contrast to their own delicate complexion. Satin of the same shade trims silks of these colors for very young ladies. Black lace softens their brightness for those more advanced. Gold, yellow, and capucine, are gorgeous hues in vogue this season, entirely covered with black illusion. Blue and green together appear among eccentric French toilettes; for instance, a blue silk is trimmed with puffs of green tulle, or a gauze over-dress of the Forty-Second plaid is worn over white silk.

Chameleon gros grains in delicate shades of mauve, pink, and blue, shot with white, make beautiful dresses for gas-light wear, and are sold in very good quality at $2 65 a yard. Green was too much worn last winter to remain popular this season. Glossy taffeta at low prices is used as transparencies beneath Chambery gauze and tulle, producing chameleon effects. The French employ foulards for this purpose; and it is to be regretted that our merchants do not import choice colors of foulard to be used in this way, as they are inexpensive and durable.

No new materials appear in these goods. Tartan and crape are preferred for Watteau drapery and paniers over silk, as tulle is so thin that it is scarcely perceptible. The Chambery gauzes are in beautiful variety, but have never been appreciated here. White muslin dresses are more popular than ever, and are laden with ruffles, puffs, tucks, and lace. Organdy appears best when first made; but it is very frail, and does not wash well. The best white muslin is called French-Swiss, a paradoxical name for a more substantial yet finer material than that commonly called Swiss. A furnishing house will get up a trained dress, with elaborate puffs, tucks, and ruffles on the skirt, with sleeves and corsage to match, for $30. There is no lace used on this dress. $48 buys a handsomer one with Valenciennes at the throat and wrists, and a gros grain sash trimmed with lace. These dresses are simply worn over white lingerie, or are made very gay by wearing a colored silk evening dress beneath them—a soiled or faded dress of a previous season being made useful in this way. Such dresses are in much better taste than the paniered alpacas and empress cloths in which people ape fashion with cheap materials.

TRAINS AND CRINOLINE.

Trains are reported to have been increased in length, but we have not seen a model worthy to be quoted that measured more than eighty inches from the waist to the floor. Three quarters of a yard added to the length of the figure is advised by the best modistes, who, we find, always avoid extremes.

Trains appear to have grown longer because they are worn over very small hoops, or without any. A skirt of hair-cloth gored and trained, with three deep flounces on all but the front width, is the fashionable substitute for a steel spring skirt. They are expensive at present, costing from $10 to $15, but could easily be made at home at much less cost.

STYLES OF MAKING DRESSES.

The Watteau bodice of colored satin over a white silk or muslin dress is the novelty of the season. It is a low-necked basque with added drapery fastened in a broad pleat at the top of the back, falling loosely below the waist and caught up to form a panier puff. This drapery in thin materials over silk is also very pretty, and should have more fullness than when made of satin. A velvet Watteau of emerald green is worn with a white satin skirt. This bodice is becoming to slender, tall figures. It is sometimes made with high corsage like the Watteau cloak, with a square front filled in with tulle.

The Louis XV. corsage, high and round, with long narrow opening in front for a chemisette, is in vogue for full dress dinner parties. The chemisette reaches almost to the belt, and is only about four inches wide. Sleeves to such dresses are nearly tight, with a Pompadour bow by way of epaulet, and a deep pleated ruffle at the elbow headed by ruches. The Maria Theresa style, with wide folded chemisette and half long sleeve flowing from the elbow, is familiar to our readers.

A gathered flounce from ten to twenty inches wide, with a heading of puffs and ruches, is the most prevalent mode of trimming trained skirts. Tablier designs of lace and ruches on the front width, with large butterfly bows at each end, are in vogue. The three full back widths are lined at the top with stiff muslin, and box-pleated, to form a panier. A sash from the belt supports the panier, and is knotted beneath it.

Few evening dresses are made without a panier or tunic, except for stout people, and then the trimming is made to simulate a tunic, and a short sash with several loops is added, to give a full tournure. Colored silk or satin panier skirts, with apron fronts and peasant waists, are worn over white silk, and are especially pretty with short dancing dresses. Sometimes they are worn with dresses of contrasting hue, such as fawn color with cerise, blue over salmon, and, in the Pompadour colors, pink with drab or blue. These are gay and striking, and people of more quiet taste prefer the dress and panier of two shades of the same color. This is a convenient way of concealing the soiled parts of dresses of last season, as they are usually most defaced on the front width and under the arms. A piece of chamois leather sewed in the arm-hole is the most efficient dress-protector.

Lace tunics, with a flounce to match, are more used than ever. A lace point is draped to form a reversed tunic by putting the centre in front, looping it with flowers at the side, and interlaping the ends high at the back. If lace can not be afforded, billowy puffs of tulle, divided by satin pipings, form pretty over-skirts.

Sashes are fastened at the left side near the front when the skirt has a panier; otherwise they are placed behind to give a bulky tournure. Fan-shaped ornaments of pleated satin, bows with triple loops, and the fluted Renaissance bows, are in better style than sashes.

VARIETIES.

Round pelerine capes of lace or puffed tulle are newer than fichus crossed on the bosom. Another style is square in front, the back simulating a long pointed hood behind, with a ladder of bows in the centre. Grecian folds of Lyons tulle, with a knot of satin or a bouquet on the breast, puffed bretelles, and berthas of blonde and lace, ornament low corsages. The short sleeve is puffed usually, and is longer than last year. The extreme décolletée styles lately worn are very much moderated. Wide black velvet bretelles, embroidered with white Marguerites, adorn many dresses. Short dresses will come into very general use during the holiday gayeties. They are made with two skirts, flounced and paniered precisely in the way described for street suits, without the outer garment.

Long gloves, with four or six buttons on the wrist, are most used for evening wear. Flesh-tints are preferred to pure white. The Marie Antoinette slipper, with a point behind, a curved heel, and a rosette covering the instep, is frequently worn; but a gaiter matching the dress in color, or else pure white, is the popular shoe for parties. Head-dresses are full diadems, with side-sprays and the jeweled butterflies and aigrettes described in a late Bazar. Pink and white eglantine are in great favor this season; and there can be nothing more beautiful than the simple wild rose. $22 buys the coiffure and trimming for corsage.

The Marie Antoinette fan of white or buff silk, or lapis and emerald satin, is painted in gay designs after Watteau and Lancret. The sticks are of opal-tinted pearl, with a point lace border at the top barred with pearl. Price $60. A pretty fan for $9 is of pink or blue satin with Valenciennes edge and carved sticks of imitation ivory.

Powdered hair in the antique style is greatly in favor, especially with married ladies. Natural blonde hair is highly prized when of a yellowish golden hue. When nature has not supplied this fashionable tint art is resorted to for producing it. High crimped chignon, with a row of puffs above the forehead and frizzed curls falling low on the face, is the best style for dinner coiffure. Soft flowing curls for evening entertainments. We will give full information about jewelry in an early Number.

OPERA BONNETS AND WRAPS.

A pouf of white royal velvet or rose-pink or China blue in corrugated folds is the most elegant round hat for evening wear. A marabout cluster, or a spray of flowers with an aigrette of white heron's feathers is in front, and a double bow of thick satin on top. Bonnets are high diadems of velvet with two or three velvet bars across the head, displaying the elaborately dressed hair between. A deep pelerine of Spanish blonde edged with lace covers the chignon, and is fastened in front with a bouquet.

The MacFarlane cloak, a circular with a cape in front concealing the arms and a hood behind, is the handsomest evening wrap. It is made in velvet cloth striped with satin, trimmed with chenille fringe.

PERSONAL.

Mr. and Mrs. Vice-President COLFAX were among the many who last week gratified their curiosity by making a thorough examination of the various printing and book-making operations carried on by HARPER & BROTHERS. On leaving the establishment he asked for a copy of the December Number of the Magazine, expressing a curiosity to read Mr. C. H. WEBB's droll "Confessions of a Reformed Planchettist." The Bazar has seldom met a more graceful, unassuming, and in every way womanly woman, than the bride of the Vice-President elect. The newly-married couple ate their Thanksgiving turkey with Mr. B. W. DELAMATER, of Brooklyn. During their stay in New York they shopped at STEWART'S, drove in the Central Park, and were photographed in the imperial fashion by C. D. FREDRICKS & Co.

—Mr. FRANCIS, of the Troy Times, one of the ablest and most profitable journals in the State, brings forward the name of Mr. GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS for the English mission.

—ROSSINI was not merely the most brilliant musical composer of his time, but the laziest man in Europe. He used to compose in bed; and once, when a fine duet that he was writing, and had almost finished, slipped off the bed beyond his reach, rather than get up for it he took another sheet and composed another duet entirely different from the first.

—Among the tasteful bridal gifts received by Mrs. COLFAX were a pair of beautiful bronze ornaments, from SAMUEL SINCLAIR, of the New York Tribune; an elegant Crimean hunting-watch, from Mr. HUGH, late of the Michigan Southern Railroad; a beautiful silver fruit-dish, from Miss PARSONS of Ashtabula; a Roman mosaic card-receiver, from Mrs. J. D. DEFREES, of Washington; six dozen silver knives, forks, and spoons, from S. W. SHOEMAKER, manufactured expressly for the occasion by KIRKE of Baltimore; a bronze drop-light of exquisite workmanship, from M. L. CURTIS & Co.; a set of gold-lined egg-cups and spoons, from Mrs. W. T. RUNK, of New York; a set of massive silver napkin rings, from Mrs. B. W. DELAMATER, of Brooklyn; and a magnificent walnut smoking-table, from JOHN T. DENNY, and silver cigar-stand with silver lamp from J. T. DENNY, to Mr. COLFAX.

—The Baron ROTHSCHILD, who recently died, not only kept the best obtainable cook in Europe, but knew quite well enough what were the best things to eat. On one occasion somebody at dinner asked him to take venison. "No," said the Baron, "I never eat venison; I don't think it so good as mutton." "Oh," says the Baron's friend, "I wonder at your saying so; if mutton is better than venison, why does venison cost so much more?" "I will tell you why—in this world the people always prefer what is deer to what is sheep."

—LOUIS PRANG, the well-known chromo-lithographer, is a good example of the results of perseverance and stout-heartedness. He was born at Breslau, and bred a calico-printer in his father's manufactory. On the breaking out of the revolution of 1848 he joined the republicans, became one of their prominent leaders, and was finally outlawed by name by the Austrian Government. After wandering for two years in Bohemia and Switzerland, he emigrated to America. Here he undertook first the publication of architectural works, and then the manufacture of porte-monnaies; lost every thing, and was left penniless. He then set to work to learn wood-engraving, working on an average eighteen hours a day, till four years of this incessant toil broke down his health. He next commenced the publication of lithographic portraits, at first with some success, but the war soon broke out, and he found himself without customers and with heavy obligations to meet. In lack of orders he was forced to publish a war-map, which, to his delight, sold faster than he could print, and brought him in ample funds. His card-portraits of Union generals, mosses, ferns, etc., were equally successful, and he was soon able to enter upon the costly publication of chromo-lithographs. Here his first ventures proved a failure. Nothing dismayed, he next attempted Tait's "Chickens," which sold every where and at once, and really inaugurated the new industry of chromo-publishing in America. Of Tait's three groups about fifty thousand copies have been sold in the United States alone; and as they cost five dollars each, a quarter of a million of dollars has changed hands in the sale of these pictures. Since then Mr. PRANG has constantly improved his issues, until now his pictures are quite equal to the finest specimens of European chromos in oil.

Mr. PRANG employs seven chromo-lithographic artists, who are constantly employed in reproducing pictures by American and foreign painters. He keeps thirty-three presses at work, and employs about seventy hands. He has just finished building a large factory at Roxbury. His physique is more American than German. He is tall, slender, and wiry, with a bright, keen eye, and a face full of shrewdness, intelligence, and energy.

—An event much talked of among people in Paris whose thoughts run upon apparel, is the disruption of business relations between the EMPRESS and her dress-maker, Madame MOGA. The famous artiste has received for ten years past about 100,000 francs yearly for filling the EMPRESS'S wardrobe, and left her because the latter wanted to have her own way about a dress. Madame MOGA now relies on the patronage of the PRINCESS DE METTERNICH, who has been the leader of Paris fashions for two or three years past, and who seems to remain as young as ever, while the EMPRESS is fast growing old.

—M. DU CHAILLU has just set out on another lecturing tour all the way to St. Louis and back. The Evening Mail says that he has taken his gorilla with him. The harmless animal is strapped in a valise.

—Miss MULOCK's last novel, "The Woman's Kingdom," is one of her greatest successes. The demand for it is so great that some six editions have been called for within the last month.

—Mr. EDWIN BOOTH must look to his laurels. Paris has witnessed a dramatic performance, by a lady, that has won the public admiration. Mlle. KAROLY, the tragedienne, has just been performing Hamlet and Romeo with the greatest success. Until nineteen this lady was a poor seamstress in the city of Namur. One day, in going to the shop where she was employed, she stopped at a book-stall and mechanically took up a volume, whose leaves she commenced turning over. Suddenly she fixed her eyes on a passage, read a page or two, and bought the volume. It was "Corneille's Tragedies." When she had read and re-read the book, she resolved to become an actress, and is now one of the most brilliant artistes of the French stage.

—Mr. EDWARD E. INGRAHAM is one of those Philadelphia lawyers who are not easily puzzled, especially when examining candidates for admission to the Bar. When a Mr. C— applied for that purpose, Mr. I., knowing him to be a young man of fortune who had no intention of practicing, put one question to him, which was: "Mr. C—, how do you make chicken salad?" Mr. C— described the process. "Very satisfactory," said Mr. INGRAHAM, who immediately signed the certificate.

—The leading cantatrices of Europe are, on the whole, blessed with good looks, though few are what we republicans would call beautiful. PAULINE LUCCA has a piquant face, and is by some considered very handsome. IRMA DE MURSKA has regular features, but looks somewhat coarse. Her good looks, however, will not disappear so soon as those of ADELINA PATTI, which are already on the wane. Mlle. CASTRI is a pleasant-looking girl, with very fine eyes, but her complexion is not good. Mlle. CARVALHO is beautiful on the stage, but looks faded when seen close by. She is a very good wife and mother, and recently declared that she would devote all her talents as a cantatrice and actress toward paying the debts incurred by her husband as manager of the Theatre Lyrique. CHRISTINA NILSSON has a fine, thoughtful, regular face, and some, among whom is such a good judge as GUSTAVE DORE, consider her positively beautiful; but she looks rather cold and indolent. Despite her plebeian descent she has aristocratic hands and very small feet. Most of these eminent cantatrices, though they still retain the name of "Mlle.," are married. "Mlle.," LUCCA is married to a Prussian lieutenant, a clever fellow, who has nothing beyond a baronial title. He worships his wife, and she is much attached to him. They have three children. IRMA DE MURSKA is married to a young Hungarian actor, with whom she eloped eight or ten months ago, to the great vexation of her ambitious mamma. He is a jealous fellow, and the jeunesse dorée of Paris understands pretty well that making love to Mlle. DE MURSKA is a somewhat risky game.

—Old ROSSINI was one of PATTI's most enthusiastic admirers. He said her Rosina was the best he had ever seen. When PATTI was in Paris she always visited the old gentleman two or three times a week, and called him "papa," and he generally spoke of her as "sa charmante petite doulette." It is believed that the old maestro has composed several important pieces which he has bequeathed to her in his will. He was much displeased at her marriage with CAUX, whom he regarded as a naughty young male, and never alluded to him when she came to see him; nor did she mention the objectionable person.

—It is said that the late Baron JAMES ROTHSCHILD, whose portrait was given in Harper's Weekly of December 5, was worth not less than four hundred millions of dollars, and though he gave magnificent entertainments he was generally mean and very unpopular. Beggars never wasted time by soliciting alms from him. He married the daughter of his brother SOLOMON, and by her had several children.

—Cadet GRANT, or "FRED," as he is called at West Point, is a fair, fresh-skinned boy, with bluish-gray eyes, rather chubby in appearance, and not very brilliant in the way of scholarship, etc. Still he has that bony, massive head and manner of looking steadfastly, like his father, at matter and things, which has made the latter famous.

—LISZT is not dead, although the Paris Siecle started such a report—probably in order to give itself an opportunity to compose a very good epitaph upon him, which might be translated: Here in oblivion deep lies anstere Liszt, Whose music, sad to ten, had ne'er its Austerlitz.

—Last year Queen ISABELLA (who is now not a belle-a), conferred the order of Charles III. upon TAMBERLIK, the great tenor. General PRIM has just made him a Colonel. Whether the Colonel proposes to remain on the stage or take to the sword and buckler is not mentioned.

—Mr. LONGFELLOW's present family consists of two sons, grown, and three bright, charming little daughters. Mr. L. is greatly changed since the sad calamity, some years ago, by which he lost his wife—a lady of the highest culture and refinement. She was accidentally burned to death. Those who remember him in his happy, married life—who recollect the genial exuberance of his spirits, the cheerfulness of his disposition, the warmth of his welcome, the bright wit which flowed constantly, the buoyancy of a soul upon which shone the sunshine of life, and athwart which a cloud never seemed to pass—note with grief the expression of settled melancholy, the love of solitude, and the quickly grown white locks which one sees to-day.

—Emperors, take them as they run, are not the happiest of mortals. For example, there is He of Russia, who rises between five and six in the morning, goes out for a walk, takes a big dog with him, sits down on a stone bench, gazes moodily into vacancy, seldom smiles, wears a faded black suit, and looks more like a gentleman in reduced circumstances than an Emperor. The police generally keep the beggars off the promenade; but occasionally a poor woman steals up to his Majesty, who immediately puts his hand into his vest pocket and gives her a gold piece with a sad smile, but never exchanges a word with any one on the promenade.

—Here is another style of potentate—the young King of Bavaria—a tall youth dressed in gray, with a Panama hat, and said to be, by all odds, the finest young sovereign in Europe. Encountering a schoolmaster with twenty pupils out for a walk, of course hats came off. Telling the teacher to cover his head, and exchanging a few words with one or two of the boys, he said, in a loud voice, "My children, are all of you industrious at school?" The master replied that he was satisfied with the application of his pupils. "Then, Sir," said the King, turning to him, "I hope you will let the boys have a free afternoon to-day." The schoolmaster was only too happy to comply with his Majesty's request; the boys shouted "hurrah!" and the King, bowing and taking off his hat, passed on, humming again and plucking the leaves from his twig. He looked like a student of a German university, rather than the sovereign of nearly five millions people.

Two Mats for Glasses, Bottles, etc.

Fig. 1. MAT OF GRAY CORD.—For this mat first wind the cord round and round in a coil, and overcast it together on the under side. For the trimming on the outer edge run threads of coarse silk through the cord at the distance of an inch apart, by which means loops are formed on each side. Then finish this by cross-stitching thereon a piece of the same cord, after which join the trimming to the mat with point russe stitches of gray silk. The mat is stiffened with pasteboard and lined with oil-cloth.

Fig. 2. CROCHETED MAT OF MIGNARDISE AND BLACK SILK.—For beginning this mat crochet with fine silk five times always 1 sc. (single crochet) in every two loops of the mignardise. Now work the coil in the round, * 1 sc. in the two following loops of the mignardise, 1 sc. in the loop on the former round, 1 ch. (chain). Repeat from . cording to the requirements of the rounding; in the 3d-6th rounds crochet also always 2 ch. after every sc., but after that 3 ch. When the mat has reached the requisite size work a border of the following three rounds: 1st round.—1 sc. in every loop of the mignardise, and between these always 3 ch. 2d round (work these last two rounds with coarser silk).— 1 sc. in the first chain-stitch scallop of the preceding round, 3 ch., then three times alternately put the thread around the needle, take up a loop out of the following chain-stitch scallop. All the loops and threads are worked off together by drawing the thread through once and then through the two loops on the needle, after this 3 ch. Repeat from . 3d round.— 1 sc. in the figure of the former round, 3 ch., out of the two following scallops take up two loops, before each loop put the thread once around the needle. The figures are worked off like those of the former round. Then 3 ch. From * repeat in the round.

and two inches and a half wide. Having finished the frame with the aid of the illustration (the handles are fastened on by means of wire rings crocheted), work with corn-colored silk a straight netted part fifty stitches wide and seventy-two rounds long, and arrange it over the frame in the manner shown by the illustration, fastening the stitches at the ends by crocheting them over a wire ring which is designed to allow the needles to come through. The end stitches at each end of the basket are sewed together so as to bring the net-work above the rings. Sew the edge stitches of the upper edge fast to the upper part of the frame, and work the netting with chenille in the manner shown Knitting-Work Basket.

This pretty little basket is worked in corn-colored silk twist, which is embroidered with light and dark chenille, and is completed by a bag of brown velvet. The foundation consists of a wire frame wound with silk twist. The illustration, Fig. 2, shows the shape of the frame-work. The bottom and the upper part of the frame is six inches long by the illustration. Above the frame set in a brown velvet bag, which is drawn up at the top, and finish the upper edge of the net-work part with a spiral cord, through which is drawn a piece of chenille. Lastly, wind the handles with chenille, and set a chenille rosette on both ends above the rings.

Children's Crocheted Socks.

Fig. 1.—This sock is worked in Tunisian or Afghan crochet stitch with red zephyr wool, and is trimmed with a narrow border of white and black zephyr wool. Begin the sock with the longest row of the foot part, and crochet on a foundation of 7 white, 21 red, and 7 white ch. (chain) in the first round of the first pattern row 7 white, 21 red, and 7 white Tunisian stitches, which are worked off in the 2d round of the pattern row with the corresponding wool, except that the three middle red stitches are worked off as one stitch. Work the 2d-8th pattern rows in the same manner. The red stitches are lessened by two in each row, by which means the foot part is pointed. Next work five pattern rows with white wool, in which also the three middle stitches are always worked off as one stitch. The last of these pattern rows comes on the front edge of the foot; work on each upright vein of a stitch of this pattern row 1 sl. (slip stitch), working off the three middle stitches as one stitch. Now crochet on the other side of the foundation stitches, each side of the middle stitch, which remains without working, the side pieces each singly and fifteen pattern rows long. The 1st pattern row of each side piece consists of 7 white and 10 red stitches (the white stitches must always come on the under edge of the foot), the 2d and 3d pattern rows of 6 white and 10 red stitches, and the remaining pattern rows each of 5 white and 10 red stitches. This narrowing is done by working off two stitches together. Then crochet together the edges on the back of the sock from the under side with sc. (single crochet), join with a sole of suitable size, which is crocheted in sc. with white wool, and trim, as shown by the pattern, with the following border: 1st round (with white wool).—1 sc. in the perpendicular vein of each stitch of the red pattern rows which comes on the white part. 2d round (with white wool).—1 sc. in the first stitch of the former round, then always alternately 4 ch., 1 sc. in the second following sc. 3d round (with black wool).—1 sc. in the first free sc. of the first round, * 4 ch., drop the loop from the needle, then draw it from the back front through the first white chain-stitch scallop, 1 sc. in the second following free sc. of the first round (the chain-stitch scallops are now wound around each other). On the under edge sew the border to the sock. Crochet the ankle in Tunisian stitch as follows: On a foundation of 22 stitches (height of the ankle) work 38 pattern rows, paying attention to the proper shape. Having completed the 38th pattern row, work for the scallops on one side three pattern rows, each of which counts four stitches, and on the last of these rows 3 sl.; always 1 sl. in each of the edge stitches of the short pattern rows, 5 sl. in the following five stitches. Having completed the scallops work the remainder of the border. Sew the scallops down on the straight side and set on little buttons, after which join the ankle and foot has been run along the under side; then work again seven black stitches on the last seven stitches. Work the 9th-14th rounds like the 8th, but in each of these make the red part of the round two stitches longer (in addition to the two stitches widened in the middle), and shorten the black part of the rounds one stitch at each side of the red. The 14th round completes the foot part. Now leave the three middle stitches and crochet on the stitches at each side of these the side pieces each twelve rounds long. In the first four rounds of each side part narrow one stitch on the under part. Then crochet the sock together on the back with single crochet, and work on the upper edge with red wool nine rounds single crochet in the round, in doing which put the needle under the whole stitch, and add one stitch in the back and front middle of the sock by working two stitches in one. Then work on the upper edge a row of scallops with black wool, and on each side two scallops of chain stitches. [See illustration.] Each scallop on the upper edge consists of sc. separated by 3 ch., and worked in second following stitch. After this ornament the sock in the manner shown by the illustration with chain-stitch scallops of white silk and little buttons, and join it to the sole from the under side. The sole is worked with white wool in backward and forward rounds in single crochet, beginning at the toe: always put the needle under the entire stitch. The widening and narrowing is done at the beginning and end of the rounds, and the sole is worked to correspond to the size of the sock.

etc. The flower-twist is worked in satin, quilting, and half-polka stitch. The edge is worked in the same stitches, and lies loosely over the medallion, to which it is fastened only with button-hole stitch. It is worked on another piece of material, and the scalloped edge closely overcast, then cut out and button-hole stitched fast to the medallion. In the illustration the foundation of the cravat is of lace and the application figure of muslin.

Two Embroidery Designs for trimming Cigar-Cases, Port-Folios, etc.

THESE designs may be embroidered on leather, satin, or reps. The middle application part of the design, Fig. 1, is of velvet worked in satin stitch. The edge of the velvet part is fine gold cord, which is sewed down with small cross stitches. The remaining trimming is silk gimp, heavier gold cord, and figures which are worked with colored silk twist. The design, Fig. 2, is worked in satin stitch with silk twist of different colors. The cord is fastened down with cross stitches of light silk. The light spots in the centre of each figure are formed of a stitch of light yellow or white silk twist.

Fig. 1.—Cravat End.—Mignardise and Crochet.

Stand for Gold-Fish Globe.

THE frame-work of this stand consists of two round flat pieces of wood half an inch thick and seven inches in diameter, and a stem eight inches in height and two inches in diameter, which is glued into the round boards, in the centre of which holes of suitable size have been bored partly through. The upper board has also a narrow rim. Below the under board glue a circular piece of pasteboard, the edges of which stand out an inch beyond the board and are covered with green percale. On the upper circular board glue a piece of oil-cloth, and ornament the remaining surface by gumming on grasses, moss, shells, gayly-colored stones, etc. The net is netted with gray thread. On a foundation of ten stitches work in the round, over a mesh two-fifths of an inch in circumference, fifteen rounds, in which widen five stitches at regular distances apart in every third round. Collect the stitches of the last round on a brass wire, wind the ends of the latter together and fasten it to a handle turned of wood, and which is also ornamented with shells and moss in the manner shown by the illustration.

Two Cravat Ends.

THE cravats of which Figs. 1 and 2 each show an end in full size are thirty-two inches long. Fig. 1. Cravat of Mignardise and Crochet.—Crochet with fine cotton as follows in the loops on one side of the mignardise: 1st round.—* 1 sc. (single crochet) in the first loop, six times alternately 3 ch. (chain), 1 sc. in the following loop of the mignardise, pass over the following six loops, and repeat from * till the work is double the desired length of the cravat; then cut off the mignardise and working thread. 2d round.—1 sc. in the middle stitch of each of the following five chain-stitch scallops, after every sc. 4 ch., then * 1 sl. (slip stitch) in the middle stitches of the two chain-stitch scallops in the deep hollow between two scallops of the mignardise 4 ch., 1 sc. in each of the next four chain-stitch scallops, after every sc. 4 ch. From * repeat. Then crochet also in the loops on the other side of the mignardise a round like the first round, and after this a round like the second round, which last is, however, worked only to the middle of the strip. In continuing the second round double the strip together at half its length, and in working every middle one of the successive five chain-stitch scallops fasten to the middle one of the opposite five chain-stitch scallops of the finished half. The ends of the cravat are made in the manner shown by the illustration. Through the middle run green velvet ribbon. [See illustration.]

Fig. 2. CRAVAT IN BRAID AND LACE STITCH. —For making this cravat first draw the design for the braid on stiff paper, sew the narrow white cotton braid on this, and work the button-hole stitch in the manner shown by the illustration. By means of this the braid is joined together. Work two rows; button-hole stitch on the outer edges. This cravat is more quickly made if the braid be sewed on fine lace, which then takes the place of the lace stitch.

Slate Tablet.

See illustration on page 940.

MATERIALS: A piece of slate six inches wide and nine inches long, oil-cloth, Spanish reeds an inch in circumference, brown silk.

A tablet of this kind will be found useful in every house. It is simple, and easily made of cheap materials. The tablet is of slate and the frame of reeds and oil-cloth, arranged in the manner shown by the illustration. For making the tablet take a piece of slate of the dimensions given above and bind the edge with oil-cloth. Lay this binding together at half its width, and ornament both sides in the manner shown by the illustrations, Figs. 2 and 3, with little pieces of reed (which are split off from the reeds) and with brown silk. In gluing on the binding lay a pleat in the corners where no ornament can be arranged. Next split off the reeds four pieces of the requisite length for the inner edge of the frame, cut pieces out where they must cross, and cross stitch them to the edge in the manner shown by the illustration, so that they cover the inner edges of the binding. For the outer edge the reeds are not split; they must be long enough for the ends to extend half an inch beyond the edge of the tablet. The corners are fastened with cross stitches of brown silk, and fastened to the oil-cloth binding. The piece on the upper edge is designed for hanging up the tablets, and is made in the given shape of oil-cloth and reeds. Just above the slate is a piece of oil-cloth arranged for the reception of a slate-pencil. Figs. 2 and 3 give full-sized sections of the tablet.

Gothic Alphabet.

See illustration on page 940.

THE letters of this alphabet are designed for marking pocket-handkerchiefs and under-clothing. They may be worked in satin stitch or in application. In thin materials the letters may also be worked in point croisé. [See the illustrations on page 948.] To work this stitch put the needle in the material as if for the ordinary quilting stitch, and run it under the material diagonally from the parallel lines of the letters and then out again. Now run the needle in again as for ordinary quilting stitch, again diagonally under the stuff toward the first edge and out at the point for the next stitch.

BANK STOCK AND GOVERNMENT BONDS.

"GOOD-AFTERNOON, Sara!—sewing as usual, I see! Such a bright, charming day as this is! I feared I should find you out; but I am tired of walking, so thought I would look in upon you and see how you were; it is an age since we met."

"Yes, indeed, Gerty; why don't you come to see me oftener? You have so few cares upon your shoulders. And now, with baby and three other little ones to work for, my calling days are well-nigh over," said little Mrs. Cole, as she turned her sewing this side and that to see the effect of the pretty pointed trimming she was putting on a polonaise.

Mrs. Marion and Mrs. Cole were cousins, and had lived as intimately as sisters (both being only daughters). They had married about the same time: one, a young physician, just struggling into practice; the other, a lawyer, who stepped into his father's lucrative law business, and with but little exertion on his part possessed a fine income. Dr. Cole had succeeded better than he anticipated when he first settled in Jamestown; but while old Dr. Jones lived there were many families who would not employ him; and it had been a hard struggle for his wife and himself to make both ends meet. The past year he had been more successful; but a rapidly-increasing family called for all the spare cash, and were it not for Mrs. Cole's "faculty" times would have been hard with them.

"What a lovely street suit you are making, Sara—that pointed trimming is so stylish! My dress-maker has nothing so pretty. Where did you pick up the idea?"

"From Harper's Bazar. It is a street suit in one of the last numbers. I cut the pattern, fitted the dress, and made this trimming. The material is one of my old silks that I had ten years ago; indeed, it is a part of my wedding trousseau."

"Is it possible! Why, I have not one dress left in my wardrobe that I had at that time. I have changed them all off with Mrs. Dusseldorf for laces and embroideries, or made silk puffs of them for my beds. Now that the trimming is on, do try on the suit and let me see the effect. It is lovely. My new suit cost seventy-five dollars, and I don't think it is nearly as pretty. I have fringe and satin piping, and I don't know what else, but yours is much more stylish."

"Oh, Gerty, that can't be! Mine is a thick, heavy silk, but rather too glacé for the fashion, yet it answers my purpose. It has cost me only five dollars, which I paid for the satin I used for these points—with my little black satin bonnet it will pass muster, I reckon."

"Oh, let me see the bonnet! Where did you get it? At Clark's? Mine has just come home. Eighteen dollars was the price. Fred says it's no larger than a griddle-cake, but it is a love."

"I made mine from a pattern in the same paper; the materials cost me three dollars. I'll try it on now I have on the dress."

"It is lovely—those perfect forget-me-nots! Why, you look like a girl of twenty in it. And you made it yourself? I read the stories in the Bazar, and look at the pictures, but I can't make anything; should as soon try to build a house as a bonnet. It is really prettier than mine. I heard Mrs. Mason say the other day 'that little Mrs. Cole is growing very extravagant; she dresses her children and herself better than I can afford, and my husband has twice the income of hers.' I reckon I shall tell her how much your dress costs you."

"Do; I dislike to sail under false colors, but I do love pretty things; and when I can with the help of my invaluable friend procure them I would rather not be blamed for them."

"But really, Sara, you do dress Sallie very stylishly. Her summer dress must have cost you a pretty penny; it was prettier than my Gracie's, and I gave twenty-five dollars for hers."

"I am glad you liked the dress. It was one of my wedding dresses, and of such a soft, pretty Maltese color that I put it aside for the children when I could wear it no longer. Trimmed with apple-green, it was pretty, I thought; but all the dress cost me was three dollars. I cut the pattern from the Bazar, fitted the polonaise and dress, and felt well paid for my trouble."

"Is it possible that you made that dress; the prettiest in Jamestown! Her hat was beautiful—the soft dew-drop tulle matched the trimming of the dress so perfectly. For that you must have paid high."

"Just two dollars and a half. I made the frame from a pattern in my pet paper and trimmed it according to the directions given."

"You are a sprite, Sara; your fingers have the fairy gift. But you must have purchased Jamie's pretty dress he now wears, I declare. Willie came home quite out of sorts with his fall suit, for which I had just paid fifteen dollars."

"You will laugh when I tell you that I made the whole of it, even to the cap, from patterns I cut from the Bazar. The material was my old tricot beaver cloak, which I had ten years ago. It was full enough to cut Jamie's suit, and a basquine for Sallie this winter, which I have just finished and will show you. I found the pattern in my treasury, as I call the Bazar."

"A treasury indeed! but I can't make any thing out of those criss-cross lines all run into one another. Rosamond's labyrinth could not have been more intricate."

"I purchase large sheets of printing-paper at the printing-office, then with the help of this little tracing-wheel I draw the patterns as easily as a child traces pictures. Each pattern has its own peculiar lines, and there is not the slightest difficulty in tracing them. I could draw all on one sheet in less than an hour."

"Well, it surpasses my comprehension. I don't believe there is another woman living who can obtain as much material aid from the paper as you do."

"Indeed, you are mistaken, Gerty; it is the greatest blessing to thousands of homes. It must be as manna in the desert in the far-off country-places, where Dame Fashion rarely shows her face; and yet every true woman desires to beautify herself and her children, and until this most desirable paper was established knew not how to do so. Stay to tea, dear Gerty; it is long since you have been here: and when Jamie returns from school he shall go to the office and bring Fred, and Sallie will go for Gracie. Let's have a family party."

"I can't say no to such an attractive invitation; besides I wish Fred to see the wonders you have performed with your valued friend's aid. Truth to tell, dear Sara, Fred has asked if my cousin was not a little extravagant this past year. I have indignantly denied the charge, and yet have wondered whence the source of all your prettinesses."

"The mystery is solved now, and had not you been too much engaged with traveling hither and thither this past summer to find time to spend even one afternoon with me, it would have been no mystery. All my sewing nowadays comes from the Bazar. All baby's clothes were made from it, all Sallie's, Jamie's, and Kate's; and I wear nothing but boots and gloves that is not made from its patterns."

"You should add hoop-skirts to the catalogue of unmakables."

"No, indeed; I can make from a pattern as good a hoop-skirt as I can buy."

"That goes beyond my belief; but I noticed your dress hung perfectly, so I suppose I shall be convinced eventually that you can even exceed 'the Ventilating Gossamer Hoop-Skirt Company.'"

"Suppose you come into the kitchen with me while I stir up some rusks for tea. Bridget does not succeed well in their manufacture. Wait till I bring my cooking-apron."

"Where did you pick up that pretty apron? How effectually it covers your dress! There's one trouble with these tightly-gored dresses, they soil so quickly; and that tasty white apron trimmed with black braid protects the dress and makes you look very pretty. I must have one."

"This also came from the same inexhaustible source. You see I require no pins to keep up the bib; bones run into casings on the under side hold it up nicely, and don't endanger baby's fair hands. Then it buttons behind low down on the skirt. It is the best apron I ever saw."

"I shall certainly have my sewing-girl make one for me, and wear it at breakfast. Let me see that fascinating breakfast-cap that hangs there." (Mrs. Marion had followed Mrs. Cole into her bedroom.) "That's lovely!—positively charming! I must put it on. Now you need never tell me that this did not first see light in New York."

"The Jamestown milliners furnished all the materials, and they cost a dollar and a half. I made it before baby came, knowing I should like a pretty cap. But I think I was a little extravagant."

"Extravagant! A dollar and a half! Why, Sara, I paid ten dollars for one in New York not any prettier. So the Bazar furnished the pattern for that? It is incredible!"

"We must not loiter here, or Fred will have no hot cakes for tea."

Soon the cakes were made. Sponge-cake was rapidly prepared. The children were sent on their errands. Dr. Cole returned, delighted to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Marion to his tea-table. He had had a long, wearying ride, and retired to his dressing-room to refresh himself. As he returned he said, "Gerty, I thought you would excuse me if I wore my 'fatigue coat' and slippers. I have been visiting patients, with but little rest, since six this morning."

"Certainly; but let me see that coat. Fred, is not that army-blue flannel, lined with red and faced and quilted with silk, very handsome? Now, Dr. Cole, I can charge you with extravagance."

"Indeed! how so? Sara made this coat out of one of my army over-coats." (He, like so many other of our young surgeons, had served through the war.) "Thrown aside, moth-eaten, and discolored, it was rejuvenated in some way; and now nightly adds to my comfort."

"But the tailor cut it? Surely your friend did not supply the pattern of this?"

"Yes, it did. I saw the pattern—remembered the old coat—ripped it—had it washed—purchased a new lining; my piece drawer furnished the silk facing, my machine did the quilting. I made it without the doctor's having the least suspicion of what I was doing, and presented it to him on the tenth anniversary of our wedding-day."

"Now, Fred, could you believe it? You know we have thought our dear cousins had found the goose that laid the golden egg. But no; they take the Bazar, and thence their riches."

"I am astonished, my dear Sara," said Mr. Marion. "I have indeed wondered at the changed appearance of your family, but supposed that the doctor's practice had increased so much that it justified the liberal expenditure you seemed to indulge in, and I rejoiced for you. I knew not that you had obtained the aid of such a good fairy, or that you possessed so much of that God-given faculty which enables a woman to be indeed a help-mate."

"A help-mate!" exclaimed Dr. Cole. "I call Sara and the Bazar my bank-stock and government bonds, and think they have increased my income as much as five thousand dollars of the aforesaid stocks could add to it."

"Oh, Sara!" said Gerty, "so you are equal to five thousand dollars in stocks. I wish I could hear such a valuation attached to my name."

"Don't think, Gerty, that Sara's value can be reckoned by stocks or bonds. The wisest of wise men tells us 'that she is far above rubies.'"

THE MYSTIC GARDEN.

By EDOUARD LABOULAYE.

Translated from the Author's Manuscript by Miss Mary L. Booth.

INTRODUCTION.

ONE day as I was sauntering, according to my old habit, along the streets of Paris, I spied on a second-hand book-stand a little quarto volume, bound in parchment. The singular appearance of this book attracted me, and for half a dollar I purchased this treasure, which, had it not been for my curiosity, ran a great risk of remaining eternally forgotten in the dust, where it had long been slumbering.

This precious quarto turned out to be a Hebrew book, translated into Spanish, the work of one of those numerous rabbis who brought to Europe and spread there the tales, or what amounts to the same thing, the wisdom of the East.

The title of this book, written in Hebrew, was Sepher Hanhagat Zachazzin; this was followed by the Spanish translation, Regimienta de la Vida, or, On the Government of Life, a book of great erudition and lofty doctrine, added the translators, and in which, as in a mirror of crystal, every man could see and correct his faults by thus making use of this fleeting life in seeking to become worthy of eternal glory. This work had been composed by the most eminent and virtuous rabbi, Mosseh Almosrino, and appeared for the first time in Spanish through the industry of Samuel Mendes de Sola, Joseph Siprat Gabay, and Judah Piza. When I have said that the volume was printed at Amsterdam, in the year of the world 5489, I shall have finished the description.

I have no intention of analyzing this work, in which the ethics of Aristotle and those of the Bible are mixed and confounded together in a more or less happy manner; this task would have little attraction for my young readers. Besides, I own frankly that what I looked for in the book were the tales, apologues, and maxims which usually abound in Rabbinical treatises, written in imitation of the Talmud. The most eminent and virtuous Mosseh Almosrino had had the good sense to follow the beaten track. In the Government of Life I found an apologue which has all the austerity and dignity of Judaic morality. I translated it, and think that it will be read with pleasure. This transparent fable will tell more than all my words; it will show what grand ideas filled the minds of that people whom Europe disdained without reason, and persecuted without pity.

I will now let the old Rabbi take up the discourse.

THE MYSTIC GARDEN.

OUR sages have left us a very ancient story, but one worthy of perpetual remembrance. Once upon a time, as they say, there lived an exceedingly powerful, wise, and just King. This King had caused a law to be published throughout his dominions, declaring that no reward, office, or dignity should be given to any save those who had merited it by serving the King or the republic, and that it should be in conformity to the merit of each.

In the course of time there were born at court three children, all of royal blood. All three grew up rich in virtue and talent, handsome, well-made, amiable, and beloved and esteemed by every one. The King, who loved them greatly, and who desired to give them a position suited to their merit, said to them one day: "My children, I would gladly confer on you all possible honor and good; I would gladly set you in a higher place than any who are in my palace, because you have found favor in my sight; but all my people know, and you know likewise, that there is a law in my kingdom which I can not violate. I can not confer either honor or office on any one save in reward for service rendered; it is not therefore by staying at court that you can gain the rank which I design for you. Go, I counsel you, explore the whole kingdom, and strive to deserve by your exploits the prize which the King promises, and which I desire to give you. When I recall you, you will return to court; until then take note of all that you do, for whatever is your merit such shall be your reward."

The three young men felt great regret at leaving court; but the King spoke, and it was necessary to obey. All three, therefore, took leave of the Prince and embarked with a fair wind, leaving to fortune the care of guiding them.

They were already at a great distance from court when they landed on an island, which, viewed from the sea, had appeared to them fertile and smiling. In the midst of the island they discovered a beautiful garden filled with fruit; but on approaching it three keepers came out to meet them, and, while permitting them to enter, each gave them a piece of advice.

The first keeper said to them that they must not think to remain always in this garden. The time would come when they would be forced to quit it. None who had been before them in this abode had been able to continue there. Such was the rule; some came in and others went out.

The second keeper bid them engrave on their memory the fact that they would go out of this garden such as they had come into it. They were free to enjoy all that they found within the walls; no one would disturb them; but on their departure they were strictly forbidden to carry any thing away with them.

The third keeper advised them to be moderate in their inclinations and pleasures, and to do nothing but what was good and honest, adding that this conduct would greatly aid them in preserving life.

After listening to these wise counsels the three youths entered the garden. It was even richer and more beautiful than they had deemed it from without. They found there an abundance of fruit-laden trees, plants, and flowers as pleasant to the smell as to the sight. Nightingales warbled in the shade of giant oaks; clouds of birds charmed the senses by their melodious concerts; and running streams diffused freshness and life every where.

The joy of the three comrades needs no description. They ate of the luscious fruits, they drank of the sweet waters; they reposed in the shade of the leafy trees, listening to the nightingales, while the breeze gently stirred the foliage and wafted to them the penetrating fragrance of the blossoms.

After a little time they separated; each had chosen the part of the garden that pleased him best.

Allured by the beauty of the fruits and the coolness of the waters, the first of the three young men thought only of enjoying what he found ready at hand. To eat, drink, sleep, lead a joyous life, and be troubled about nothing; such was his only thought. He wholly forgot the counsels that had been given him by the third keeper.

Neither the fruits nor the flowers had allured the second of the youths. He had found in a corner, and in plenty, gold, silver, and precious stones. Dazzled by these treasures, he thought only of possessing himself of them. He cut up his clothing into bags to hold all these riches. Wholly absorbed in this idea, he neither ate, drank, nor slept. As to using the garden and its pleasures, he never gave it a moment's thought, forgetting what the second keeper had told him—that he must enjoy all that he found in the garden, and not attempt to hoard it, for he could carry nothing away with him.

The third had engraved on his memory all that the three keepers had told him; therefore he did not follow his companions. The path which each of them had chosen appeared to him dangerous and wicked; it was not what they had been taught. This young man then used the garden and its pleasures, but only so far as was necessary to sustain life. He employed his time in studying this abode and what it contained; in observing its fruits, its flowers, its animals, and their prodigious diversity; in seeking out the properties of each plant he marveled at the perpetual miracle of Nature; in following the water-courses, so well distributed that from step to step, and from field to field, there was not a blade of grass that was not watered. He never grew weary of contemplating that incredible order which set every thing in its place. What added to his astonishment was that in this well-regulated garden no gardener was to be seen. But reflection soon told him that such perfect order could not be an accident, and that there was certainly somewhere an exceeding wise gardener, an invisible Master, who ruled over this beautiful domain. Each day added to his admiration—each day added to his desire to know the Master of the garden. He sought him every where, and without ever having seen him he loved him for all the pleasure that had been given him by the sight and study of so many marvels.

While each of the three young men was thus pursuing his way with perfect freedom, behold there came a slave of the King, bringing them an order to return instantly to court in order to render an account of their lives. All three set out, and reached the gate by which they had entered. But scarcely had the first, he who had thought only of his pleasure, passed through it when he felt himself affected by the change of air, and no longer having the fruits of the garden to sustain him his belly burst, his strength abandoned him, and he fell to the ground and died.

The second dragged himself slowly along, laden like a beast of burden. The hope of one day enjoying his treasure made him forget his fatigue; but on reaching the garden gate the keepers, astonished to see him thus loaded, seized him and rudely stripped him of his booty, without suffering him to carry any thing away. The wretched man burst into tears and groans, all his labor and pains had led him only to misery and despair.

On hearing the voice of the messenger who summoned him by the King's order, the third had felt a lively joy. The Master whom he had not seen he would doubtless find outside of the garden, and he could at last express to him all his gratitude and love. Besides, he had not offended him; far from that; he had done every thing to know his will and obey him. It was therefore with a heart full of hope, and without burdening himself with any thing on the way, that the youth hastened to the garden gate; he was well received there by the keepers, who were glad to see with what alacrity he obeyed the commands of the King.

On approaching the court the one that had been stripped of his treasure was so weary and wretched that he could no longer stand on his feet. It was in vain that he cried out that he was of royal blood, no one believed his words. Still more, the slaves of the King, indignant that such a beggar should dare call himself the King's kinsman, thrust him from the door of the palace and cast him into a narrow cell, where he had full time to expiate his faults.

In proportion as this wretch was ill treated so well was his companion received. All the court nobles went out to meet him. They embraced him warmly, and accompanied him to do him honor to the hall where the King was seated. At the sight of this youth so light and active the King was rejoiced, and, though nothing was hidden from him, he asked the new-comer what he had been doing since he saw him last.

The young man related to the King all the beautiful and grand things he had remarked in the delicious garden where he had lived; adding, "I am sure now that this garden has a Master of excellent wisdom. This Master can not be far off, though he takes delight in concealing himself, and it is my sole desire to express to him all the gratitude and love with which I have been inspired by the sight of his works."

The King made answer: "Since you have so well employed your life I will grant your wish. I am the Master of this garden; I rule it from here through my ministers. There is not an insect so small, nor a blade of grass so humble, that it has not its servant to care for it and make it grow."

On seeing and hearing all this, the blessed youth felt the love that he bore his Master increase more and more. He tasted infinite joy in knowing him, and dwelt thenceforth at court with all the honor that he deserved.

MORAL.

The signification of this tale, continues the old Rabbi, is easily discerned. The King is the Supreme Creator and the Sovereign Ruler over all things. The garden is the world; the three youths represent the three kinds of men that are found on earth. The one seeks naught but pleasure; the second pursues fortune; the third loves only good, which is the true end of man. That the three young men are of royal blood is that they belong to Israel, the chosen people of God. As to the counsels of the three keepers, we know that they are true. The first is God's own words to Adam, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return;" the second is the saying of Job, "Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither;" lastly, the third is that great saying of Moses, our master in Israel, appointed by God, "I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live." And does not this mean that life consists in doing good, and death in doing evil? Whoever considers well these sayings, and bears them always in his memory, will never be mistaken concerning the right path; he will find the road that leads to everlasting rest. Set this example before you, therefore, as a mirror. And now may God, in his infinite mercy, grant you his grace; and mayest thou obtain peace in this world and glory in the world to come! Amen!

ROASTING, BROILING, FRYING, BREADING.

ROASTING.

THE first consideration to roast properly is to have a well and evenly lighted fire, which should never be allowed to get low, but must constantly be replenished with coals, added in such a way as not to deaden it. It stands to reason that, if the fire is not kept up, no stated length of time can be fixed for cooking.

Avoid all draughts between the fire and screen; a joint subjected to such a draught would take much longer to cook.

The fire should be thoroughly lighted before the roast is put before it. Put 2 gills of broth in the dripping-pan for basting; large joints, poultry, and game, should be basted five or six times during cooking; partridges and small game, three times.

To roast the following joints the time required will be: For a piece of beef, weighing 7 pounds, an hour and three-quarters; for a leg of mutton, weighing 7 pounds, an hour and a half; for a neck or loin of veal, weighing 3 pounds, fifty minutes; for a neck or loin of pork, weighing 3 pounds, fifty minutes; for a turkey, weighing about 8½ pounds, an hour and three-quarters; for a small turkey, weighing about 3½ pounds, forty-five minutes; for a goose, weighing about 6 pounds, an hour and a half; for a capon, weighing about 4 pounds, fifty minutes; for a fowl, weighing about 3 pounds, half an hour; for a pigeon, a quarter of an hour; for a pheasant, thirty-five minutes; for a partridge or woodcock, a quarter of an hour; for larks, six minutes, before a brisk fire; for a duck, a quarter of an hour; the same time for a wild duck; for a leveret, half an hour; for a hare's back, half an hour; for a small wild rabbit, a quarter of an hour.

I need not point out that these rules of time required for cooking will, of course, be modified by circumstances; there are different natures and qualities of meat, which cook more or less rapidly. It will always be necessary to ascertain whether a joint is done before taking it off the spit; the easiest way to find this out is, in the case of meat, to press the fleshiest parts with the finger; in the case of poultry and game, the flesh of the leg should be tested; if the cooking is perfect, both will give way to the finger; if not, there will be a certain degree of resistance.

BROILING.

To broil with charcoal: make a layer of charcoal, cinders, and lighted embers, covering a surface extending 2 inches beyond the edges of the horizontal gridiron. The thickness of lighted coal should be 1½ inch for a brisk fire, and 1 inch for a slow fire; in either case the embers should be thoroughly and equally lighted, and not in parts dead and at others burning brightly. It is a mistake to seek to economize fuel in broiling; the result will most probably be—inefficient cooking, and, perhaps, entire spoiling of the meat.

It is general to set up the gridiron on a cast-iron slab, or on the plate covering the stove. A rump steak, trimmed, weighing 1½ pound, will require eight to ten minutes, according to thickness, to broil on a brisk fire; a fillet steak, trimmed, weighing 7 ounces, will require seven minutes to broil on a brisk fire; a mutton-chop, trimmed, weighing on the average 5 ounces, will require six minutes to broil on a brisk fire; a bread-crumbed mutton cutlet should be broiled on a slow fire, and left one minute longer; a sheep's kidney will require four minutes to broil on a brisk fire; a veal chop, trimmed, weighing 7 ounces, will require nine minutes to broil on a brisk fire; a pork chop of the same weight will require the same time; a bread-crumbed veal or pork cutlet should be broiled on a slow fire, and left on two minutes longer.

FRYING.

Fat is the best for frying; the light-colored dripping of roast meat and the fat taken off broth are to be preferred. These failing, beef suet chopped fine, and melted down on a slow fire, without browning, will do very well. When the bottom of the stew-pan can be seen through the suet, it is sufficiently melted. Let it cool for a quarter of an hour, and strain through the gravy strainer; to do this while too hot would be likely to melt the strainer.

When butter is used for frying, it requires special care, and, on account of its heating quicker than fat, calls for a slow fire. Oil may also be used for frying, but requires careful handling; it should be warmed first, for at least twenty-five minutes, on a very slow fire, so as to prevent its rising and boiling over. Lard is also extensively employed; but I am no advocate for it, as it always leaves an unpleasant coating of fat on whatever is fried in it.

Fat may be kept in use for frying until it assumes a dark brown color, which is a sign of its uselessness, for then it will no longer fry well, and will impart a bad color and unpleasant taste.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR FRYING.

The fat should vary in heat according to the nature of the things to be fried: too great a degree of heat should be avoided in all cases. This excessive heat is indicated by the smoke rising from the kettle.

The different degrees of heat may be determined by throwing into the fat a small piece of crumb of bread of the size of a nut; if it fizzes and produces at once large air-bubbles, the fat has reached that degree of heat which we shall designate as hot fat. For warm fat, the piece of bread should produce very small air-bubbles, accompanied by scarcely any fizzing.

Should too many things be put in the frying-kettle together they will be badly fried; for instance, if five fish were put together in a kettle only large enough for three, there would not be sufficient heat to cook them properly. In such a case the fish should be taken out when three parts done, the fat then made very hot, and three fish put in again for two minutes; when these are taken out the other two should be put in for the same length of time. This will remedy the evil of crowding too many fish in the kettle at once.

Fried things should be of a light golden-brown color, crisp, and free from fat.

FRYING BATTER.

Frying batter is used for meat, fish, and sweet dishes. To make it, 4½ ounces of flour, 2 eggs, and 2 table-spoonfuls of oil will be required. Sift the flour through a sieve into a basin; make a hole in the centre, and pour in 1 gill of water; add a small pinch of salt, the 2 yolks of eggs (reserving the whites for whipping), and the 2 spoonfuls of oil; work into a smooth paste, thick enough to cover the spoon with a coating of about ¼ of an inch; should it be too thick, a gill, or half a gill, of water may be added. Twenty minutes before using the batter add the whites of egg well whisked, and put by for frying purposes.

BREADINGS AND RASPIINGS.

For breading, use beaten eggs, oil, and the crumb of stale bread. Put the bread in a cloth, of which take up the four corners in one hand, and with the other, rub the bread to break it up small, then pass it through a wire sieve, dry in the oven, and put by in a closed box for use. For breading, the eggs should be well beaten and mixed together; to 3 eggs, add 1 table-spoonful of oil, 1 table-spoonful of water, a pinch of salt, and a small pinch of pepper. The water is added to prevent the breading being too thick.

Raspiings are made with crusts of bread, baked to a bright golden color, then crushed with a rolling-pin or in a mortar; passed through a wire sieve, and put by in a box for use.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

PERHAPS there is nothing more annoying, and even distressing, to a person of kindly feelings, than the constant appeal for "pennies" made in our streets by wretched-looking specimens of humanity. Impulse says "give," but judgment bids you refrain. You steel your heart against the importunities of the ragged child, whom you know to be systematically "starving" every day at the corner of that street, or some other—and walk on. But notwithstanding what judgment says, you are conscious that feelings which are warm and generous have been repressed—you are conscious of an uneasy sensation, and find yourself mentally querying whether by any chance that particular little beggar might not honestly be in need of bread to eat. Many wise and benevolent persons, who have carefully considered the subject, refuse to give to street beggars on principle. It is well known that a very large proportion of these miserable-looking creatures are professional beggars—asking charity day after day, because they would rather do that than any honest work. And yet they are allowed to infest our streets.

Not long ago the New York Tribune related an incident, which had been proved to be a fact. A poor woman, with a placard over her bosom announcing her blindness, sat in Broadway one day soliciting pennies. By-and-by a drunken sailor came up to her, and with rude words kicked her in the side, whereat she began to cry piteously. All the passers-by united to comfort her, and bestowed alms liberally. One person, however, happened to witness the performance of this little farce by the same persons three times in the course of the day—at different points on the street. His curiosity was excited, and he watched the result. At dark a little girl carefully led the "blind" woman away; but after reaching one of the cross-streets they separated, and the woman tucked her placard of blindness under her arm, and went on alone without difficulty. Presently she entered a low class liquor store, where she was greeted by the "drunken sailor" who had assaulted her during the day. Soap and water restored the blind eyes in a marvelously short time, and together they discussed their day's work over their glasses of liquor.

The knowledge of facts like this should not prevent the charitable from giving—only it should be done judiciously. There are in this great city multitudes of destitute families, whose needs may be ascertained by a little personal painstaking; and there are many benevolent institutions who will gladly receive money, provisions, or clothing, and we may be sure that whatever is committed to their trust will be sacredly devoted to the necessities of the poor.

A singular incident recently occurred in the vicinity of Louisville. A few miles from the city lives a farmer extensively engaged in raising honey-bees. He owned forty-five hives, and the little workers had been industriously laying in stores for the winter. One morning the farmer found to his utter astonishment that every bee had disappeared; not a solitary one was left. He was in a dilemma, and investigated the matter. He learned that every hive within a circuit of twenty-five miles had been deserted at the same time. All the hives contained a large quantity of honey, and the cause of this mysterious migration is unsolved.

Doctors in Madrid, according to a new work on Spain, are not worth much. A party of travelers, stopping in that city, called a physician to prescribe for a child. He owned he could make nothing out of the patient; thought the disease was the gout, but it might be, and probably was, something else. It was agreed to call two other physicians at a consultation. At the appointed hour the three men arrived, all dressed in the deepest mourning and smoking cigars. It was a sight to frighten the strongest invalid, and to send a timid one into fits. Between puffs and spitting they each delivered their opinion, which was worth as much as the smoke that came from their mouths. They all agreed that it might be one thing or might be another, and then they took their departure, and with them each two hundred reals.

A little colored girl, between four and five years old, was beaten to death, about two weeks ago in Indianapolis, by the woman with whom she lived.

With the cold weather hot chestnut sellers have appeared in numerous sections of the city. Every few blocks one comes across a compact establishment, where, over a brilliant coal-fire, quarts of nuts are daily roasted. Now and then the sagacious dealer lifts the cover to turn his chestnuts, and let out upon cold passers-by a gush of warmth and fragrance. A wonderful number of chestnuts are eaten in France. In Paris their disguises are numerous, from turkey-stuffing to the delicate sweetmeat called marron glacé. In Lyons elegant little pavilions are erected for the accommodation of the hot chestnuts, and have a pleasing effect in the streets. In the Cevennes Mountains they were the staff of life until the middle of the present century; for, from the nature of the soil, the peasants could grow but little corn, and only ate bread on Sundays and fêtes, and not always then. "What do you eat on week-days?" was asked of a little peasant of the mountains. "Chestnuts, Monsieur." "And what do you eat on Sunday?" "I eat a few more." Madame de Sévigné calls chestnuts the triumph of Brittany, and describes herself sitting in the midst of endless baskets of them. "I am boiling some," she writes, "roasting others, filling my pockets with more, and trying to find a Brittany dish in which they do not appear."

The King of Siam, whose death recently occurred, was born in 1806, and properly should have succeeded his father. But his rights were usurped by his brother, and Chao Pha Mong-kout did not begin his reign until 1856. He was a man of unusual intelligence, possessed a good knowledge of several of the ancient and modern languages, and wrote and spoke English fluently. He introduced into his kingdom many national reforms.

A few weeks ago a wealthy lady of Chicago issued six hundred invitations for a reception. The occasion was the fiftieth anniversary of her husband's coming to Chicago, as well as their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary. The invitations were gotten up in the highest style of the art, and had engraved upon them "No presents received." Nothing was spared to make this reception one of the most brilliant ever given in the metropolis of the West. "Silver weddings," and other anniversaries of the wedding-day, might be very delightful occasions if the custom of giving presents, which has become so foolishly and oppressively universal, were restricted or abandoned.

The latest novelty in the book line is a work—which the Saturday Review has sagaciously discovered—to prove that woman is not a human being! The author calls himself "Attila," and is said to be an American. He probably prefers to write anonymously, that he may enjoy his honors with becoming modesty. He shows, evidently to his own satisfaction, not only the utter inferiority of woman, but that there is evidence in the Bible that for woman there will be no hereafter, and that she will have no part in the glories of heaven, which are designed for human beings!

A recently-published pamphlet discusses the question whether women who have entered the medical profession shall not be called "Doctors." It is argued that the term is definite and grammatical.

In a recent lecture on "Mental Dyspepsia" a comparison was drawn between the physical effect of unwholesome diet, rapid eating, and want of proper exercise, and the mental effect of reading every thing, reading rapidly, and allowing the mind no time to digest its food. No young person should be actuated by the foolish pride of having read every thing. He should learn to discriminate between the worthless and the good, and reject every work not calculated to improve and elevate his mind. The reading of the trashy, sensational books, does not conduce to the improvement of individuals or society, mentally or morally. A reform in the reading habits of the age does not necessarily require novels to be discarded, for fiction is sometimes made the vehicle for great moral truths; but those works which tend to create and keep alive a morbid taste should be tabooed forever. The reading of inferior books weakens and contracts the mind, which for its true development needs vigorous exercise no less than the limbs of the body require to be employed in order to wax stout and strong.

"There is nothing more disagreeable," remarked a lady the other day, "than to sit in a car opposite a man who chews tobacco—and spits. No matter if the window next him is open—he never thinks of disposing of any extra tobacco-tinctured saliva through that avenue. No, he spits upon the floor, if he hits his mark; but you ride in perpetual fear that he is not a good marksman, and that your dress will be contaminated. Again and again he fires his shot, seemingly within half an inch of your garments. You instinctively shrink into the smallest compass, and find yourself involuntarily estimating the brief time elapsing between the salutes. Usually it varies from thirty to forty-five seconds—often enough to keep you in any thing but a pleasant frame of mind."

Lemons and sugar are strongly recommended to feverish invalids by Hall's Journal of Health. Two or three lemons a day may be taken with decided benefit. A lemon or two, according to the above-mentioned authority, taken with sugar as an entire substitute for supper, would give many a man a comfortable night's sleep and an awaking of rest and invigoration, with an appetite for breakfast to which they are strangers who will have their regular supper.

OUR MINISTERS' DONATION PARTY.

EUGENIE, EMPRESS OF THE FRENCH.

VERY few ladies who have played a prominent part in modern history have more reason to complain of the fickleness of public opinion than the present Empress of the French. When Napoleon the Third, fifteen years ago, married Eugénie de Montijo, the young Empress, guiltless as she was of the bloody events by which the Republic had been overthrown, conquered all hearts, and it was generally believed that her should have consented to seat herself on a throne whose speedy downfall they predicted in the most positive manner. The young hotspurs of the Quartier Latin hated and denounced the Empire and Emperor, but paid homage to the Empress. In a word, if the Emperor had a great many implacable enemies, and was personally exceedingly unpopular in Paris, the popularity of the Empress was very great, and even the sternest adversaries of imperialism entertained for her none of that hatred with which they looked upon all the other leading representatives of the Second Empire.

applause. Even many of the leading Bonapartists are bitterly hostile to her, and have no hesitation in declaring that the unpopularity of the Empress is calculated to endanger the stability of the Empire.

What has brought about this singular change? In answering this interesting and important question (important inasmuch as it may sooner or later exercise a decisive influence upon the destinies of a great empire) we should beware of paying too much attention to the different and often contradictory ways in which most of the friends and adversaries of the Empress, according to the of course, not in the narrow sense in which it is understood by the inhabitants of the Faubourg St. Antoine, who, in alluding to the Spanish descent of her Majesty, intend to say that she is bigoted, despotic, and in favor of political and spiritual oppression. But, although she is by no means of pure Spanish descent, and has now sat so long on the French throne that she even speaks her mother tongue with a very perceptible French accent, she is in every respect as much an Espagnole as if all her ancestors on both sides had been Spaniards, and as if she had passed her presence by the side of Napoleon the Third would do much toward reconciling the better classes of French society to the resurrection of the Empire. Whenever she appeared in public she was received with the most flattering manifestations of popular favor, and the acclamations which greeted her husband on such occasions were feeble and tame as compared with the enthusiasm which her appearance never failed to excite. The very Legitimists in the salons of the Faubourg St. Germain, who never tired of expressing their contempt for the parvenu court in the Tuileries, did not venture to attack the Empress, but deplored only that so charming and graceful a lady

The fifteen years which have elapsed since that time have brought about a marked change in this respect. The Empress has now more enemies and less popularity than the Emperor. Her influence as a leader of fashion has long since been on the wane. In the salons of the Bourbonists and Orleanists she is only mentioned with shrugs and expressions of derision; and, as the Parisians of 1789 called Marie Antoinette "L'Autrichienne," so the Democrats of the French capital angrily and menacingly speak of their Empress as "L'Espagnole." The acclamations which once greeted her on all occasions have died away: official enthusiasm has taken the place of popular political and social stand-point which they occupy, try to account for her undeniable and growing unpopularity, but rather view and examine her character and peculiarities as a whole, and draw our conclusions accordingly. We shall then discover that both her detractors and her official eulogists are in many respects very wide from the truth.

Strange to say, that scornful appellation, "L'Espagnole," which the lower classes of the capital now bestow upon the Empress, characterizes her in a more striking manner than the most elaborate portraits which her ablest literary flatterers or enemies have drawn of her, though, whole life on the banks of the Guadalquivir. Devout, but exceedingly superstitious; generous and kind-hearted, but irascible and vindictive; fickle in her friendships, but constant in her hatred and slow to forgive; whimsical and easily prejudiced; extremely jealous in every sense of the word; endowed with a great deal of natural grace and affability, but too naïve; proud, and yet often lamentably wanting in dignity; charitable and compassionate, but extravagant and often frivolous; a very bad actress and still worse politician; fond of flattery, and destitute of penetration: such is the Empress Eugénie.

Like Josephine, Eugénie is on very bad terms with nearly all the members of her husband's family, and her quarrels with them have no doubt contributed much toward her unpopularity. Previous to the Emperor's marriage the Princess Mathilde, a very good-natured and easy lady, neither jealous nor over-punctilious in questions of etiquette, had presided over his court, and, it can not be denied, admitted to it many persons who did not add to its character and dignity. The young Empress closed the doors of the Tuileries against all persons of this description, among whom was also Marie Bonaparte Wyse, Princess de Solms, now Madame Rattazzi. This eccentric lady, with whom her cousin, the Emperor, had always been on friendly terms, had just written her first novel, and, believing that, as a member of the Bonaparte family, she would be as cordially treated by the Empress as by her husband, she begged leave of Eugénie to present the book to her at a special audience. The reply was a very stiff refusal to accept the book and to grant the audience. This incensed Mlle. Wyse exceedingly, and she immediately commenced that series of malicious but witty attacks on the Empress which, shortly after her marriage to M. de Solms, led to her expulsion from Paris, and caused the Emperor to deprive her of the pension which had heretofore been paid to her from the imperial exchequer. The quarrel has been going on for fifteen years, and Madame Rattazzi, as is shown by her latest works, which abound in sarcastic allusions to her imperial enemy, keeps it up with as much bitterness as ever. The extreme jealousy of the Empress led frequently to very unpleasant scenes between her and the Princess Mathilde, owing to an amusing account which the latter had given in 1856, at a dinner party in the Tuileries, of the awkwardness with which Prince Louis Napoleon had many years ago proposed to her at Trieste. The Emperor laughed immoderately, but the Empress frowned, and for years afterward treated Mathilde Demidoff with the greatest coldness. A sort of armed neutrality now prevails between the two ladies. The Princess Bacciocchi, a lady of remarkable firmness of character and great penetration, was compelled to withdraw from the imperial court in consequence of certain strictures she had made on the conduct of the Empress at the time of Eugénie's so-called flight to Scotland. The Empress professes to be much attached to the Princess Clotilde, whom, in public, she always overwhelms with marks of affection; but her Majesty's enemies assert that, at heart, she is envious of the fine family of children that the daughter of Victor Emanuel has given to her husband. The latter, Prince Napoleon, is the great adversary of the Empress. Passionately as she loves her son, and ardently as she desires to see him one day seated on the French throne, she hates and fears the fat and jolly prince as one of the most formidable rivals of the Prince Imperial. The war between Eugénie and Jerome's son first broke out openly a few days before the French troops took the Malakoff. During the first years of her wedded life, strange as it may seem, she longed for nothing so much as to be recognized and treated on a footing of equality by the Queen of Spain. She seriously annoyed the Emperor by her incessant efforts to ingratiate herself with Isabella the Second, and Napoleon had repeatedly left Biarritz very abruptly to prevent the Empress from making excursions into Spain for the purpose of meeting the Queen at St. Sebastian. Isabella, on her part, treated her former subject for some time quite haughtily; but O'Donnell finally persuaded her to invite the Empress to visit Madrid; this invitation filled Eugénie with the utmost delight, and she had almost succeeded in persuading the Emperor to give his consent to her trip to Spain when Prince Napoleon represented to his imperial cousin the injurious political effects which such an interview would produce, and the Emperor decided that the Empress should not go to Madrid. She was extremely irritated at Prince Napoleon's interference on this occasion, and spoke not a word with him for many months afterward. The connection of the Prince with the liberal party, which she believed to arise from his desire to pave his way to the throne, and his well-known aversion to the clergy and Church party, added greatly to her unfriendly feelings toward him; and it may be said that the court has, ever since 1856, been divided into two hostile camps—that of the Empress and that of Prince Napoleon. The latter is an abler and wiler antagonist than he is commonly believed to be, and the Empress has certainly no reason to congratulate herself on the results of her long warfare with him.

The members of the Murat family are the only relatives of the Emperor with whom the Empress is on good terms. The princes are not likely to become dangerous rivals of the Prince Imperial; and the Princess Pauline Murat, now Duchess de Mouchy, is the best and dearest friend of the Empress, who treats her more as a sister than a distant relative. The Duchess de Mouchy is one of the handsomest ladies of the French aristocracy; and as she almost always accompanies the Empress when the ladies of the court appear in public, it is inexplicable how the story could arise and be so generally believed that the Empress surrounds herself only with homely and elderly ladies lest her fading charms should be eclipsed. The Empress, it is said, contrary to the wishes of the Emperor, has always required that these ladies should belong to the old aristocracy, and, inasmuch as very few families of the ancient nobility care to have any thing to do with the Second Empire, she can not be very particular in her choice; and, if her course in this respect is censurable at all, fault should be found with her pride and not with her vanity.

And yet, proud as the Empress is in some things, she is exceedingly condescending—too condescending, as her mistress of ceremonies thinks—in others; that is, she is rather prone to overstep the conventional limits still dividing the various classes of French society. She treats the officers and servants of the palace as her equals; she jests and laughs and chats with her seamstresses and maids, and treats her dress-maker and milliner with more familiarity than her ladies of honor.

Her Majesty's dress-maker and milliner are two highly-important personages. They are almost her confidantes, and exercise much influence over her. The former is the famous Madame Moga, who makes most of the dresses of the Empress, and who, patronized as she is by nearly all the ladies of the court, the aristocracy, and haute finance, has an income of over two hundred thousand francs a year. She visits the Empress, who is quite attached to her, nearly every day. One day Madame Moga came to Saint Cloud when the Empress happened to be promenading in the park. The footman who was to announce the dress-maker to her Majesty misunderstood what she said to him, and told the Emperor that Madame Moga wished to see him. The Emperor, who is always extremely polite toward ladies, immediately went to the room where the dress-maker was waiting, and entered into a conversation with her. Suddenly the Empress entered the room, and exclaimed, laughingly, "What, Madame Moga, you profit by my absence to seduce the Emperor?"

The Emperor smiled, and the dress-maker, far from being confused by this jest, which would have driven the mistress of ceremonies to despair, felt flattered by it, and boasted of it to all her acquaintances.

Madame Ode, the fashionable milliner of the Rue de la Paix, of whom the Empress is very fond on account of her good taste and of her conversational talents and savoir-vivre, was even more fortunate. One day she likewise came to Saint Cloud when the Emperor and Empress were out on the terrace. She approached their Majesties, who seemed to be in very good-humor, and when the Empress caught sight of her she exclaimed merrily, "Oh, Louis, go and kiss Madame Ode!"

"With pleasure," replied the ruler of the French. To the great delight of his mischievous consort he took off his hat, stepped close up to the milliner, and imprinted a kiss on her cheek. I should add here that Madame Ode is any thing but good-looking, so that there was some little malice in her Majesty's jest.

Another person who is still more indispensable to the Empress is M. Leroi, the hair-dresser of the Place de Madeleine. M. Leroi may almost be called her Majesty's factotum; he accompanies her every where. When she goes to Biarritz, he must likewise repair to that small watering-place; when she sets out for Compiègne, he must also start for the pavilion of the Empress at that place. The palace of Saint Cloud and the Tuileries would be deserted if Leroi were not at hand. A coiffure on which Leroi has not laid his hands would be considered as incomplete, in a constitutional state, a decree not countersigned by one of the Ministers. M. Leroi is not only an excellent hair-dresser, but a most piquant story-teller. He knows all the news of the day, and knows, too, how to relate them in the most pleasant manner to her Majesty. It was from him that she first heard the doleful tale of the domestic misfortunes of Erlanger, the banker; of the terrible revenge of Mlle. Judith, the actress; of the affair that led to the duel between M. de Gallifet and Achille Murat, etc.; and since her Majesty takes such a lively interest in politics, he informs her of the state of public opinion toward the government, and of the reception with which important public measures meet at the hands of the people. M. Leroi passes every day two hours with her Majesty, and the courtiers jocosely say, "Leroi (Le Roi) has more influence over the Empress than the Emperor;" they say also that he handles every thing "with gloves," because, in dressing the hair of her Majesty and of the other ladies of the court, he does not take off the faultless yellow kid gloves which he always wears.

We said before that the Empress is a very bad politician. Her political course, really, should not be judged so harshly as it is, inasmuch as it is not mere personal ambition that actuates her, but, above all, the ardent desire to secure her son's succession to the imperial throne. Allowing herself to be guided in her political movements by her heart and impulses rather than her head, she seldom attains her ends, but never fails to exasperate her adversaries. A thousand little stories are current in Paris about her imprudence in political affairs. Thus it is by no means certain that it was her influence that led to the second expedition to Rome; but when the first dispatch of the battle of Mentana arrived the imperial family was with some invited guests at the dinner-table; the Emperor opened the dispatch, and, after reading it, handed it, without uttering a word, to the Empress, who was imprudent enough to burst into loud exclamations of exultation and clap her hands, although quite a number of persons whom she knew to be strongly opposed to the expedition were present. The consequence was, that her conduct on this occasion became generally known a few hours afterward; and, as a matter of course, the Parisians, most of whom execrated the part which France had played in that affair, held the Empress responsible for it.

On another memorable occasion she equally wounded the feelings of a vast majority of the Parisians, forgetful of the fact that "Paris is France." It was on the evening of the 1st of June, 1863. The Emperor, the Empress, and a number of ladies and gentlemen of the court were in her Majesty's room, waiting impatiently for the returns of the election in Paris. An opposition victory had been looked for; but the overwhelming majorities by which the democratic candidates had triumphed were entirely unexpected. When the returns were read, the Emperor said not a word, and merely twirled his mustache. The Empress, however, who can not imagine how any body can oppose the Second Empire, and who treats all those who do so as her personal enemies, burst into tears and loudly accused the Parisians of the basest ingratitude. "Ah! Les ingrats!" she cried, bitterly. "Les cerveaux brûlés!" using an expression then much in vogue among the imperialists to designate the democrats of Paris. Already before midnight the Parisians knew how her Majesty had received the election returns, and proud as they were of their great triumph, they were doubly exasperated at the ill-considered taunts of the Empress.

There is another matter by which the Empress for a long time past has wounded the pride, not only of the Parisians, but of the whole French people. Ever since 1855 she has vainly sought to obtain recognition at the hands of her royal and imperial sisters in Europe. She has lavished on them invitations which were never accepted, and paid them visits which were never returned. Every body, including the Empress herself, must know by this time that these haughty queens and empresses look down upon her, and if they can help it, avoid having any thing to do with her. With the exception of Queen Victoria, who has recently treated the Empress in a manner bordering on rudeness, and of Queen Isabella, who twice came to Biarritz as a suppliant, every other sovereign lady in Europe has slighted the Empress of the French, often under the most shallow pretexts. In the year 1867 the cup of humiliation was presented again and again to the lips of the Empress. She had tendered the most pressing invitations to every empress, queen, and duchess in Europe to visit Paris during the Exposition. The Empress of Russia, the Queen of Prussia, the Empress of Austria, and the Duchess of Genoa, who presides over the court of King Victor Emanuel, excused themselves on the plea of ill health, although the Russian Empress shortly after made a trip to Germany, and both the Empress of Austria and the Duchess of Genoa participated in a series of fatiguing festivities at home, while the Queen of Prussia even visited the Exposition incognito, and thereby avoided official intercourse with the Empress. The Empress Elizabeth did not treat Eugénie very cordially at Salzburg, and begged to be excused from accompanying her husband on his trip to Paris.

In literature Octave Feuillet is the declared protégé and favorite of the Empress. For ten years past she has never tired of lavishing marks of esteem and admiration on him; and not only did she lend in 1863 her then still powerful influence to obtain for him a seat in the Academy, but she had him appointed custodian of the Fontainebleau library, a position much coveted by French authors. Octave Feuillet has frequently expressed on public occasions his gratitude toward his august protectress, and in his inaugural academic address, in 1863, he called the reign of Napoleon the Third (turning and bowing to the Empress, who was present) "un grand règne." In 1862 Edmond About was likewise patronized by the Empress; but their friendship was not of long duration. The able author of "The King of the Mountains" found that the friendship of the Empress and of the court in general was fatal to his popularity, and therefore made haste to break it off. Parties hostile both to the Empress and to About assert, however, that his wounded vanity had as much to do with this rupture as regard for his popularity. The story is, that About, at one of the Monday receptions of her Majesty, was looking over the new books in the little library adjoining to her boudoir, and found there his latest novel, which he had sent two months ago to her Majesty, with leaves uncut, and evidently unread, while the last productions of M. Ponson du Terrail, which he found at the same place, distinctly showed that her Majesty had been poring over them. He is said to have refused ever since to set foot again in the Tuileries.

Among the dramatists, Victorien Sardou and Alexandre Dumas, fils, were several years since especially distinguished by her Majesty, though both of them received the marks of her kindness and admiration only with frigid politeness. Despite the frequent invitations to court parties and other unsolicited favors which Sardou received, his "Benoiton Family," as he has since openly admitted, was a covert attack upon the Empress, and that drama is indebted to this well-known fact for much of the great success which it achieved in Paris. In the same manner Alexandre Dumas, fils, a frondeur like Sardou, made a number of pointed allusions to her Majesty in the remarkable preface to the recent edition of his complete dramatic works.

CHRISTMAS IN POSSESSION.

By MISS M. E. BRADDON.

"BUT oh, Gus!" said a faltering voice, as two little white hands clung about the Captain's stalwart arm, "suppose that dreadful man should do what he threatened, and there should be an execution!" And Captain Hawthorndean's pretty, pale-faced wife shuddered as if she had been talking of one of those sanguinary performances which, in the good old times of English history, were wont to attract crowds to Tower Hill.

"Nonsense, my love, there's not the remotest chance of such a thing," cried the Captain, sturdily. "Do you suppose if there were I'd go away and leave my precious petsy-wetsy in danger of falling into the hands of the Philistines?"

"And Toodleums!" exclaimed Mrs. Hawthorndean, piteously. Toodleums was a pet name for that domestic miracle of beauty and genius, the first baby. "Imagine dreadful men taking away Toodleum's coral, that my own darling mother sent him!"

"I should like to see the bailiff that would put a finger on that coral!" cried the warrior, fiercely. "But now let's talk dispassionately, my darling, for time's nearly up. It's half past eleven. The express leaves King's Cross at 12.40, so my precious Clara must dry her pretty eyes and listen to her devoted Augustus."

The devoted Augustus looked very handsome, and bright, and cheerful, as he bent over his tearful young wife, while two brisk little serving-maids scudded up and down stairs in quest of innumerable canes, over-coats, and courier-bags, and a noble Russia-leather dispatch-box—Messrs. Partridge & Cooper's account for which, by-the-way, had not yet been settled—and skirmished with the cabman, who was groaning under the Captain's portmanteaux in the hall.

"You see, my darling, all we have to do is to look things in the face. Absalom holds a bill of mine which he refuses to renew—having, in point of fact, renewed it two or three times already—which cursed bond falls due on the 24th, Christmas-eve; the idea of any blood-sucking fellow having the heart to refuse to renew a bill falling due on Christmas-eve! And the black-hearted scoundrel swears if it isn't paid he'll put in an execution upon these goods before the day is out. Was there ever such a dastard?"

"But you do owe him the money, don't you, Gus darling?"

"Well, yes, I owe him some of it, of course; but you can't call compound interest at forty per cent. a just debt."

"But you knew what the interest was to be when you borrowed the money, didn't you, Gus darling?"

"Of course; the iniquitous rascal traded on my desperation. Women don't understand these things, you see, my love. However, scoundrel as I believe Absalom to be, I don't suppose him capable of putting in an execution on Christmas-eve, especially after the diplomatic letter I wrote him this morning. But I'll tell you what, Clara; be sure you let no stranger into the house on any pretext whatever. Sport the oak, my love, and tell your servants not to let a living creature cross the threshold."

"Yes, dear, I'll tell them. And there's the butcher, and the grocer, and the baker, and even the milkman, Augustus dear. You don't know how insolent their young men have been lately; and, you see, you won't answer their letters, and that makes them angry."

"Selfish blood-hounds!" cried the Captain; "what the dooce do they want? Do they expect me to coin money? And upon my word, Clara, I don't think it's very generous on your part to torture me in this way, just as I'm off to spend Christmas with my uncle, Sir John Strathnairn—whose only son Douglas, a precious muf, by-the-way, stands between me and one of the oldest baronetcies and finest estates in North Britain—and am going to bore myself to death deer-stalking, and that kind of thing, entirely on your account; since this is about my only chance of squaring the old miser, and reconciling him to the idea of my imprudent marriage. It's positively selfish of you, Clara; and I hate selfishness."

At this the young wife's tears flowed afresh. She was very young, very inexperienced, the fifth daughter of a small gentleman-farmer in Somersetshire, with no better fortune than her pretty face and bright winning manner. Augustus Hawthorndean, late captain of Hussars, had put the finishing stroke to a career of imprudence by falling in love with this bright hazel-eyed damsel, and marrying her off-hand in his own impetuous way. This event had happened about eighteen months ago, immediately after the sale of the Captain's commission, the price of which he had anticipated to the last penny by means of his friends the money-lenders. Since this time the Captain and his wife had lived mysteriously as the young ravens. They were now the inhabitants of a charming little villa at Kensington, prettily furnished by a crack West End upholsterer, and the proud and happy parents of an infant prodigy, whose laundress's account alone was no trifle, and whose baby-existence required to be sustained by the produce of one especial cow, charged extra in the dairyman's bill.

This was the aspect of affairs on the 21st of December, when Captain Hawthorndean prepared to leave his Penates, on a journey to the extreme north of Scotland, where he was to spend some weeks at the grim feudal castle of a fabulously-rich uncle, Sir John Kilmarnock Strathnairn, from whom he hoped to obtain a new start in life.

"That's what I want, Clara," he told his confiding little partner. "The army was a mistake for a man with nothing but a beggarly younger son's portion of three hundred a year. As if any fellow in the 11th could live on his pay and a paltry three hundred a year! So, of course, I got my poor little estate mortgaged up to the eyes; and there's nothing left but the reversion to Toodleums, which no doubt he'll dispose of to the Jews before he gets it."

Mrs. Hawthorndean shook her head at this.

"Oh yes, he will, or he's not the Toodleums I take him for," said the Captain, resolutely.

So it was that Augustus Lovat Hawthorndean, scion of two good old houses, Scottish and English, departed on his northern journey, with a view to softening the heart of his wealthy maternal uncle, and with a vague idea that Sir John Strathnairn would be induced to give him a start in some new profession—say the Church or the Bar. He knew fellows who were doing wonders at the Bar; and he had heard of snug sinecures in the Church.

"Egad! if the worst comes to the worst, I suppose I must go in for a government employment, and devote my mind to the investigation of the cattle-plague, or the control of sewers, or some such low drudgery," said the Captain. So he caught his little wife in his arms, gave her a hearty kiss, and hurried off to the loaded cab that was to convey him on the first stage of his journey.

The tender young wife could not be satisfied with so brief a parting. She ran out to the cab, and there was a passionate clasping of hands, and murmured blessings made inaudible by sobs. And at the last—

"Oh, Gus!" she cried, "can you go without kissing Toodleums?" And she beckoned to the little nurse, who was holding the baby up to his parents' view at a first-floor window.

"Oh, d—!" exclaimed the Captain, "I can't lose the train for this kind of tomfoolery.—King's Cross, cabby, as hard as you can pelt!"

The cruel cab-horse went tearing off, and Mrs. Hawthornean returned to the house, her pretty hair disheveled by the bitter winter wind, and her pale face wet with more bitter tears. In the hall she met the cook, a fiery-faced young person, whom the inexperienced little wife always encountered with fear and trembling.

"Oh, if you please, ma'am," said this domestic, in a breathless, gasping voice that was very alarming, "did master leave the money for my wages—two quarters, one month, and three weeks exact—as you said you'd arst him?"

"No, Sarah," faltered Mrs. Hawthornean; "I'm sorry to say he could not settle every thing this time; but directly he comes back from Scotland, he—I—I am sure all will be made right."

"Settle every thing, indeed!" cried the cook, contemptuously. "I should like to see any think as he has settled. Settling ain't much in his way. Here have I been slaving myself to death in his service; and to wait on a gentleman that wants deviled kidneys and broiled bones promiscuous, for himself and his friends, up to twelve o'clock at night and later, is not what I've been used to; going on three-quarters of a year and never seen the color of his money. And I can't stand it no longer. So, if you please, ma'am, I shall leave this afternoon; and if I can't get my due by fair means, I must get it by foul; which summoning at the County Court by his cook won't bring much credit on Captain Orthogding, I should think."

"Oh, and if you please, mum, I should wish to leave at the same time as cook," said the brisk young house-maid; "not that I've got any think to say agen you, ma'am, which you have always been a kind missus; but flesh and blood can't bear to be put off as we've been put off, and to be sworn at into the bargain without no more consideration than if we were Injy slaves."

"Oh, very well, Sarah and Jane," replied Mrs. Hawthornean, hopelessly, "you must do as you please; and—go away when you please. I am sure my husband will pay you to the last farthing if you can only wait patiently till his affairs are arranged; but if you can't—"

"No, mum, we can't," answered the cook, resolutely; "we're tired of waiting. The line must be drawn somewhere; and when the tradespeople declines to call for orders the time has come to draw it."

Mrs. Hawthornean left the deserters, and went up stairs.

"It was unkind of them to leave it till Gus was gone," she thought; and then, with a thrill of horror, she considered what would happen if the nurse should also revolt. "I can live without dinner, and I can do the housemaid's work myself," she thought; "but baby is used to Hannah, and if she went away—"

The picture was too awful for contemplation. The poor little woman ran straight to the nursery—the pretty chamber which had been so daintily furnished in the days when, rich in the sense of an open account at the upholsterer's, the Captain had given his orders with a noble recklessness.

Here she found the nurse-maid, a good-tempered-looking girl of eighteen, bending over the dainty pink-curtained bassinet.

"He's a little fretful with his teeth to-day, mum," she said.

"Oh, Hannah," cried Clara Hawthornean, casting herself on her knees before this homely young person, "you won't leave me, will you—you won't de-de-desert the baby?"

"Leave Toodleums, ma'am? Bless his dear little heart! I'd as soon cut my head off as leave him. Why, Mrs. Hawthornean, if you haven't been crying! Oh do, please, mum, get up! What could have put such a notion into your pretty head? Oh, please, mum, don't take on so!"

"I can't help it, Hannah. The others are going, and I thought you would go too; and my darling would cry for you. Oh, Hannah, we shall be all alone in the house; and the tradespeople won't call any more till Captain Hawthornean's affairs are arranged—and we shall have n-n-nothing to eat!"

"Oh yes, we will, mum," replied the dauntless Hannah. "Don't you be downhearted, mum; we'll manage somehow, depend upon it."

"I don't know, Hannah. In the hurry of his going away I forgot to ask my husband for a little ready-money; and I haven't so much as a shilling to buy baby's biscuits."

The girl looked aghast at this.

"Oh, how I wish mamma would send me a hamper this Christmas!" said Mrs. Hawthornean, piteously. "She sends one to my married sister, Mrs. Tozer, every year; but papa was so angry when I married Captain Hawthornean—that it was a runaway-match, you know, Hannah—that he won't let my name be mentioned at home; and I haven't a friend in the world except mamma, who daren't be kind to me for fear of papa."

"Never you mind, mum," replied Hannah, cheerfully; "we'll get biscuits for baby, and new milk for baby, somehow, or my name's not Hannah Giles. Isn't there any thing in the house I could take to—"

Here the girl made a discreet and significant pause.

"Yes, Hannah, you good, faithful creature, I know what you mean. My jewelry has all gone ever so long ago; all but this poor little wedding-ring, and I could scarcely part with that—unless Toodleums were starving. But there's my cashmere shawl, and the silver-gray moiré that I wear at dinner-parties; and if you really wouldn't mind—"

"Lor' bless you, mum, not a bit! Wait till after tea to-night; I know where to take them."

"Bless you!" cried the disconsolate young wife; "you're a true friend, Hannah."

At this juncture mistress and maid were interrupted by the sudden awakening of Master Toodleums; and after this diversion they went down stairs to reconnoitre the enemy's country, Toodleums crowing and dribbling on his nurse's shoulder. Below all was desolation. Curiously they explored the snug little kitchen and offices, into which the timid young housekeeper had rarely ventured to intrude during the cook's stern dominion. Awful was the havoc revealed by the present investigation: broken crockery, bottomless saucepans, knife-blades without handles, forks without prongs, grease, rags, waste, ruin, were visible in every corner. The larder was bare of every thing except the heel of a stale loaf and a box of sardines, a species of hors d'œuvres, which the lower powers had not affected.

"Oh, Hannah, what can have become of the sirloin of beef we had for the late dinner yesterday? Such a monstrous joint, too, as the cook ordered, though I told her a little piece of roast beef. Why, you and I could have lived upon it for a week!"

"And cook has taken it off in her box, I dare say," cried Hannah. "Oh, the barefaced hussy!"

There was evidently nothing edible in the house except the sardines, so mistress and maid were fain to wait until the shades of evening should permit the faithful Hannah to execute that somewhat delicate transaction in relation to the silver-gray moiré and the cashmere shawl.

"If you don't mind taking care of the baby for an hour, mum, I'll tidy up the kitchen a bit and get the tea-things ready; and then, while the kettle's boiling, I can run round to—where I spoke of; and get some tea and sugar, and a rasher or so of bacon, and baby's biscuits, and a fancy-loaf as I come back. I don't suppose you'll care much about dinner to-day, mum."

"Dinner!" cried Mrs. Hawthornean; "I feel as if I should never be able to eat any thing more as long as I live. Oh, Gus, if you only knew what we have to go through! Oh, my precious popsy, when you grow up and marry, you must never leave your poor little wife alone at Christmas-time, with all the debts unpaid, and every body angry."

This apostrophe was addressed to the six-months-old infant, who looked supremely indifferent to the fond appeal. Mrs. Hawthornean took the child in her arms and went to the drawing-room, where she sat in a low chair by the dull fire, and indulged in that dismal refreshment which women call "a good cry."

She was very desolate, very miserable. The short winter day was already darkening, the prospect without looked bleak; but in the windows of other villas the firelight shone cheerily, and the lonely young wife thought sadly of happy families assembled in those rooms; families across whose hearth the dread spectre insolvency had never cast his gloomy shadow. And then she thought of her own distant home. The bright rooms, always made especially gay and pleasant at this season. The chintz room and the blue room, the oak room and the cedar parlor; the bright winter flowers, and ever-blossoming chintz curtains; the fires glowing red on every hearth; the noble Worcester punch-bowl brought forth from its retirement; the chopping and mincing, and cake and pastry making, and bustle of preparation in the housekeeper's room; the gardener coming into the kitchen with his pile of holly and mistletoe, laurel and bay; the odor of Christmas that pervaded the house; and the dear friends with whom she might never spend that holy festival again.

"Oh, if papa could see me now, I don't think he could be angry with me any more," she said to herself, despairingly.

For nearly two hours she sat alone, singing softly to her baby, and crying more or less almost all the time. And then Hannah came in with the tea-tray, and lighted candles, and the daintiest little dish of fried bacon, and baby's biscuits, and a great jug of milk for that young gentleman's consumption.

"It's all right, mum, one pound fifteen—fifteen on the shawl, and a pound on the more; but you'd never believe the trouble I had to screw him up to it. And he made me have a ticket for each. That's their artful way. I've heard father say they make mints of money out of the tickets alone. And now do cheer up, and take your tea, that's a dear lady."

The brisk little maiden stirred the fire, drew the curtains, arranged the table, and made all things as cheerful and pleasant as circumstances would permit. Her mistress insisted that she should share the meal; and the two took their tea together—the girl almost overcome by so great an honor, the young wife's thoughts speeding northward with the gallant Captain, who sat in the coupé of an express-train, smoking Pataga's "Regalias" at eighteen-pence apiece.

"Now, don't you be downhearted, mum," said the faithful handmaid, as she bade her mistress good-night. "I only spent three shillings this evening; and one pound twelve will carry us on till master comes home."

This was comfort; but poor Clara had not forgotten the threatened horror of the 24th, Christmas-eve, that day to which she used to look forward at the dear old home, an old-fashioned festival enough, with its simple dissipations in the way of acted charades, snap-dragon, and egg-flip.

"Oh, what a child I was!" she exclaimed; and she had been indeed a joyous and innocent creature in those days. If she had been a calculating person, given to weigh advantages, and not the most unselfish and devoted of wives, she might have asked herself whether the proprietorship of a dashing ci-devant cavalry-officer and his superb mustachios was a privilege absolutely worth all it had cost her.

The dreaded 24th arrived; and the weary hours crept by with leaden feet. Every sound of a step in the street set Clara's heart beating. No ominous single knocks came to the door, except the faint appeal of a shivering dealer in boot-laces; for the angry tradespeople knew the Captain was away, and did not care to torment his helpless young wife uselessly, any more than they cared to supply her with goods without hope of payment. Even that long day wore itself out at last; and the mistress and maid took their tea and rasher again together before a cheerful fire, and discussed the probability that Mr. Absalom's stony heart had been melted by the softening influences of the season, and that there would be no execution.

"The very word is so dreadful," said Mrs. Hawthornean; "and yet that's better than calling a cruel thing that makes a man prisoner an 'attachment.' I remember Augustus telling me he had an 'attachment' out against him, and it didn't sound dreadful at all; but the very next week he was taken to Whitecross Street. I wonder what they are doing at home now—at tea, I dare say. When I shut my eyes I can see them all sitting round the great fire-place. I wonder whether any one thinks of me. I do wish mamma had contrived to send me a hamper, with a home-made pound-cake, and some mince-pies, and one of our famous geese; not on my own account, but on yours, Hannah, for you've been so good to me; and I should like you to have a nice Christmas dinner, and something to take home to your poor mother to-morrow evening. But I'm a famous goose to think of such a thing; for mamma couldn't send me a hamper without papa's knowledge, and he is so dreadfully angry with me."

A sharp rat-tat, something between a single knock and a postman's, sounded on the door at this moment, and gave maid and mistress a kind of galvanic shock.

"Don't let any one in, Hannah," cried Mrs. Hawthornean. "My husband said we were not to admit a creature."

Hannah had skipped to the window-curtains, and was peering out at the door-step. She jumped back into the room as if she had been shot.

"Oh, be joyful, mum!" she cried. "You've got your wish. It's a HAMPER!"

"No!"

"Yes, mum; and such a big one! Ain't it lovely? And mince-pies, and pound-cake, and geese, too, I'll wager. And baby shall suck a bit of roast goose to-morrow, bless him! My brother Joe's baby ain't five months old yet, and will suck the gravy out of any thing as well as if he was a grown man. Oh, won't we have a merry Christmas, mum—you, and me, and baby? and ain't I glad that cross old cook's gone!"

"It's like magic!" exclaimed Mrs. Hawthornean, as the imitation-postman's knock was repeated impatiently. "Run to the door, Hannah. You're sure it is a hamper?"

"Lor' bless your heart, mum, as if I didn't know a Christmas hamper when I see one!" and the girl flew into the little hall.

It was a foolish thing to be so moved, perhaps, by such a vulgar trifle as a Christmas hamper; but Clara Hawthornean wept tears of pleasure as she waited for the welcome basket. It was not of the famous home-reared goose or home-made mince-pies she thought; but of the love that had contrived the gift, the tender motherly stratagems and plottings and contrivings that must have been achieved in order to compass the seasonable surprise.

"God bless the dear mother!" she murmured as she went out into the hall, where a queer-looking little old man was just depositing a noble hamper, the very straw oozing from the interstices of which looked quite appetizing. Mrs. Hawthornean was too much moved to remember that the little old man standing in the hall was there in direct disobedience to the Captain's solemn mandate that no stranger should be admitted within that door.

"Here is sixpence for yourself, my good man," said Clara, politely. "Good-evening." She looked toward the open door, gently indicating that the old man could depart; but the old man, instead of so doing, gave a little whistle, and beckoned to some one without.

In the next moment a portly stranger stood on the threshold, gayly attired in a drab overcoat and olive-green trowsers, and with gold chains and locketts twinkling on his expansive waistcoat.

"Sorry to have recourse to stratagem, miss," said this gentleman, removing the newest of white hats from the blackest and curliest of chevelures; "but really, you see, the Captain's one of those people with whom one must be deeper than Garrick. Here is my warrant, miss, all correct and regular, as you may perceive. Suit of Shadrach Absalom. This old gent and I will take an inventory, miss; and he can remain on the premises afterward."

"What!" cried Clara, growing very white; "do you mean to say that hamper is not from my dear mother at Somerton Manor?"

"That hamper, my dear young lady, is like the wooden horse that went into Troy. Don't trouble yourself to open it, my good girl; there's nothing but straw inside, and a brickbat or two just to give it solidity. All stratagems are fair in love and war, and the recovery of a just debt, especially when a bill has been renewed three times, as this has. Shadrach Absalom is my first cousin, miss, and as good a fellow as ever lived; but the Captain has really been too bad."

"I'm sure my husband means to pay every thing, when he comes from Scotland, where he has gone to visit his uncle, Sir John Strathnairn," faltered the horror-stricken Clara.

"What, do you mean to say that Captain Hawthornean has got such a pretty young creature as you for his wife, and that he can have the heart to go away and leave you to bear the brunt of his difficulties?" cried Laurence Absalom, sheriff's officer, with honest indignation.

"I beg, Sir, that you will not remark upon my husband's conduct; he always acts for the best. Oh, Hannah, what are we to do?"

"I know what I should like to do," answered the handmaiden, spitefully; "and that is to scratch that nasty, deceiving old man's face."

"If you could scratch some of the dirt off it you'd be doing him a service, my dear," said Mr. Laurence Absalom, with easy good-nature, while the old man sat quietly on the hamper, the picture of grimy meekness. Mr. Absalom called for a candle, and proceeded to explore the house, attended by the meek old man, who wiped his dirty face upon the dingiest of blue cotton handkerchiefs, and breathed very hard as he followed his commanding-officer. Together the two men ransacked drawers and wardrobes, peered into cheffoniers, and violated the sanctity of writing-desks, and carefully catalogued books and electro-plate, china and glass, table-linen and pictures. All Clara's pretty dresses, her dainty ribbons and laces, her coquettish little bonnets and innocent girlish jackets, were set down on a sheet of greasy foolscap, while the two women looked on, one of them utterly helpless and miserable, wondering what would come next.

At last the inventory was complete; and Mr. Absalom prepared to take his departure.

"Of course you'll write to the Captain, ma'am," he said; "and you'll please tell him that unless that business is squared in five days' time, his property will go to the hammer. I'm sure I'm very sorry on your account; but, you see, the Captain knew what he had to expect, and he really ought to have provided against it. Good-evening, Mrs. Hawthornean. The old gent will stay till the sale. You'll find him very quiet."

"What!" cried Clara, aghast, "is that dreadful old man to stop in the house?"

The dreadful old man gave a grunt of assent.

"Upon my word, ma'am, I wish I was the party," said Mr. Absalom, gallantly; "I should consider it quite a privilege; but old Jiffins does that part of the work; and you'll find him as harmless as an old spaniel, if you don't mind his appetite, and that is rather alarming. Good-night." And with an easy nod Mr. Laurence Absalom departed, leaving the mistress and maid staring in consternation at the man in possession, who was refreshing himself with a pinch of snuff out of a screw of paper. He certainly was by no means a prepossessing individual; indeed, it is impossible to imagine grubbiness more dingy than the grubbiness of this old man's aspect. He wore a long great-coat, and of shirt or shirt-collar there were no traces visible; but in lieu of these conventionalities he displayed a dirty wisp of neckerchief that had once been white, but which was now a sickly yellow. His boots seemed to have been the dress-boots of a giant, and were wrinkled like the skins of French plums. On one hand he wore a roomy black glove, also of the texture of French plums. His gray hair straggled over the threadbare velvet collar of his coat in an eminently patriarchal fashion, and his bottle-nose—nay, indeed, his complexion generally—was of that rubicund hue produced by copious consumption of malt and spirituous liquors, in conjunction with exposure to all kinds of weather. Such as he was, he seemed to Mrs. Hawthornean the living embodiment of a nightmare. She stood rooted to the ground, staring at him hopelessly and helplessly; and it was only the brisk Hannah who aroused her from this waking trance.

"Haden't the old gentleman better step into master's study?" suggested the girl. "He'll want to sit somewhere, you see, ma'am."

"To sit?—yes, and he is going to live here. Oh, Hannah, what shall we do?"

"Don't you be frightened, mum," whispered the girl; "I've lived where there's been a man in possession, and it's nothing when you're used to it.—Step this way, if you please, Sir," she added, briskly, and she pointed to a little box of a room opposite the drawing-room.

The old man walked to the door of this apartment, then suddenly turned back and approached Mrs. Hawthornean, who quailed before him. To her horror he lifted his dirty hand, and laid it—oh, so gently!—on her soft hair, patting her head as if she had been a child.

"Don't you be frightened, my pretty!" he said. "I've seen a deal of trouble in my time, and I can feel for them as have their homes broke up, though it is my business to break 'em. It's the business that's hard-hearted, my pretty, not me. You bear that in mind, and don't you mind old Jiffins no more than if he was a old tomcat. He'll keep his place, depend upon it, and won't give no trouble to no one."

"I'm sure you're very kind," murmured Clara, half crying; "but it does seem so dreadful!"

"Of course it do, to a sweet young creatur' like you. But Lor' bless you, mum, there's places I go to reg'lar, as you may say, and where I'm quite like one of the family. The children calls me uncle. 'Crikey, father!' cries one of the little chaps, 'if here ain't uncle Jiffins come back agen!' and they're quite took aback to find their parents ain't glad to see me.—I suppose there ain't no objections to a pipe in this here room, ma'am?"

"Oh, no, no, no," cried Clara, piteously, "you can smoke as much as you like; and there's some of my husband's Turkish tobacco in that jar on the mantle-piece, which you can take if you please."

"Thank you, mum. Shag's more in my way; but if you could put your hand upon a little bit of Cavendish I should take it very kind."

A piece of Cavendish tobacco was found after some little trouble, and Mr. Jifins established himself in Augustus Hawthorndean's easy-chair—a charming chair, in which the Captain had been wont to read the papers and ponder somewhat gloomily on financial questions; and Mr. Jifins being duly established in this room, which was conveniently close to the hall-door, and in a manner commanded the whole house, Mrs. Hawthorndean and Hannah went back to the drawing-room, where Toodleums, happily unconscious of this domestic revolution, was still slumbering placidly in his bassinot.

Together the mistress and maid sat down to face life with its new responsibilities.

"I'll write to Augustus this very night, Hannah; but my letter can't go till to-morrow—perhaps not even then, as it's Christmas-day; and a letter takes such a time traveling to the Highlands; and then there would be the journey back; and—oh dear, when will Gus come to send that awful old creature away? He doesn't seem unkind, but oh, so dirty! And to think that he should be sitting in Gus's pet chair, with his head against the antimacassar that I worked with my own hands!"

Happily the brisk little nurse-maid was too cheery a creature to be altogether discomfited even by a man in possession. She gave the baby refreshment from a bottle furnished with a wonderful gutta-percha machine, which made the business look very much like laying on gas; and then she reminded her mistress that it was getting late, and shops might be closing in the neighborhood.

"There's to-morrow's dinner, you see, mum; and then there's the old gent's supper. I suppose I'd better get a bit of cheese?"

"Oh, good gracious me!" cried Clara, "will he want supper?"

"Lor' bless your innocence, mum, of course he will; and breakfast and dinner, and all his meals, and his beer. It's the rule, you see, mum: you finds 'em in every thing."

With this Hannah handed her mistress the baby, and departed.

The inexperienced girl-wife sat staring apathetically at the blackened coals in the pretty steel grate. She felt as some young mother of the antediluvian period may have felt, as she sat with her child in her lap, listening to the rising waters, and waiting for the end of the world.

Hannah came back by-and-by, with bread and cheese and beer for the old man, and a modest little joint of beef for the next day's dinner, and a quarter of a pound of tea, and other small matters, which altogether made a terrible hole in that one pound twelve shillings which alone stood between this household and destitution.

"We shall have to change the sovereign for his beer to-morrow, mum," said the maiden; "but we shall hold out till the Captain comes home, depend upon it."

Mrs. Hawthorndean counted the hours that must elapse before the Captain could possibly come home, and counted them over again, till her brain grew quite dizzy. Her only comfort next morning was to think that some of those weary hours were gone.

Hannah waited on Mr. Jifins, taking his meals to the Captain's snug little sanctum, and coming back to her mistress to report the awful havoc he had made with the loaf, or the alarming way he had slashed off slices from the joint.

"And I think if there was oceans of gravy, mum, he'd soak them up; for, let alone smothering his purtaters, he sops it up with his bread."

Oh, what a dreary Christmas-day! Cabs and carriages dashed up to other houses in the pretty suburban street; gayly-dressed people went to and fro the neighboring churches; at night music sounded and lights gleamed from many windows; while Clara Hawthorndean walked up and down with her fretful baby, and thought of what they were doing at home—alas, her home no longer!

Toodleums had been fractious all day, and grew worse toward evening; and while Hannah went for the supper-beer he took the opportunity of working himself into a paroxysm of crying that terrified the young mother out of her wits. She was pacing the room, trying in vain to soothe her infant, when the door was softly opened, and Mr. Jifins appeared. Clara almost dropped the baby at sight of this apparition.

"Let me take him a bit," said Mr. Jifins;

"I'm used to babies, bless 'em!"

"Oh, please don't!" cried Clara, as the dreaded intruder advanced his grimy hands; "indeed, indeed, he wouldn't come to you."

But, to the mother's utter astonishment, Toodleums, the most particular and capricious of babies, did go to this grubby old man, and, after a few minutes' hushing and dandling and see-sawing in the air, did actually cease to cry.

"Bless their dear little hearts! they all come to me," said Mr. Jifins, complacently. "I've got a grandson just this one's size; and what that little dear do suffer with the wind on his stomach is only bekknown to himself and me. It ain't temper, bless you, when they skreeks like that—it's wind; and you take my advice, and just let your girl fetch twopenn'orth of essence of peppermint—none of your Daffy for my money—and give him two drops on a lump of sugar melted in a spoonful of warm water, and he'll be as quiet as a lamb."

Mr. Jifins nursed the baby till Hannah came back with the beer and the change for that last sovereign, which Mrs. Hawthorndean had contemplated fondly as she parted with it forever. The girl stared aghast on beholding her charge in the arms of the intruder; but he dispatched her to the chemist's for peppermint as coolly as if he had been the infant's favorite grandfather. Mrs. Hawthorndean had sunk exhausted into her chair, and looked on with amazement, while the man in possession developed a perfect genius for nursing, and entertained Toodleums with a broken tobacco-pipe and a latch-key as that young gentleman rarely allowed himself to be entertained by the most elaborate inventions of the toy-maker.

"You seem to have a wonderful power over children," murmured Clara, at last.

"I'm fond of 'em, ma'am, that's where it is; and they know it. There's nothing gets over 'em like that—real, rightdown fondness of 'em. Now, I'll wager while you were carrying this little chap up and down just now your mind had wandered like, and you were thinking of your own troubles, and you felt him a drag upon you."

Clara nodded assent.

"To be sure!" exclaimed Mr. Jifins, triumphantly; "and that child knowed it—he knowed as he hadn't got your whole heart; and you can't do nothing with a child unless you gives him your whole heart. They're the deepest little Garriks out for that, bless 'em!—Ain't you now, ducky? Yes, o' course; you knows you are."

Toodleums assented to this proposition with a rapturous crow.

"Bein' as it's Christmas-night, mum," said Mr. Jifins, by-and-by, when the peppermint had been brought and administered, "and my disposition lively like, perhaps you wouldn't take it as a liberty if I asked leave to eat my bit of supand she was presently employed in toasting cheese under the old man's direction.

"A tea-spoonful of mustard, and a good lump of fresh butter, and a table-spoonful of ale, and let it simmer by the side of the fire while you toastes the bread, my dear," said Mr. Jifins, who nursed the baby and looked on approvingly while the handmaid obeyed him.

To poor Clara Hawthorndean it seemed like some distempered dream. "If any body should call!" she thought; and she had to tell herself over and over again that ten o'clock on Christmas-night was not a likely hour for callers. She thought of the joyous party in her old home—the girls in white muslin and scarlet sashes, the matrons in their rustling silks; and then of that more stately festival at Strathnairn Castle, and the black-oak buffets loaded with gold plate, which her husband had so often described to her; but from these bright pictures her fancy always came back to the old man superintending the simmering cheese.

Both he and Hannah persuaded her presently to taste this delicacy. She had eaten nothing at dinner, for the sense of the old man's presence in the Captain's study had weighed upon her like an actual burden. He was not nearly so dreadful seated opposite to her with her baby on his knee. Our skeletons are never so hideous when confronted boldly as when hidden away in per in here? It is rather lonesome in that there little room, and seems lonelier being Christmas-time."

What could a helpless young wife and mother say to this startling request? Mr. Jifins was master of the situation. There was something very dreadful in sitting down to supper with this dirty old man; but Toodleums was hanging on to one of his greasy coat-buttons with the affection of a lifetime, and a man thus affected by Toodleums could not be utterly base. So Mrs. Hawthorndean murmured a faint assent to the proposed arrangement. The tray was brought, modestly furnished with a piece of cheese, a loaf, a little glass dish of butter, and a jug of ale. Mr. Jifins surveyed these simple preparations with an approving eye.

"Raw cheese is rather cold to the palate in this weather," he said, thoughtfully; "what should you say now, mum, to a rabbit?"

"I am very sorry," faltered Mrs. Hawthorndean, apologetically; "but we haven't any rabbits in the house."

"Lor' bless you, ma'am, I means toasted cheese. If that good-tempered young woman of yours would get me the mustard-pot and a small saucepan, and then kneel down before the fire and toast a round or two of bread, I'll soon show you what I means by a rabbit."

Hannah ran off to procure these implements, some dark cupboard. Mrs. Hawthorndean tasted the Welsh rarebit. It was really excellent. She remembered having heard Augustus talk of eating such things at Evans's. And presently she found herself eating this toasted cheese with more appetite than any thing she had tasted since her husband's departure. Though familiar, Mr. Jifins was not utterly wanting in reverence. He resigned the baby to Hannah, and insisted on taking his supper at the remotest corner of the table, where there was no table-cloth. The edge of the table-cloth he seemed to consider the line of demarcation; no persuasion could induce him to infringe upon it by the breadth of a hair. But at this uncomfortable corner he ate his supper with a relish that was almost contagious, and talked a good deal, in a pleasant, chirping manner, as he quaffed his ale. After supper he ventured upon a conundrum, and, that being approved, upon another; and Mrs. Hawthorndean found herself laughing quite merrily, but still with the sense that it was all a distempered dream. Dreadful as it was to be cheerful in the company of a nurse-maid and of a broker's-man, it was perhaps better for this lonely little wife than brooding over her woes. She slept quite soundly after the toasted cheese and the conundrums, and awoke next morning to find the cheerful Hannah at her bedside with a neatly-arranged little breakfast-tray.

"It was Mr. Jifins as told me to bring you up your breakfast, ma'am. 'Let her sleep a little late, poor pretty!' he said, 'and take her a cup of tea and a new-laid egg when she wakes;' and—would you believe it, mum?—the old dear goes and fetches the egg himself, while I boils the kettle, though he told me it was as much as his employment was worth to step outside our door! And if he hasn't been and hearthstoned the steps before I was up, mum, and swep' the kitchen beautiful—for a handier old man I never did see; and he says, if you could pick a bit of Irish stew for your dinner, he's a rare hand at one."

Mrs. Hawthorndean did not care to pick a bit of Irish stew, nor did she affect any dish in the preparation of which the broker's-man could be manipulatively engaged; but she fully appreciated his kind wish to help her and her faithful handmaid, and thanked him prettily for his kindness when she encountered him down stairs. Before long she had still greater reason to thank him; for Toodleums suffered severely in the cutting of an upper tooth, and both nurse-maid and mother profited by grandfather Jifins's experience. The days went by slowly, but no longer made hideous to Clara Hawthorndean by her horror of Jifins, who, instead of an incubus, had proved himself an elderly angel in the house. Her chief trouble now arose from her husband's silence. The fifth day must soon elapse, and then there would be a sale, and she and her child would be turned out of doors, homeless, shelterless. No, not quite. Here Providence interposed in the humble guise of Jifins.

"My married daughter's got a room as she lets, and as is now empty; and if they've the heart to turn you out of here, you can go there and welcome," said this dingy benefactor. "There ain't no spring sofys, nor shiny steel grates; but it's that clean you might eat your victuals off the floor; and, if you don't mind a mews, it's respectable."

A mews!—where would not the desolate mother have gone to obtain shelter for her baby?

"Oh, Mr. Jifins!" she cried, clasping one of those grimy hands, which had once inspired her with such aversion, "what should we do without you?"

What, indeed! The last shilling of that last sovereign had been spent two days ago, and since then the little household had been sustained by money advanced by Jifins.

"You'll pay me fast enough, one of these odd days, I dessay," said Jifins, when Clara deprecated this last obligation.

For the first time since she left home she wrote to ask a favor from her mother. The boon she demanded was a five-pound note, wherewith to pay and reward Jifins. Never before had she allowed the home-friends to know that her Augustus left her with one wish ungratified.

The fifth day expired. The hour of doom was near. Strange men in paper-caps came to take up the carpets. The dear little china-closet, in which Clara had so delighted, when the housemaid would allow her to enter it, was rifled of its contents, and dinner-services, tea-services, and glass were spread on the dining-room table. Bills were stuck on the outside of the house; within, nasty little bits of paper, with numbers on them, were pasted upon every article, even—oh, bitterest drop in this cup of bitterness!—on the sacred bassinot of Toodleums, still a martyr to his teeth. Ignominy could go no further; and there were still no tidings of the Captain. But for Jifins and Hannah, Clara Hawthorndean must surely have died of this agony.

It was the very morning of the sale. Mr. Absalom was there in all his glory. The auctioneer had arrived. Dingy men with greasy little memorandum-books pervaded the house. Clara sat with Hannah and the baby in the little study, where strange faces peered in upon them every now and then; and intending buyers made heartless remarks about the curtains, and informed the dingy commission-agents how high they were disposed to bid for the Captain's pet chair. There was no corner of the house sacred to the homeless woman's despair. Clara felt that it would have been almost better to sit in the street. The most unfriendly doorstep would have been a more peaceful resting-place than this.

Alas, in this bitter crisis even the faithful Jifins can no longer protect her. He is sent hither and thither by the higher powers, and can not yet snatch half an hour's respite in which to conduct Mrs. Hawthorndean to the humble lodging he has secured for her.

"Oh, Hannah, I wish Mr. Jifins would take us away from all these dreadful people!" Clara cries, piteously. She has ceased to hope for rescue from Augustus. That ship has foundered, and Jifins is the life-boat of benevolence that must carry her to the shore of safety.

"Oh, Hannah, if he would only take us to his daughter's house in the mews!" she cries; and in the next moment a hansom tears up to the door, a stentorian voice breaks into exclamations of surprise and indignation, interspersed with execrations. A shrill scream breaks from the young wife's pale lips.

"Gus!" she cries, while Toodleums sets up a sympathetic shriek; "oh, thank God! thank God!" and she must have fallen but for Hannah's supporting arms.

Yes; it is the Captain, dressed in black, and with a crape hat-band. He distributes his anathemas freely as he strides into the villa. What the dash is the meaning of this dashed business? Take down those dashed bills, and turn these dashed people out of the house; and so on. Mr. Absalom advances politely, and suggests that if the Captain will be so kind as to settle that little affair of £326 17s. 6d. the sale need not proceed. The Captain pulls out a brand-new check-book, and signs his first check upon a brand-new banking-account, which document he hands to Mr. Absalom with an injured air.

"You ought to have known better, Absalom," he said, "after all our past dealing."

"To tell you the truth, Captain, it was my experience of the past that made me rather sharp in the present," replied the other, politely.

"Come, Clara, don't cry," exclaimed Captain Hawthorne to the poor little woman, who was sobbing on his shoulder. "I didn't get your letter till yesterday afternoon, and have been traveling ever since; I was away with a party in the mountains. And there's been a dreadful piece of work at Strathnairn—my cousin Douglas, Sir John's only son, killed by the explosion of his rifle. No one to blame but himself, poor beg—poor dear fellow! Sir John's awfully cut up, as well he may be; and I'm next heir to the title and estates. Yes, little woman, you'll be Lady Strathnairn before you die; for my uncle will never marry, poor old boy! Very dreadful, ain't it, poor Douglas's death? but, of course, uncommonly jolly for us."

"Oh, Gus, how awful for Sir John! But, thank God, you have come back! You can never understand what I've suffered; and if it hadn't been for Mr. Jiffins—"

"Jiffins! who the dooce is Jiffins?"

"The man in possession. He has been so good to us—has lent us money even; and but for him we must have starved."

"Good God, Clara!" cried the Captain, aghast, "you don't mean to say you've degraded yourself by borrowing money from a broker's man!"

"What could I do, dear? You left me without any money, you know," replied the wife, innocently.

"You really ought to have known better, Clara," said the Captain, sternly. "But where is this Jiffins? Let me pay the fellow his confounded loan."

"I think you'd better let me pay it, dear. If you'll give me a ten-pound note, I can make it all right."

So Mr. Jiffins received about a thousand per cent. for his loan, which had been little more than a sovereign, and he spent New-Year's-day very pleasantly in the bosom of his married daughter's household, No. 7½ Stamford Mews, Blackfriars. But perhaps at some future audit, when many such small accounts are balanced before the Great Auditor, Mr. Jiffins may receive even more than a thousand per cent. for that little loan.

CHAPTER XVI.

OTTO BELIEVES IN FAIRY TALES.

"Is it you, Otto?" exclaimed Liese, raising the lamp above her head and looking out into the darkness.

"Yes, Lieschen; I and no other, and I must come in for a moment. I want to speak to you."

"Mistress is out, and master too, and—who was that with you, Otto?"

"That is a relation of mine. Halloo! Why, where has he vanished to? Never mind. He would not have wished to come in here, in any case. Shut the door, Lieschen, and go in out of the cold."

Otto did not wait for permission to enter, but stepped into the hall and shut the heavy oak door with a clanging noise. Little Liese's strength would scarcely have sufficed to close it against the sudden furious gust of March wind that came swooping and shrieking round the house, making the casements rattle and the old ivy beat furiously upon the glass.

"What a wind!" said Liese, shivering sympathetically.

"Yes; a bitter night enough. But I walked fast, and am all aglow. Well, Lieschen, am I to stand here in the hall all night? You might ask a fellow to step inside to the kitchen fire. I'm afraid you're not over and above glad to see me."

"It is not that, Otto. You know I am glad to see you. But about asking you to come in—I don't know—I am not sure it would be right. Master and mistress are both out, and—"

"All the better. We can talk quietly. Now see, Lieschen, I am not one to thrust myself into another man's house, or to go where I'm not wanted. But I am very sure there is no harm in my coming to speak to you to-night. I don't wish to deceive your mistress. Tell her that I have been here, if you like. But I must say a word to you."

Liese meekly led the way to the kitchen. She trembled a little as she did so. What could Otto have to say to her that must be said then and there? Besides, she could not repress an uneasy twinge of conscience when she reflected that to receive him at all was to act contrary to her mistress's injunctions.

"I can not allow you to have visitors. There must be nobody admitted to my house without my permission," Frau von Schleppers had said over and over again. But then Otto thought it right to come in. And what Otto thought right it was impossible for gentle little Liese to think wrong.

She set her lamp down on the snowy deal table in the kitchen, and Otto came and took her hand and stood beside her, looking into her soft, brown eyes until they drooped beneath his gaze.

"I hope there is nothing the matter, Otto?" she said, timidly.

"I hope not, Lieschen. But I can not tell yet how things may be. Listen to what I have to say to you."

Then he related to her how Herr Schmitt, who, as she knew, had long been ailing, had been ordered by the doctor to leave Detmold for the mild climate of Southern France. How the business was to be given up, and the stock of the stationer's shop sold, and how he, Otto, was consequently out of employment, and would have to seek an occupation as soon as might be. Liese was very sorry for Herr Schmitt. She liked him because he had been kind to Otto, and at first she could only think how strange and sad it would be for the invalid to go away alone to a foreign country, and how Otto would miss his good friend and master. Then another consideration arose in her mind.

"Does your uncle the Herr Küster know?" she asked.

"He does not know as yet. A letter has been written to him, and I am going to Horn myself to-morrow morning."

"I wonder what he will say!" murmured Liese, musingly.

"I'm afraid I know what he will say, partly. He will want me to find another situation in some shop or other. Now that I don't mean to acteristic practicalness to enter into any vague or abstract discussion.

"You know, Lieschen," he went on, "that I never liked this shop work. I never would have consented to enter into the business for three years, only that I knew Uncle Schnarcher had been dreadfully disappointed at my refusing to be a clergyman, and I thought somehow that I ought to make him what amends I could without going against my conscience."

"Yes; I know, Otto. And I think it was quite right to obey your uncle."

"Right to obey in some things, and right to disobey in others. But then, you see, all the time I have been with Herr Schmitt I have been growing more and more sure that I can't make a thriving tradesman. It's no use. He himself says as much, although he is very good to me, and, I believe, likes me in his heart."

Liese thought in her heart that it must be a very strange person who would not like Otto. But she kept this opinion to herself for the present.

"Now chance has released me from this employment in a way that nobody could have foreseen. I am fond of Herr Schmitt, and if I could make him well again by staying out my three years, I'd do it gladly."

"I am sure you would, Otto."

"Of course. But, as it is, we must hope that

"NO, OTTO, NOT A LITTLE; I LOVE YOU WITH ALL MY HEART."

do. At least—Sich' mal, Lieschen! I can't explain to you what a strong feeling it was that made me come here to-night. It was just as though something or somebody outside of myself was drawing me, whether I would or no. I couldn't have staid away to save my life. Did you never feel like that, Lieschen?"

Liese shook her head doubtfully.

"I often wish very much to go to Horn and take a peep at dear cousin Franz. And sometimes, even when I am sitting by myself in the kitchen of an evening, I can fancy myself at the farm, and can see all the place, and hear the goats bleating, and the geese cackling, and Lotte and Marthe singing at the spinning-wheel. But then, you know, of course it's only fancy; and I can't go there, though I might wish it ever so."

"Not 'ever so,' Liese. If you wished it 'ever so'—if you wished it as strong as I wished to come here to-night—why you'd have to go. You couldn't help yourself."

Liese looked up for a moment into Otto's bright, resolute face, and then observed, with a little demure air of reflection, "Ah well, you see, Otto, I suppose it is because I can't wish nor do anything so strong as you can. At least I never find that I get what I want by wishing."

"Well, never mind about that, Lieschen. Here I am; and I have a great many things to say to you," returned Otto, declining with charface, and dropped into a wooden settle by the hearth.

Otto came and sat down beside her.

"Now, Lieschen," he said, in a broken, agitated voice, "that is not kind of you to hide yourself from me in that way. I love you so much, so much, Lieschen, that I couldn't but hope you would love me a little."

A stifled sob was heard beneath the comical shelter little Liese had devised for herself; but no articulate sound came forth from behind the checked apron.

"Liese! I couldn't have believed you would be cruel. Not a word, not a look in answer! Don't you—don't you love me a little, Liese?"

Slowly the apron was drawn down over the shining brown braids of hair, which it ruffled in its passage—drawn down low enough to show a strip of fair forehead, and a faint monosyllable was breathed into Otto's impatient ears.

"No."

"No! Ach, Lieschen!"

Again the apron was pulled very slowly over the chestnut eyebrows, and the tear-stained eyes, and the delicate little nose, and the innocent mouth: pulled down from brow to chin, until Liese's face was all revealed, and in trembling heart-felt tones she murmured, "No, Otto, not a little; I love you with all my heart."

And then she clasped her arms around his neck, and nestled her head down upon his breast, with the confiding, innocently loving gesture of a child. Otto held her to his heart for a while in silence. Presently he took her drooping head between his hands, and, raising it, looked into her eyes.

"Ach, Lieschen, wicked little Lieschen! to say 'no' at first."

"But you didn't believe me, Otto?"

"Well, herchen, I did hope you would love me, because, you see, we had grown up together as it were, and we were both orphans, and we always used to come to each other when we stood in need of a soft word or a kind look. So I did think it was natural you should love me, that's the truth."

"But oh, Otto!" exclaimed Lieschen, opening her brown eyes very wide, as though she saw something that terrified her, "oh, Otto! what will they say?"

"Who, 'they,' mein schatz?"

"The Herr Küster, and Frau von Schleppers, and cousin Hanne."

Liese did not doubt what cousin Franz would say if he could be left to follow the promptings of his heart.

"As to Frau von Schleppers, I don't see what she has to do with the matter. I hope Uncle Schnarcher and Frau Lehmann will say what they ought to say. But any way, Lieschen, you must not let yourself be frightened, or scolded, or caajoled out of loving me."

"Why, Otto! do you think any body could do that? You ought not even to think of such a thing."

"No, darling, I ought not, and in reality I do not. But what I meant was that you must not allow yourself to be frightened into giving me up. We are pledged to each other now, Lieschen. I will be true to you as long as I live; and you will be steadfast and true to me, won't you, my own dearest?"

"Yes, Otto, I will."

The words were uttered quite simply, but there was a solemnity and resolution in Liese's eyes as she spoke which Otto had never seen in them before.

"Thanks, heart's thanks, my own true love. Now I must tell you my plans, or rather my hopes. You are to be my little wife, you know, Lieschen, and we must consult together. First of all, when I go to Horn to-morrow, I shall tell Uncle Schnarcher that you are my betrothed, and that I shall never marry any one but you."

"Oh, Otto!"

"Don't tremble so, you silly little bird! You were so brave just now. There. Well, as I was saying, I shall tell my uncle that good news—the best I ever had to tell—and I shall say to him that since I am thrown out of employment by Herr Schmitt's going away, and have my living to seek, I mean to apply for a situation as one of the Prince's jägers. Should you like that, Lieschen?"

"Yes; I should like it very much, Otto—"

"Say 'dear Otto,' won't you?"

"Very much, dear Otto. But do you think the Herr Küster would like it? He is rather proud, you know—of course, being so respected, and so—so old. At least, I don't mean that he is proud exactly because he's old. But he is used to have his own way. And your father was head-ranger, you know, Otto; and I'm afraid Herr Schnarcher will think that for you to be only a jäger would be a coming down like."

Otto was not without misgivings on his own part, but he set himself to encourage Liese. If he could but bring his case under the Prince's notice, he thought his highness would surely show him some kindness for the sake of his father, the late head-ranger.

Yes; little Liese thought that likely enough. Otto spoke also of the rumored departure of the Von Grolls, and the consequent promotion of the Justizrath. He (Otto) built greatly on this change for the bettering of his own fortunes. Major von Groll was unpopular in Detmold, but Lawyer von Schleppers was much the reverse. Did not Liese think that the Justizrath would say a good word for Otto to the Prince if he had the power to do so? Liese hesitated.

"Every one speaks well of the Justizrath, Liese," said Otto; "but you who live in his house ought to know best what sort of a man he is in reality. Is he not a kind master?"

"Y—yes," said Liese, slowly.

"And a just man? And a faithful servant to his highness?"

"Oh yes, yes, Otto; the Herr Justizrath is a good man, of course. He must be. Yes; I am quite sure he is. But—

"But what, Lieschen?"

"Well, you asked me, Otto, and I must say what I think, mustn't I?"

"Say what you think?" echoed Otto, in a tone of as much surprise as though one had asked him whether walking on one's feet were not preferable to walking on one's hands. "To be sure, herzen, always say what you think."

"Well then, Otto, I must confess that I always—somehow—mistrust the Justizrath."

"Mistrust him, my Lieschen? For what reason?"

"No reason, Otto; it's only a feeling."

Otto looked grave.

"Oh, I dare say I am quite wrong, dear Otto. Please don't think any more about it. You know how foolishly frightened of people I am sometimes, without any reason at all."

Otto had been about to assume the responsibilities of his new position as Liese's affianced, and to lecture her about the injustice of harboring mistrust and suspicion "without any real reason at all." But on looking downward with a somewhat stern expression at the little head which still nestled on his shoulder, his eyes encountered Liese's, upraised beseechingly, and he changed his mind, and kissed her forehead instead.

"Well, Lieschen," he said, "I shall speak to the Justizrath, nevertheless, the very first chance I get. And I think that when he hears about my father, and the way he died—I think, I say, that the Justizrath will help me."

Liese started up and looked at the kitchen clock.

"You must go now, Otto," she exclaimed; "it is half past eight o'clock. Mistress is at Frau von Groll's—she goes there nearly every night now—and master is spending the evening at the 'Blue Pigeon,' as usual; but he will go to the Major's to fetch mistress before nine. I expect them both every moment. Do go, dear Otto."

"It seems so hard to be hurried off before I have had time to say a word to you, Lieschen!"

"Why, Otto, we have been talking here more than an hour!"

"Have we? Well, I have not said half that I came to say. I wanted to tell you all about my new-found relation, and a hundred other things. But you are right—I must go. I gave my word to Gottlieb to be back before nine. Good-night, treasure of my heart! Do you know, I can hardly believe that you have promised to be my wife, my own for evermore! It changes all the world for me so!"

"Good-night, mein bester Otto. Shall you—shall you see cousin Franz at Horn to-morrow? But I won't ask you any more questions. You must go."

"Yes, liebchen; I am going. Let me look at your sweet face once more. So."

"No, no, Otto. You must go now—now, this very minute. I tremble to think of their finding you here."

"But they must know sooner or later, darling."

"Yes, yes; but then I shall tell mistress myself—of my own accord—and that will be different. But to have you found here, like one who had stolen in like a thief—? Oh, do go, Otto, if you love me!"

For one instant he clasped her in his arms, and the two young, guileless hearts were pressed together. Then he fairly ran down the passage, opened the heavy door, and issued forth into the bleak night.

But had it been a tepid, perfume-laden breeze from Armida's garden, instead of the hungry wind raging landward from the Baltic, which saluted Otto's face as he turned away from the Justizrath's door, he could not have looked more thoroughly enchanted than he did.

His eyes beamed, his cheeks glowed, and his mouth shaped itself into a dreamy smile—an expression very rare on his face.

Lieschen loved him! Dear, gentle, modest, true-hearted little Lieschen was his promised bride. Doubts and fears!—pooh!—no such things existed any longer. Nothing could go ill since Lieschen loved him. Wild visions that he had sometimes cherished when a child, of running away into the heart of the forest, and there building a safe retreat where he and Lieschen might dwell alone together, flitted through his memory. He laughed softly as he thought of these boyish fancies, but somehow they did not seem all impossible now. It appeared to him that all this beautiful and happy things had become possible; and if the old Kindermärchen had suddenly been realized before him, and Lieschen had begun to drop pearls and diamonds and roses out of her pretty mouth on to the floor of the Justizrath's kitchen, Otto believed that it would all have appeared quite natural, and according to the usual course of events.

For Lieschen loved him! And what fairy story that has ever been said or sung could surpass the magical enchantment of that delicious fact?

As he passed the leafless hedge, with a step even more swift and buoyant than usual, he brushed against some one crouching down beneath its scanty shelter.

"Lieber Himmel! Cousin Joachim, is that you? What, in the name of all that's wonderful, makes you stay there in this bitter, windy night?"

Otto was not too much engrossed by his own happiness to be aware of the fact that for ordinary mortals, whom Liese was not in love with, the weather was decidedly inclement.

"I have waited to see you. I don't mind the wind or the cold. I'm used to them. Tell me, who is she? Who is the maiden I saw in yonder house?"

"The maiden in yonder house! Was zum teufel! Cousin Joachim, what makes you so anxious to know?"

"No matter; only answer me, Otto. I pray you to answer me! Who is she? What is her name?"

"Her name is Elizabeth—usually called Liese—Lehmann."

"Lehmann?"

"Yes; she is a relation of Franz Lehmann, the farmer at Horn, and is in service here in Detmold. I have known her nearly all her life. And, now that I have satisfied your curiosity, perhaps you will answer my question, and tell me why you take such a strange interest in the maiden!"

The charcoal-burner heaved a long, quivering sigh.

"Ach Gott!" he exclaimed, hoarsely, "she is so like—so like some one I knew long, long ago. With being so much alone, my head gets hold of strange fancies at times. When I first saw her face with the light shining on it I took her for a spirit from another world."

"Well, she is beautiful enough to be an angel—Heaven bless her!—and good enough, too. But you must not fall in love with her, cousin Joachim, for I will let you into a secret—she is my betrothed bride."

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A. AND F.—You will require from a pound to a pound and a half of double zephyr for a gentleman's scarf. Chinchilla and scarlet is a suitable combination for a dark complexion. The wool is from $8 20 to $4 50 a pound.

NEMA.—A muslin dress elaborately trimmed with puffs and ruffles, high neck and long sleeves, is not too youthful for you. It can always be kept fresh, and is more serviceable and more lady-like than an alpaca. Read description in the New York Fashions of this Number. Wear a lavender sash and bow at the throat with your Etruscan jewelry, or a black sash with the jet ornaments. Half a dozen muslin dresses without any lace, at $30 apiece, were recently made for a stylish widow of thirty-five leaving off mourning. She will wear them all winter for evening, and next summer they will serve for handsome morning dresses. She sometimes wears over a black silk trained dress a long puffed over-skirt and square bodice of white organdy. We think it is too soon for your green silk. If you insist on the alpaca or empress cloth make a trained skirt with deep flounce, headed with a ruche of lavender silk, a panier, belt, and side bow, with the Louis XV. corsage described on another page.

FANNIE.—Have the slippers made by all means, as you would not wish your gift to be an expense to your friend. A tobacco-satchel embroidered by your own fingers, or an easy-chair with a centre strip of your own needle-work, a cigar-case, needle-worked drapery for a bracket, a monogram seal, a smoking-cap, or crocheted wristlets, are among the many simple things you might present a gentleman. If you do not mind expense you will find a wide range in the way of bronzed and carved wood inkstands, book-racks, smoking cabinets, dispatch-cases, etc.

S. A. F.—Shape the poplin skirt in the side-seams to imitate gores. Plain high waist, with basque flaps at the belt. Coat-sleeves. Trim with a ruche of scarlet silk notched and pleated, and a narrower white ruche set in the centre of the scarlet one.

MRS. ANGELL AND OTHERS.—To knit 1 crossed, instead of knitting in the ordinary manner insert the needle in the back of the stitch to be knitted, after which knit as usual. In working backward and forward it is needful the purl stitch correspond with the knitted. Hold the right-hand needle nearly parallel with that in the left hand and behind it. Insert the point in the stitch, and bring it out with that of the left hand. Now purl as usual.

MIN.—The juice of the lemon would, if frequently applied, injure the teeth.—If there is a perfect accord in other respects, we should say that the difference of fifteen or twenty years between your age and that of the man you "love very much" ought not to be an insuperable obstacle to matrimony.—Most people require three meals a day.—There is no strengthening of the voice but regular and moderate exercise of the vocal organs, with proper attention to the general health.

MRS. D. L. O.—Apples will probably fatten if eaten in the large quantity you mention, and provided they do not disorder the stomach. Vegetables are generally more nutritious than fruit.

MARIE L.—Read answer to Fannie for gifts for gentlemen.—Make your suit with a plain petticoat, an over-dress en paniers, and a short polka basque fitting over the hips, such as we have frequently described to other correspondents. There should be a pleated ruffle on the petticoat, but you will not have enough for that. You ask if the paniers are worn by genteel people. We tell you yes, although many other fashion writers say differently. More than two-thirds of the well-dressed people in New York wear them. By well-dressed we mean refined and tasteful dressing. The rumor is, that they will not be worn after this season.

NETTIE F.—The "bran wash" may be used as often as you have time to apply it, and need not be "rinsed off."

REV. W. H. C.—OF VINCENNES, INDIANA, writes: "I see in this week's paper an article respecting the use of electricity in cases of overdose of opium, and simply as a scientific fact I would state that, about twelve years ago, I used galvanism in the case of a person who had taken too much laudanum, and was successful in saving his life."

EVELINE.—We know nothing of the "hair restoratives" to which you allude. See Bazar No. 55.—The acceptance of an invitation to a wedding does not involve the necessity of giving a present.

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "I see that memorial tablets are to be erected, under the auspices of the Society of Arts, on the London residences, of Benjamin Franklin, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Lord Nelson, and James Barry, R.A. This is following a custom of the Continent, and particularly, I believe, of Germany. Would it not be well to adopt this, with regard to some of our departed worthies, in New York and other cities of the Union?" We answer: It might, certainly, if the houses would stay put; for we have had, undoubtedly, a sufficient number of great men; but the difficulty is, that the men's memory is very short-lived, and the houses are still more perishable. "There is not a gentleman in New York," says the venerable Gulian C. Verplanck, the representative of the best society of the old régime in the city—"there is not a representative of an old family now living in the house occupied by his grandfather."

HOWARD.—Clytia, Clytie, or Clyte was, according to the classical dictionaries, a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys beloved by Apollo. She was deserted by her lover, who courted Leucothoe. In her anger she disclosed the amour to the father of the latter, and Apollo was so much enraged that he turned her into a sunflower. There is an antique bust in the British Museum which is known by the name of Clyte, and casts of it in plaster are sold about in our streets. The original belonged to a Lord Townshend, whose home was sacked during the Lord George Gordon or "No Popery" riots of London. His "Clyte" was all that he saved from the wreck, and this he carried out hidden beneath his cloak. The bust is identified.

W. D.—In the book called "The Opium Habit," published by the Harpers, you will find answers to your questions.

POLITENESS.—Lift the hat well from the head. The "simple nod" is not respectful enough when saluting a lady.

EMMIE HALL.—See Bazar Nos. 56 and 58.

MARY.—In raised Berlin work one or more prominent objects in a design are raised; the remainder being done in cross-stitch. Birds, animals, and flowers look handsome when so worked. Do all the plain parts first. Then thread needles with the various shades you want, and obtain fine flat netting meshes. Begin from the left-hand corner, lowest part, with the proper shade, the wool being doubled. Bring the needle up between the two upright threads of the first cross-stitch. Take a tapestry-stitch to the left, bringing the needle out in the same hole. Put the wool round the mesh, and take one to the right, the needle coming out again the same X. Thread around the mesh, and take a tapestry-stitch from the hole of the last down to the right, the wool to the right of it. Thread round. One to the right X. A figure V is thus constantly formed on the wrong side. When done wash at the back with gum; cut the loops, and shear them into shape from the pattern, giving proper thickness and form to each part. Sometimes this is done across one thread only.

MRS. E. P. W.—We are not responsible for the advertisements in our columns. We have inclosed your letter to the parties mentioned.

SEVILLA.—Dress your "little sunbeam" in a blue velvet slip simply made, low in the neck, short sleeves, half loose at the belt and reaching to the knee. Edge it with a thick satin piping. Some fine lace borders the neck. Seat him before a mirror (an oval mirror is prettiest) in order that the picture may give you a view of him back and front, a near and a distant view. The position he will himself assume will be more graceful and natural than any studied one.

MARIA.—Make your claret merino with two skirts and a short polka basque. A pleated flounce is on the lower skirt, a quilling of half the width on the upper skirt and basque. Make a pointed hood or a small pelerine cape lined with flannel to wear with the basque.

MRS. E. S. M.—In answer to your appreciative and suggestive letter we will continue to give from time to time full information about plain dresses, prints, aprons, capes, etc. At present in regard to an inexpensive costume that is to do service for the street, visiting, church, etc., we are reminded that the serviceable French merinos are coming into fashion again along with all twilled goods, and that they are much more durable than the frail black alpaca. Make a short gored dress with pleated flounce and a belted polonaise, with large cape lined with flannel or wadded. Trim to match the skirt. The bonnet is a black or yellowish straw with a feather across the front and a large rosette with ends behind.

WIDOW OF POETRY.—There is no impropriety in what you propose if you have confidence in the introducer. The samples you send are Irish poplin, which is silk and worsted. Tell "Bub" he talks as if he were old enough to have outgrown the old fashion of wearing a roll on top of his head, as well as the signature he assumes. Part your hair where it is most becoming, cut it rather short, and let it wave or curl naturally.

LILLIE MARY.—Wear your hair in a waterfall. Draw it up well from your neck that it may not grow too low there.

[Mrs. Secretary McCulloch's Report.]

NO DECLINE IN HOUSEHOLD TREASURES.

TEN years ago I purchased a WHEELER & WILSON SEWING MACHINE, and have had it in constant use in my family ever since. We used it during the war to make clothing for our volunteers in the service and for the hospitals, and this work was very heavy, being coarse woolen and cotton fabrics. It is still in good working order, nothing having been broken but a few needles.

You are welcome to use my name in your recommendations.

MRS. HUGH McCULLOCH,

Wife of Secretary U. S. Treasury, Washington.
To Messrs. WHEELER & WILSON.

BURNETT'S FLORIMEL, also BURNETT'S COLOGNE-WATER (three sizes).—There is a freshness in these delightful perfumes found in no others. New York Branch, 592 Broadway (Metropolitan Hotel Building). For sale by druggists and fancy-goods dealers in the principal cities of the United States.

LADIES' WATCHES.—A. C. BENEDICT, No. 28 Bowery, has the largest retail stock of Ladies' Watches in the city. They have been made to order especially for Mr. BENEDICT, and will be sold at very low prices, and warranted.—[Com.]

It is said that Calisaya Bark has a peculiar effect upon the liver, and guards the system against diseases by exposure and irregular diet. It is conceded that the great success of the wonderful PLANTATION BITTERS, which, previous to our late unhappy difficulties, was found in most Southern homes, was owing to the extract of Calisaya Bark which it contained as one of the principal ingredients. In confirmation of this, we have heard one of our distinguished physicians remark that, whenever he felt unwell from ordinary dietetic or atmospheric causes, he invariably relieved himself by PLANTATION BITTERS. We speak advisedly when we say that we know it to be the best and most popular medicine in the world.—Times.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

AMERICAN CHROMOS.—"One of the latest and finest of PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS is 'California Sunset,' after A. BIERSTADT. It is vivid in coloring, and mountains, lakes, and clouds glow with golden hues. As a landscape it shows marked progress in the style of pictorial printing, while it has the added value of representing a rich example of the grandest scenery of this continent."—Transcript.

which we sell at the low price of 30 cents per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

ROASTED (unground), 30c., 35c.; best, 40c. per lb.

GREEN (unroasted), 25c., 30c., 35c.; best, 35c. per lb.

Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the custom-house stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

N.B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the express charges) by sending directly to the

"GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

POST-OFFICE Orders and Drafts make payable to the Order of

"THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

Direct Letters and Orders as below (no more, no less):

I have made a chemical analysis of the preparation for the teeth known as "SOZODONT," for Messrs. HALL & RUCKEL, the object of the analysis being to ascertain whether it contains substances detrimental to the teeth or gums.

An impartial sample of the "SOZODONT" was purchased by me personally from a leading Drug House of this city, and carefully analyzed for acids and other corrosive or injurious ingredients likely to have a detrimental action on the teeth or gums, but nothing of an objectionable character was found in its composition. "The Rightful Heir" is worthy of the author's reputation. The action is clear and natural, the situations are striking and original, and the entire piece, in addition to freshness of conception and power of treatment, has a unity of idea and an artistic finish such as raise it far above the most ambitious of modern plays.—Athenaeum.

The structure of the piece, the structure of the verse, the incidents, the dialogue, have been one and all of them carefully reconceived and remodeled—have, in point of fact, with inimitable skill and admirable dexterity, been re-elaborated throughout. Touches of nature there are scattered lavishly through this minutely-prepared masterpiece.—London Sun.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine, Weekly, and Bazar. These three periodicals fully merit the high encomiums which they have received from the press, and the support which has been given them by the reading public. Whether one considers their beautiful and instructive illustrations, which leave untouched no subject of domestic or foreign importance—their literary merit, which has given them the highest place in the current literature—or their judicious editorial management—they must be emphatically pronounced the three best family periodicals in the world.—The Advance: Chicago.

Now is the Time to Subscribe.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It is one of the wonders of journalism—the editorial management of HARPER'S.—Nation.

It meets precisely the popular taste, furnishing a pleasing and instructing variety of reading for all.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

The model newspaper of our country—complete in all the departments of an American family paper—HARPER'S WEEKLY has earned for itself a right to its title, "A Journal of Civilization."—N. Y. Evening Post.

The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY from week to week form a remarkable series of brief political essays. They are distinguished by clear and pointed statements, by good common-sense, by independence and breadth of view. They are the expression of mature conviction, high principle, and strong feeling, and take their place among the best newspaper writing of the time.—North American Review.

This paper furnishes the best illustrations. Our future historians will enrich themselves out of HARPER'S WEEKLY long after writers and printers and publishers are turned to dust.—New York Evangelist.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

A Supplement containing numerous full-sized patterns of useful articles accompanies the paper every fortnight, and occasionally an elegant Colored Fashion Plate.

HARPER'S BAZAR contains 16 folio pages of the size of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superfine calendered paper, and is published weekly.

HARPER'S BAZAR contains, besides pictures, patterns, etc., a variety of matter of especial use and interest to the family; articles on health, dress, and housekeeping in all its branches; its editorial matter is specially adapted to the circle it is intended to interest and instruct; and it has, besides, good stories and literary matter of merit.—New York Evening Post.

FACETIÆ.

HOROSCOPE FOR 1869.

January.—Corus will be troublesome this month, but all evil effects from them may be obviated by a careful study of Bunyan's works. Children cutting their teeth must be careful how they use the razors, or we can not be answerable for the consequences.

February.—By applying at the General Post-Office on the 14th of this month you may ascertain how many foolish people there are in the country.

March.—This month being March, of course March hares will be abundant. Thousands of persons will make themselves ill by eating hot cross buns.

April.—There may be an eruption of Vesuvius about now, and I should advise all the inhabitants of the surrounding towns to quit the country. On second thoughts, perhaps they had better remain where they are, as there may not be an eruption after all. My latest information from the dear crater is not very precise.

May.—Many monarchs will tremble in their shoes about now, and out of them too probably. In the significance of this statement I need only point out the fact that May and monarchy begin with the same letter. Prophecies have often been made on less grounds than this.

June.—The end of the world approaches. This may do for many other months; but the value of the prediction is that nobody can deny it. Look out! its fulfillment is Cumming.

July.—There will now be some hot days, as indicated by the rise of the thermometer. Temperers will rise in consequence, and we may look for thunder-storms.

August.—Dog days will be on us. Animals will be running about for water in a half-mad condition.

September.—There will be no shooting stars visible in the metropolis this month; they may be found in the country, though principally on the moors. Rail up fruit trees now; if you haven't got any, borrow some of your neighbors. You may also sow vegetable seeds for a spring crop, but you had better postpone sowing wild oats.

October.—Napoleon is just about to declare war against the King of Prussia; but, receiving a copy of the first yearly volume of Harper's Bazar, which has just been sent to him, he telegraphs to stay hostilities until he has perused the interesting work. On finishing it he postpones the war altogether, and takes to writing for the Bazar.

November.—Dark days are upon us, and, as a corollary, dark deeds. Burglars will be abroad, and I should advise their victims not to be "abroad" too. Half-quarter day being in this month, there will be many "flittings" by the pale moonlight. As a natural consequence rents will be invisible, except in the garments of street Arabs.

December.—Harper's Bazar will become more and more popular—in fact, a general favorite with all classes of the community. Though there may be occasionally a mistake in the foregoing predictions, I stake my honor as an astrologer upon this last prophecy. The stars are at cross purposes in several other matters, but in this they are perfectly harmonious and unanimous.

WOMEN'S RIGHTS.

YOUNG LADY. "Father, have you ever heard a Lecture on Women's Rights?"
PARENT. "Well, yes, I may say I have; and it has lasted for the past twenty years."

BORROWED PLUMES.

PHOTOGRAPHER (to old party who has been shilly-shallying about her carte for ever so long). "You'd better have it Done this Morning, Madam; there's a beautiful Light."
THE LADY. "So I intended, Mr. Fokers, and I'd decided to be taken like 'Mabel Grey!' and there's that stupid Man has never sent my Hair home!"

LANGUAGE OF THE HANDKERCHIEF.

"The handkerchief, the handkerchief!" ejaculated the jealous Moor, and killed his loving Desdemona because she failed to respond. Fans and flowers have each their language, and why not handkerchiefs? No reason having been discovered, it has transpired that handkerchief flirtations are rapidly coming into fashion. As yet the "code of signals" is confined to a select few, but we do not intend that they shall enjoy the monopoly any longer, and accordingly publish the key. Our informant says that it may be used at the Opera, theatre, balls, and such places, but never in church; and we hope that this restriction will be observed, and are quite sure that it won't.

Drawing across the lips—Desirous of an acquaintance.

Drawing across the eyes—I am sorry.

Taking it by the centre—You are too willing.

Dropping—We will be friends.

Twirling in both hands—Indifference.

Drawing it across the cheek—I love you.

Drawing through the hands—I hate you.

Letting it rest on the right cheek—Yes!

Letting it rest on the left cheek—No.

Twirling it in the left hand—I wish to be rid of you.

Twirling it in the right hand—I love another.

Folding it—I wish to speak with you.

Over the shoulder—Follow me.

Opposite corners in both hands—Wait for me.

Drawing across the forehead—We are watched.

Placing on right ear—You have changed.

Letting it remain on the eyes—You are cruel.

Winding around forefinger—I am engaged.

Winding around third finger—I am married.

Putting it in the pocket—No more at present.

What debt is that for which you can not be sued?—The debt of nature.

If five and a half yards make a Pole, how many will make a Turk?

What goes most against a farmer's grain?—His mowing machine.

WATERING-PLACES THAT REMAIN OPEN ALL WINTER—The mouths of milk-cans.

Why was Noah never hungry?—Because he had Ham with him.

In reply to a young writer who wishes to know "which magazine will give me the highest position quickest," a contemporary advises "a powder magazine, if you contribute a fiery article."

A photographer in Massachusetts was recently visited by a young woman, who, with sweet simplicity, asked, "How long does it take to get a photograph after you leave your measure?"

Whoever saw the "pale of society" running over with the "milk of human kindness?" If so, where was the "cream of the joke?"

HOUSEHOLD HINTS FOR ECONOMICAL MANAGERS.

How to obtain a good, serviceable Light Porter.—Take a pint of stout, and add a quart of spring water. There you have him.
How to make Hats last.—Make every thing else first.
How to prevent Ale from spoiling.—Drink it.
How to avoid being considered above your Business.—Never live over your shop.
How to make your Servants rise.—Send them up to sleep in the attics.

A milkman sometimes resembles the whale that swallowed Jonah; for he takes a great prophet (profit) out of the water.

DEAD-ALIVE.

On reading the following advertisement we were tempted to exclaim,

"This is the very (and) whishing hour of night,
When church-yards yawn, and graves give up their dead."

The announcement, at a first glance, is startling:

HOUSEKEEPER.—A highly respectable middle-aged PERSON, who has been filling the above SITUATION with a gentleman for upward of eleven years, and who is now deceased, is anxious to meet with a similar one. Can be well recommended for kind disposition, economical habits, and household experience. Address E. B., etc.

When a respectable person, who has been eleven years housekeeper, and "who is now deceased," applies for an engagement, she may fairly plead "economical habits"—her "living" would cost nothing, of course. But we fear that a defunct housekeeper advertising for a new place is such a rarity that she is not likely to "meet with a similar one."

"Tom, why did you not marry Lucy?"

"Oh, she had a sort of hesitation in her speech, and so I left her."

"A hesitation in her speech! I never heard of that before. Are you not mistaken?"

"No, not at all; for when I asked if she would have me, she hesitated to say yes, and—so I cut her for another girl."

WHY WOMEN SHOULD VOTE.

Because one sober woman walking to the poll is better than fifteen men reeling there.
Because women would be content with smaller bribes than men, and thereby save candidates a deal of expense.

Because men have had the franchise so long, and have made such a mess of it, that women ought to be allowed a trial.

Because no woman would spend the greater part of her bribe in intoxicating liquors, and thereby would set a good example to male voters.

Because women, if much longer denied the franchise, will spitefully degenerate into men, wear male attire, use male language, adopt male imprecations, build male clubs, and refuse to dance in step.

Because, though there have been hundreds of votesses in the world, not one has been allowed to record her vote at elections.

Because mothers in possession of the franchise would be able to say, "If you'll marry one of my daughters, Mr. Allgold, I'll give you my vote and interest."

Because I, who write these reasons, want to give a vote for dear Captain— Ah! wouldn't you like to know his name?

NURSE. "Ma'am, if you do insist on Baby wearing a red cloak, I must leave. The color don't suit my complexion."

"Oh yes! he's quite the gentleman, and do dress so nice."

Mat for Table Bell.

This mat is very easily made, and is a very pretty Christmas present. Take the cover of a round box three and a half inches in diameter, and cover the outside with black velvet and the inside with black box paper. On the upper part paste a circular piece of pasteboard, which is also covered with velvet, and the size of which corresponds to the circumference of the bell. The outer edge of the cover is trimmed with a drapery of single leaves of red and white cloth, which are cut from Fig. 60 of the Supplement, and ornamented, as shown by the illustration, with point russe embroidery in the Turkish fashion; they must slightly lap over each other. The seam where the leaves are sewed on is covered with a strip of white cloth, which is also embroidered in point russe. Lastly, sew around the edge of the cover a heavy white cotton cord, which has been covered in the manner shown by the illustration with black and crystal beads.

Emery Bag simulating a Melon.

This bag imitates a melon lying on a leaf; both are covered with green cashmere. First cut for the foundation for the melon a circular piece of pasteboard of a diameter corresponding to the proposed size of the bag, and fasten in the centre of this a pasteboard tube, in the upper part of which make a number of slits, and lay back and paste down on the foundation the parts thus made. Then take a piece of muslin of the requisite width and length corresponding to the circumference of the foundation, sew the ends together, gather one side closely and overcast it to the upper edge of the tube, and the other side to the outer edge of the foundation, leaving an opening an inch and a half wide. Above this sew on a circular piece of muslin so as to cover the gathers. Then stuff this full of emery, sew up the opening, and cover the upper surface with a layer of wadding. Next prepare a circular piece of green cashmere, make a little opening in the centre and lay it over the bag so that the hole comes over the end of the tube, and wind the bag in the manner shown by the illustration with fine green silk cord, which is always run through the tube in the process.

Hold the cord tight. Fasten the edge of the cashmere to the edge of the foundation. Imitate the stem of the melon with several heavy wires, which are wound together and run through the tube; the wires are then fastened on the under side by bending them in different directions. The stem part is closely wound with green silk cord. This completes the melon. Trim the under edge in the manner shown by the illustration with little rounded leaves, which are made of double cashmere lined with muslin, embroidered in point russe, and worked on the outer edge in button-hole stitch in green silk over a wire. Make the large leaf also of double green cashmere and pasteboard lining; on the outer edge work in button-hole stitch with green silk, and work the veins with the same silk in chain stitch. On the outer edge sew a fine green silk cord. Cut the stem of the leaf of pasteboard, work it over with silk, and sew to the leaf, on which the melon is then glued. Any other colors or materials may be used, or a different combination may be made by working the point russe in yellow or gold thread, in which case the cord must, of course, correspond with the thread. If made in velvet the emery bag will form a very pretty ornament for the sewing-table. We have given no size; if it be designed merely for an emery bag, it may be made small; but if made larger, say three or four inches in diameter, it will serve also as a sewing weight. The lines dividing the sections of the melon may be worked in any suitable embroidery design, by which means the richness of the effect will be greatly enhanced.

SNOW.

By HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

Out of the dark November sky,
Into the river rushing by,
The eddying snow-flakes, far and near,
Flash and whirl as they disappear;
And behind them the dazzling crowd flocks on,
Flashes and whirls, and is utterly gone.
And still beneath the dreary sky
The restless river goes rushing by,
Hurrying down to the harbor bar,
With its shifting waves and its light-house star:
And my spirit, catching the vanishing text,
Sighs—Here one moment, but where the next?

Ah, faithless spirit! And wherefore sigh?
Hast thou forgotten who hung the sky?
Who rolled the rivers, and bade them flow
Out of the treasures of the snow?
Who brings the dew-drop sweetly up
To fill the wine in the wild-rose cup?
Shalt thou not trust thyself in his hand,
To use as his primal purpose planned?
Will that hand loose thee and let thee go?
Who fashioned thee, loved thee, forget thee so?
Shalt thou not slumber, no more perplexed,
Though—Here one moment, but where the next?

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 26, 1868.

Our next Number, the first of the New Year and of the Second Volume, will contain an elegant COLORED FASHION PLATE, prepared expressly for HARPER'S BAZAR by the MODE IL-LUSTRE of Paris.

THE CLOSE OF THE YEAR.

WITH this Number Harper's Bazar ends the first Volume of its existence. It can not suffer this epoch to pass by without acknowledging the uniform and unvarying kindness which it has received ever since its birth; from the journalistic fraternity who, with scarcely an exception, gave it a genial welcome and have always continued its firm friends; and from the public at large, who, recognizing that it filled an unsupplied want, took it at once to their hearths and homes, and extended to it a cordial and generous support. Almost unheralded, the new journal sprang, Minerva-like, full-grown, into public favor, and found itself immediately admitted as a trusted counselor and friend to the bosom of American families. We tender our warmest thanks for this welcome and this support, which have won for our paper the reputation of being the greatest success in journalism ever known.

What we promised in the outset we have carefully endeavored to perform; namely, to create a first-class instructive, amusing, and useful family paper, which should be found readable and profitable by every member of the household. A proof of success is that Harper's Bazar is read with avidity by thoughtful, earnest, and talented men in search of recreation for a leisure hour, as well as by ladies curious about the newest modes, and children eager for amusing tales. In the beginning we were forced to combat the belief that a fashion journal was necessarily unworthy the attention of any serious reader. But we never intended to be a mere fashionmonger. Mindful of the fact that the care of the wardrobe devolved on women, we have sought to render them an essential service by giving them practical instructions how to dress themselves and their families in the most fashionable, tasteful, and economical manner possible, and furnishing them with patterns the market value of which alone was worth twenty times the price of the paper. The provisions made for this were so costly and ample that Harper's Bazar immediately took rank as the largest and most beautiful weekly fashion journal in the world. Yet this is but a small part of what we have endeavored to do. Our files will show that the best talent of the country has been laid under contribution to fill our columns with the greatest possible variety of really good family reading. The editorials have striven to stem the current of extravagance, to inculcate sensible opinions, and to forward the progress of all good causes; the charming social essays, "Manners upon the Road," from the pen of one of the most distinguished writers of the day, have been pronounced unequalled since the days of the Spectator; and the poems, serial and other tales, miscellany, and articles on domestic economy, have been carefully chosen. We have studiously avoided all vexed questions in religion and politics, and have striven to make our journal an instrument of harmony in the home circle.

Such will continue to be our policy for the coming year, during which we hope to add new attractions, and to grow more and more worthy of the favor that has been so generously accorded us. With this wish, and with hearts filled with peace and good-will to all men, we bid our patrons farewell for the nonce, trusting to greet them all again, together with their friends and their friends' friends, at the opening of the New Year that is dawning upon us.

WHAT TO GIVE?

AT the approach of the season commemorative of the Divine love all Christian hearts, inspired by the Omnipresent beneficence, expand with an unusual feeling of mutual kindness. This sentiment naturally seeks expression in acts of generosity, and each one is thinking of "What to Give?"

There are many with plenty of means and the most liberal disposition to use them freely who are yet greatly puzzled to know "what to give." Gifts should be adapted to the class of persons upon whom they are bestowed. Social position, age, and degrees of relationship and intimacy must have a controlling influence. The master and man, the maid and mistress, the formal acquaintance and bosom friend, the husband and wife, the parent and child, the brother and sister, are not to be treated alike. In some cases the gift should only give expression to the sentiment of love, affection, or courtesy; in others, it should be a substantial manifestation of the valuable and useful. It would not, it is evident, be exactly the thing to present the maid-servant with a bouquet and her mistress with a bandana handkerchief, although by reversing them each would have her appropriate gift.

Riches attract riches; and thus it is usual for the wealthy to receive the most expensive presents. People of taste, however, while complying with this general rule, strive to avoid any indication of conferring a benefit; and take care that their gifts should be, however costly, as free as possible from any positive utility. Thus their presents take the form of expensive and evanescent flowers, costly and not indispensable works of art and virtu. Whenever the utility of an object is paramount it loses its capability of being an appropriate gift of ceremony. No person, for example, would venture to bestow upon dame or damsel—unless there was reason, from relationship or otherwise, for his assuming the character of a benefactor—a dining-room table or a set of bedroom furniture, while he would not hesitate to give a piece of marqueterie, a statue, or picture of ten times the cost. Though art has unquestionably its utility, the exclusiveness and comparative remoteness of its kind make of it something so delicate and refined that it hardly seems perceptible or of sufficient substance to overlay the sentiment of a gift.

Among equals there are no presents from each other so grateful as those which have been made by their own hands. It is easy enough, in an impulse of generosity or on the momentary reminder of the duty of the season, to put the hand in the pocket and lay out a score of dollars more or less in the purchase of a gift. This might be prompted, as it often is, by a single thought during the whole year of the person for whom it is intended; but the conception and execution, deliberately begun and patiently continued day after day, of some piece of handiwork, though of little money-cost, are indicative of a sentiment of affection or friendliness the sincerity and duration of which can not be doubted. Every touch of a pencil or stitch of embroidery becomes thus a record of the pertinacious attachment of a friend or lover.

The question, What to Give? is one more particularly pertinent at this season in regard to children. It would be readily answered if the purpose of the gift were only to satisfy the child, who is literally pleased with a rattle and tickled with a straw. It is surprising how easy it is to gratify the genuine boy or girl, not the young "master" and "miss," who are already used up by a surfeit of enjoyment before they are grown up. A hearty child of nature is so full of buoyant spirits that his joyousness overflows at the smallest provocation. He requires neither the brilliancy of art nor the piquancy of novelty to arouse his pleasurable emotions. He, in fact, has so much of the original smack of his mother earth in him that he will turn from the most elaborate and expensive objects to the structures of his congenial mud. How often have we seen infants throw away the gilded whistle and bells for the greasy bone, and abandon the flaunting wax-doll for its successful rival, the shabby rag-baby!

There is however a more important object to be considered than the mere temporary gratification of the child. The kind of gift bestowed upon the young, who are so impressible for good or ill, is to be regarded in reference to its educational influence. Books, of all presents, are the most effective in this respect, unquestionably, but care must be taken to adapt them to the nature of children. In our desire to implant into our little ones germs of usefulness, we are apt to bring them up on a too plain and solid nutriment. The early intellectual education of the child should be chiefly through the eyes and imagination. Their books, therefore, should be full of gay pictures and impossible stories. Old English literature brightened up by modern art supplies such works in perfection, and from omnipresent Cock Robin to immortal Robinson Crusoe there is a series of classical works among which parents are always safe to choose.

The toy, too, has unquestionably its educational influence. Notwithstanding the indifference of children to the artistic perfection of their pictures and puppets, it is well to secure as much harmony of color and proportion of form as possible, in order to inculcate at the earliest period the principles of good taste.

The preponderance of the military toy, now that we seem to be in a fair way of enjoying peace, might be advantageously lessened. The martial tin trumpet and wooden gun, if not abolished altogether, ought to be mitigated by a more liberal mixture of pacific locomotives and steamboats of pewter. Whatever may be the answer, we hope, for the sake of all loved and lovable persons, young and old, that there is no one at this generous season who is not asking the question, "What to Give?"

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

All's Well that Ends Well.

MY DEAR GUSTAVUS,—It was certainly a very pretty spectacle that you and Peter Paul Pry and I saw yesterday at the Church of St. Augustine in the East—St. Hymen, as it ought now to be called. A lovely young woman in her bridal attire, upon a bright morning, surrounded with a brilliant throng, and with all the pretty pomp and circumstance of a fashionable wedding, is an interesting, yes, and a beautiful object. And certainly there were pomp and splendor enough yesterday! There was a lavish profusion upon every side, which could not be surpassed at the marriage of a king's daughter; and when Euphemia descended from her carriage and stepped upon the soft carpet that was spread over the sidewalk beneath the canopy, leaving upon the air as she passed a delicate perfume from her orange-wreath, as if a breeze had tenderly stirred a spicy tropical grove in bloom, I thought I had never seen a fairer sight. My foolish old eyes were as full of moisture as my foolish old heart was of memories. I knew by his silence that Pry preferred not to trust his voice at that moment, and I was aware of you, without seeing you, straining your eyes and bending forward as if you would fain have knelt before so radiant a presence. And when Euphemia, while we were all gazing in sympathy and admiration, put out her hand to her grandfather—that is to say to old Thomas Log—I, who had no idea that he was not her godfather or great-uncle, could not help whispering to Peter Paul Pry: "How it must cheer the old man's heart with a vision of his youth long ago!" Peter Paul raised his eyebrows: "That is the happy bridegroom," said he. "Whew!" said I, in a long and incredulous whistle—and they passed into the church.

It was useless for us to try to press after them. I am told that the crush was so sudden and overpowering that the train of the bride was trodden upon, and she was thrown to her knees. Little Alida Chaffinch, who told me of it in the evening, said that it was shocking. "And oh, dear Mr. Bachelor," she added, "for a little while I was so afraid that Euphemia would have a hysterical turn, and so spoil all the wedding that we had been carefully rehearsing for a fortnight!" But I was glad to hear that Euphemia commanded herself, and the ceremony was performed without any failure exactly as it had been rehearsed. And indeed, as I reflected upon going home, a young woman who was brave enough to marry Thomas Log would hardly be dismayed by falling upon her knees at the church-door.

We were very silent as we returned from that brilliant scene. It seemed to me, Gustavus, that you stepped a little more nervously and impatiently than is your habit, and Peter Paul Pry occasionally hummed under his breath that woeful song of Ophelia's. The old city roared around us in the usual way, and before we had reached the club the bridal carriages rattled by rapidly coming from the church, and, like a fond old man, I could not help remembering that striking passage in Waverley, where the hero hears the returning carriages in the street after the execution of Fergus. "Are they going to his house up the river?" asked Pry, suddenly. "No," said you, "I think they are going to his villa by the sea." "Of course they won't stay at his house in the city yet," added I, because I felt that it would be better to say something. We walked on. I wouldn't have given a penny for your thoughts, Gustavus, because I knew them already, and so did Peter Paul Pry. We were all thinking the same thing. Our thoughts kept repeating one refrain like the stanzas of old Scotch ballads; and when we reached the club we stopped, and Pry turned in the direction in which the carriages had disappeared and repeated the lines that we had all heard Euphemia sing—

"And ye shall walk in silk attire,
And siller hae to spare,
Gin ye'll consent to be his bride,
Nor think o' Donald mair."

Then we all smiled, and I think rather soberly; but you said, cheerfully, "Well, well, well—all's well that ends well." And so we went into the club.

That is a good maxim, and very safe. If we only knew when the end came, however, it might be more of a warning. It is merely a repetition of the old Greek saying, that no man must be counted happy until his death. I suppose we wasted a great deal of sympathy upon Euphemia yesterday; and when I saw little Miss Chaffinch in the evening, and she told me of her fears lest the performance of the wedding should be spoiled, I knew that if I could look straight down into her heart as I asked her what she thought of all's being well that ended well, I should read her answer: "All will end well if I can make as good a match as Euphemia, and have some gray old Log endow me at St. Hymen's with town house, country house, marine villa, carriages, diamonds, and balls." I felt then a kind of impatience with myself. "Why bother your foolish old brains," said I to myself, "with what you suppose to be the unhappiness of these young women? Far from being unhappy, they are educated to this destiny, and they all desire it. Yes, and haven't you seen enough of love starving and struggling in a cottage to feel that it isn't so very unreasonable to prefer comfort and what you're used to with a worthy person whom you can respect, to a tremendous romance ending in a third-rate boarding-house? Know yourself, Old Bachelor!" said I, as I glanced around those superb drawing-rooms of the Chaffinches, where splendor is lost in comfort; "say truly, is not Mrs. Hummerdrum, with respect, maturity, and fifty thousand dollars a year, quite as alluring as—as, well, yes—as Euphemia herself, with youth, love, romance, and a third story back-room in Amity Street. Face the music, Old Bachelor! Wouldn't you—except for your comfortable income—wouldn't you gladly stumble up the steps of St. Hymen's to-morrow morning with the comely widow Hummerdrum, sure that all's well that ends well?"

As I came away from little Alida's I fell again into profound meditation. It really seemed as if I had slipped into the snare of anti-Cupid, for my memory was full of two friends of my youth, Edwin and Angelina. I don't think that you knew them, Gustavus; but, upon the whole, I shall be more surprised if you did not. Angelina was one of those charming girls whom the Edwins always love, as the birds sing, because they can not help it. She used no arts. She was not rich. She was not of an antediluvian family, and not even of the Methuselahs. She was not especially clever nor accomplished; and I remember that the other girls agreed that she was not beautiful. But she had an indefinable charm which was diffused about her as a sweet odor surrounds a rose-tree. She danced well; she sang very well; and the young Edwin was fond of dancing and of music; and they were both young, and they were neighbors. Edwin's parents had views for him. They were rich, and they were socially ambitious. The young man went away, and the calm Angelina, who was supposed to be engaged to him, danced and sang as usual, and if any body looked sagaciously for fading roses his sagacity was not rewarded. By-and-by Edwin came home; a gay man; indolent, self-indulgent. He was not too intimate at Angelina's; but he was enough with her to avoid remark. Mrs. Grundy was in despair. "Is Edwin going to marry Angelina, or is he not?" demanded that decisive and irascible old lady. But she could get no answer, until one day she learned that Angelina was engaged to the young King of the Cannibal Islands. "And a very proper thing," said Mrs. Grundy. "I am very glad she has so much sense and has made such an excellent connection. Really, really, the little hussy knows the game very well!"

Edwin was upon pleasant terms with the young Prince, and no one could see any change of manner between him and Angelina. She was congratulated, and smiled sweetly, with just that vague suggestion of something else than appears which is always in the smile of a truly charming person. His young Cannibal Majesty was a mild, inoffensive youth, caring for nothing in particular, and with such immense possessions and revenues! It was a quiet wedding, without a rehearsal and with no hysterics. Edwin was there, so was I, and I watched him and the bride closely. Is it remarkable that a bride should be deathly pale? Certainly not. And I know not where you could find a more exemplary wedding guest than Edwin. There was no glittering eye, no skinny finger, and his congratulations to the bride were most cordial. The Queen of the Cannibal Islands went off to her realm, and after some time she returned to Jericho—did I mention that this was in old Jericho? Edwin was there, indolent as ever, not yet married; only somewhat older. He took his daily walk—settling into the ways of my family, you know—and in his daily walk he always happened to pass her Majesty taking her daily drive, with all her Majesty's children and nurses and governesses and retinue. When I happened to see them I watched the pleasant bow they exchanged, and I said to myself, "All's well that ends well."

I suppose that this state of things had continued for more than a dozen years, when it was one day announced that Edwin was about to marry the Princess of Sheba, the young woman who drank her liqueur out of scooped diamonds, which gave rise to the singular rumor that she drank nothing but melted diamonds.

They were married, and I was present, and so was her Majesty of the Cannibal Islands, and four of her children. I think Euphemia's wedding was not prettier. Her Cannibal Majesty stood by the church door as the happy pair passed out. Edwin gave her his hand, and Angelina wished him all happiness; and the bridesmaids hurled a Cinderella slipper after the joyous nuptial carriage as it rolled away. "Oh me!" said I, as I went home from the wedding, "all's well that ends well."

And this is the end, I suppose. They have each a pleasant home and all that makes us comfortable upon the great road of the world. I make no romance of it, Gustavus. I do not know that there is ever a single regret in Angelina's heart or in Edwin's. She is busily engaged with her young princes and princesses. She is not a woman of imagination, and she loves her children dearly. As for Edwin, indolent and luxurious, he will have every whim gratified, every appetite satisfied. All's well that ends well. Even if sometimes, suddenly and without forewarning, a vision of another life with Edwin, and of other children who should call Edwin father—a vision of higher happiness—passes bright and beautiful across Angelina's mind, I do not know that her good sense does not dismiss it as an alluring dream which even Edwin could not have secured to her. And if when his Princess asks Edwin to read something to her, he, remembering the time when his fancy pictured him reading at evening to Angelina by their own fireside, opens the little volume of Whittier and reads out in his sweet, melancholy voice the story of Maud Muller. I do not know that the half mournful regret which fills his heart is more than a contrast which he is conscious gives a romantic zest to his life. All's well that ends well.

But, Gustavus, I do know something, and that is that the musing silence into which we all fell yesterday as we thought of the peerless Euphemia becoming Mrs. Log, was the result of our profound conviction that no influence is so ennobling as love, and love only, as the foundation of the household; and that the human character inevitably suffers where this foundation is wanting. The ideal of any society is lowered where Edwin and Angelina marry even kings and queens instead of each other; and when the ideal begins to wane the true life of men and women begins to wither. If neither Edwin nor Angelina regret their severed fates, it is because of that very deadening of soul which is the worst result of infidelity to the heart. If, ten years hence, Euphemia is glad that she married Log, it is only another reason for striving to save other Euphemias from her fate. Yes, Gustavus, all is well that ends well; but this, by any noble standard, is sure to end ill. Yours, my dear boy, reflectively,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

HOLIDAY GIFTS.

JEWELRY.

THE prices of jewelry are reduced at some houses ten per cent., at others twenty-five, since the last holidays. The season is not productive of much novelty in design; the fashion being to imitate antique models, classic and barbaric, such as were copied last year.

Pendants in the shape of gold fringes and lockets swing from every article of jewelry. Brooches are arranged to be worn as pendants from necklaces. Ear-rings are long and slender, or else large hoops. Bracelets are narrow half inch bands, with the long Marquise medallion in the centre, or the ribbon bracelet of innumerable links of gold as pliable as ribbon. Rings are small hoops of gold with a long oval medallion of enamel or a setting of stones.

DIAMONDS AND PEARLS.

The knife-edge setting, as jewelers term a slender thread-like border of gold, is the best style for brilliant stones. The gold is scarcely visible, and is only employed to hold the diamonds securely. If a color must be associated with diamonds select one of the dark rich stones, such as the velvet-like blue sapphire, darkest green emeralds, or rubies. A superb ring shown us has a square medallion bordered by diamonds, and in the centre a large sapphire.

Pearls in unison with pale blue turquoise are greatly in favor. Strung seed pearls are usually chosen for brides. For general use rose pearls in Etruscan gold, or in the new perforated setting of gold with a reddish tinge. Three different races of pearls are represented in one bracelet, a glossy black pearl, a rose pink, and a milk-white pearl, each in its native color.

TURQUOISE, CORAL, ETC.

Turquoise is more in favor just now than any colored stone for evening dress. It is restricted to blondes, however, as the pale pink coral should be. Brunettes make a mistake in selecting light coral with the idea that any shade approaching red will suit them. A dark shade of scarlet coral should be their choice. This is handsomest when mounted with diamonds, and there is then no danger of mistaking it for the coralline imitation. Emeralds begin to find a rival in the sea-green chrysoprase which is now cut in cameos and set in diamonds. Amethysts have had their day for the present.

Malachite is a popular stone for morning and evening wear, but it necessitates a black, white, or green dress. $60 buys a handsome set, brooch, ear-rings, and sleeve-buttons. The dark lapis lazuli is chosen in polished flat surfaces with pendant drops. Pretty sets of crystal are engraved on the reverse side in floral designs and painted in vivid colors. A lily of the valley set costs $125.

PERFORATED GOLD AND ENAMEL.

Perforated gold jewelry is the novelty of the season. It is made of red gold pierced in intricate patterns like lace. It is expensive as the workmanship is elaborate and very difficult to execute. Pale Roman gold in Pompeian designs continues in favor. $70 buys a handsome set, $40 a simple one. More fanciful sets in French devices are light and pretty for young girls. A tiny basket of enameled fruits is pendant from a golden rope, or a censer containing a drop of perfume, a bird swinging in a golden hoop, and a fourth represents hirondelles, the swallows on the wing darting downward with a rose pearl in the beaks. An anagram brooch is an enameled bee on a gold cross with the letters d-o-n-t at the corners, saying plainly "don't be cross."

Unpolished enamel on gold is the most artistic jewelry worn. The floral designs are in better taste than sacred subjects. A new fancy is for the Japanese designs. A fine set in this style will cost $300.

BYZANTINE MOSAIC.

Byzantine mosaics in Egyptian designs are greatly worn, and are suitable for a larger variety of dresses than any other jewels. Prices range from $60 to $150. A full parure, marked $700, has infinitesimal stones of most brilliant colors.

HISTORIC CAMEOS.

Among a rare collection of historic cameos is the profile of Marie de Medicis, the head of Isabel of Castile, and the full face of Gabrielle d'Estrees on black onyx mounted in perforated gold with pearls and diamonds. A bright-green chrysoprase represents Castor and Pollux.

LOCKETS AND NECKLACES.

A pretty Christmas gift is a locket now universally worn, pendant from a gold necklace or a velvet ribbon. Roman gold in massive Egyptian design, with a monogram or an inscription in turquoises or brilliants, is one of the handsomest styles. More delicate ones are of fine red gold in a perforated pattern. $10 buys a pretty oval locket of blue enamel studded with pearl. A jet locket costs only $5. A locket shaped like a jockey cap has a watch with face as small as a ten-cent piece. The self-winding key is at the side, and the movement is very fine. Price $150. A Byzantine cross worn as a pendant is marked $14.

The Genoese rope-work necklaces are very beautiful, and newer than the spiral chains. Price $50.

JEWELRY FOR GENTLEMEN.

Rings for gentlemen are long oval medallions of moss agate, jasper, and lapis lazuli. Sleeve buttons are large and square. A set of white onyx has the Grecian Bend in black profile. Another is a cameo cut in sardonyx representing Fritz and General Boum. Spiral studs of plain gold, or a tiny stone, are as small as possible. The grotesque and horrible styles of jewelry, such as death's-heads, griffins, and owls, are worn by the eccentric only, and not by gentlemen of taste.

BONBONNIERES, VASES, ETC.

A favorite gift this season is a pretty bonbonniere of engraved glass or of colored crystal, or thin ice-glass in some fancy device, and mounted with gilt. These are filled with bonbons when presented, and serve afterward as jewel-cases. Another feature is the vases. There are slender vases for a single flower, pale pink, or blue china wreathed with tiny flowers, costing only $3; others of ice-glass in light-tinted colors, lily-shaped, or tulips with stems of ormolu; clear crystal vases in bronze and carved wood pedestals; triple vases of the substantial majolica, conch-shells, entwined with sea-weed and supported by branches of coral, or a comical pair of frogs on thick coral stems marked $2 50. Vases of black or scarlet china with porcelain paintings of Roman profiles are mounted on high gilt standards $5. For the library there are gilt and silvered bronze vases in antique shapes, Egyptian and Roman, and for the dining-room the low epergne of tinted crystal in floral design with several branches for bouquets. Toilette ornaments take the form of jardinières, a bouquet-holder serving as the handle for a puff-box or the stopper of a perfume bottle. The jardinières for window recesses beautifying the plainest room.

The substantial English crystal is best for toilette sets, as it is too heavy to be easily overturned. Card-receivers are shown in the different bronzes and in painted porcelain. One much admired is of engraved pink glass with ormolu feet, a wreath of convolvulus engraved on the band. Price $35. Odor-cases of porcelain with cut-glass bottles are from $15 to $30. Wine sets for buffets have dark green or crimson glasses and decanter on trays of carved wood. Price $9. Opera-glasses are shown in the shaded Bismarck and Magenta pearl, with lenses of rock-crystal that remain cool and pleasant to the eye in a heated theatre. Book-racks and brackets of inlaid wood from Sorrento make acceptable presents. A useful little novelty is a foot-bench for a lady to rest her feet on at the theatre or opera. It folds small enough to be carried in an over-coat pocket.

RUSSIAN LEATHER GOODS.

There are many useful presents found among the Russian morocco goods now so much sought after. Pale green and blue are the newest colors. A morocco belt with a reticule attached for handkerchief and porte-monnaie is $9. Chatelaines with scissors, needle, and thimble cases are $5. With vinaigrettes, $5 50. Leather-work baskets with covers are lined with silk and supplied with sewing implements. Price $15. Morocco canes mounted with gilt are used by gentlemen. They serve also as riding whips. Price $5. A large album for cabinet photographs is green leather bound with silver. $30. Smaller albums are arranged for collections of monograms and crests. Port-folios with handles are from $8 to $30. Porte-monnaies initialed with gilt are $3.

VIENNA WARE.

Gifts for gentlemen are found in abundance among the fire-gilt and oxydized bronze ornaments made in Vienna. Many of these are in commemoration of the Schuetzenfest held in Vienna this year. An inkstand of steel bronze is shaped like the Tyrolean hat, with a game-bag and gun beside it. A hunting-knife is a sheath for a paper-knife and eraser. A cigar ash-tray bears a miniature saddle, whip, and a hunter's dog.

TURKISH WOODS.

Among the light woods is a smoker's after-dinner set, a Turkish hickory tray bearing ten small meerschaums, a case for tobacco, and a match-safe. This is marked $45. A smoker's cabinet of wood, imitating Russian leather, contains pipes for a tête-à-tête, cigar-holder, cigarette-case, and a tobacco-box lined with metal to keep the tobacco moist. Price $40. The French marqueterie of inlaid woods adorn cigar-cases, representing rustic figures and Alpine scenes. Scotch enameled wood-cases with a picture of statuary on top are $3.

GAMES.

A new tête-à-tête game, after the manner of chess, but simpler, is called the Kings and the Cavaliers. The board and men, with instructions, cost $1. The romantic game of Silver Chimes is very fascinating, and is destined to popularity during the long winter evenings. It is arranged for the field and for the parlor floor or table. The hexagonal table requires but little room, and the play affords healthful and graceful exercise. The outfit for the field game costs $18. The parlor game for the floor is $15, and the parlor table $20.

COSTUME CRACKERS AND PERFUMES.

Rimmel's costume crackers are very amusing, and in Paris are brought on with dessert at fashionable dinner parties. They are huge mottoes which, when pulled, explode with a loud report, and disclose grotesque paper caps, jackets, etc. The guests put on the articles which fall to their share amidst shouts of laughter. Rose-water and violet crackers contain fountains of these perfumes. The violet and rose bouquets hold similar fountains, which give the flowers the perfume as well as appearance of nature. Russia leather traveling perfume cases contain twelve tiny bottles filled with different choice handkerchief extracts. The choicest perfumes are put up in innumerable unique forms, such as compasses, watches, and lockets; and sturdy firemen play streams of rose-water from hose near for the purpose.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. BALL, BLACK, & Co.; TIFFANY & Co.; BROWNE & SPAULDING; STARR & MARCUS; SCHUYLER, HARTLEY, & GRAHAM; KIRBY & Co.; and EDWARD GREY & Co.

PERSONAL.

GEORGE STEPHENSON, the engineer, whose life has recently been published by HARPER & BROTHERS, was a great gallant to the ladies, one of whom once asked him, "What do you consider the greatest force in nature?" "I will answer you that question," said he. "It is the eye of a woman to the man that loves her; for if a woman look with affection on a man, should he go to the uttermost ends of the earth, that look will bring him back."

General PRIM is not a Spaniard at all. He's a German, born on the Elbe, and his real name is PRUSS. He entered the Prussian army in 1831 as a non-commissioned officer, went to Spain, got acquainted with the PRIM family, was adopted by it, and has since gone on from one good thing to another until now he is, perhaps, the most notable man in that rather dilapidated old monarchy.

The Saturday Review articles on the "Girl of the Period" are now attributed to a sister of Lord CRANBORNE.

It is said that the fortune left by the late Baron ROTHSCHILD is enormous—incredibly so—and that his will provides for the endowment of a great charitable institution in Paris. As soon as life was extinct the family all entered the chamber where the body was. The furniture, carpets, etc., were all taken away as soon as possible, and, according to the Jewish rites, the mourners sat there on the bare floor. Each morning the friends of the family met there to pray, rent their clothes, the men going unshaven, and indulging in other signs of woe. He was a good old man to his family, servants, etc., and the grief is therefore all the more heavy.

SOJOURNER TRUTH, now eighty-two years old, is so hale and hearty as to be able to draw crowded houses to her lectures, detailing her experience as a slave and free woman.

A London paper writes that Lady BULWER, who led such a life with her husband, is now understood to be in a lunatic asylum. She was always a passionate woman, who could not brook the least contradiction or apparent neglect. BULWER was fond of her, and dedicated one of his early novels to her in affectionate terms. When the quarrels began the husband's mother made things worse, and after disgraceful scenes had been enacted, a separation was agreed to. When BULWER was a Cabinet Minister he sought to get her confined in an asylum, but she obtained her release, posted to the county town at which he was to present himself for re-election, and harangued the farmers from a wagon! Their only surviving child, Mr. ROBERT LYTTON, now rising fast in the diplomatic world, and known as "Owen Meredith," undertook to live with his mother and keep her from mischief; but her violence became at last real insanity. Some of her books, such as "Chevely; or, The Man of Honor," are clever, though the hatred of her husband which they reveal is sickening. She extended this feeling to his friends, and "Mr. Ben Araby" (DISRAELI) and Mr. DICKENS figure prominently in her works. When Mr. DICKENS took the world into his confidence and narrated the facts of his separation from his wife, Lady BULWER was in ecstasies. She claimed it as proving the justice of all she had said.

The Hon. J. ROSS BROWNE met with quite a serious accident during his visit to Shanghai, while out driving. An inebriated tar, going probably in the direction said to be taken generally by a "sailor on horseback," drove his fiery steed into the vehicle in which Mr. BROWNE was sitting, causing the horse to take fright and run away. Mr. BROWNE managed to get out over the back of the carriage, but was thrown on the ground as he alighted. He received several bruises about the face and head, but fortunately none of a serious nature. He started off to the north next morning.

The Right Rev. HENRY C. LAY, D.D., recently elected Bishop of the new Diocese of Easton, on the Eastern Shore of Maryland, and at present Missionary Bishop of Arkansas, is a Virginian by birth and education. Prior to his elevation to the episcopate he was rector of the church in Huntsville, Alabama, and one of the leading minds in that diocese and in that whole region. A series of church works, edited and partly written by him, was exceedingly well received, and exerted a great influence for good. He is a man of winning manners, great self-devotion, a fine speaker—fluent, graceful, and sympathetic—and greatly respected and beloved by all who know him.

Mlle. NILSSON is acquiring great personal popularity on the Continent. At a recent concert given in Baden Baden for the poor, she was crowned, not with flowers, but with a golden coronet, the gift of the QUEEN OF PRUSSIA, who, with Prince CHARLES and other members of the royal family, was present. A very good girl is Mlle. N.

Queen VICTORIA takes great personal interest in the welfare of her subjects, and recognizes in a very flattering way all acts of benevolence or of humane exertion. Recently Viscount BURY, at great risk, succeeded in saving the life of a man in danger of drowning from the swamping of a boat. The Queen thereupon, through her private secretary, wrote the following letter: "BALMORAL, October 16.—DEAR LORD BURY: The Queen desires me to express to you the great pleasure which it has given her Majesty to become acquainted with the details of your most gallant action, and her Majesty congratulates you on the successful performance of a deed which you will remember with just pride as long as you live. Your companion in the enterprise also deserves the Queen's warmest commendation, and her Majesty desires me to inquire what can be done for him. Perhaps you will let me know whether it would be desirable to have his name brought forward as you suggested in your letter." The person referred to was a fisherman who was with Lord BURY.

MISS KATE FIELD has of late been keeping a diary for Planchette, which records many grotesque and curious performances of this wonderful three-legged animal. Its origin seems to be somewhat obscure. ROBERT DALE OWEN first introduced it into America, having had one made for him a dozen years ago in France by BARTOLOZZI, ex-Master of the Horse under LOUIS PHILIPPE, who had first heard of it through an Italian. There is a conjecture that it was suggested by the custom of German bel-dames of placing a pencil between scissors-blades and letting it trace oracular sentences on paper placed beneath. The first printed mention made of it was in the novel, "Who Breaks Pays." Mr. C. H. WEBB, in his witty article in Harper's Monthly for December, calls Planchette an animated humbug, while Miss FIELD vouches for its gift of prophecy, though often a lying one. Wherefore we are still left to ask, What is this mystery?

The papers state that Mrs. HENRY WARD BEECHER is to edit a new monthly magazine, to be called the Mother at Home, of which HORSFORD & SON, of this city, are to be publishers.

Rev. ROBERT COLLYER, the sensation preacher of Chicago, has a way of expressing himself that is quite waggish and Western. At the Social Science Convention, held in that city, a prominent member was Dr. EDWARD BEECHER, a very fine-looking man, of whom Mr. COLLYER said, "What a jolly old angel he is!"

ROSSINI left about $500,000. In due time nearly all this will be made over to his native town. Mme. ROSSINI has the interest of the whole during her lifetime. He founds, in Paris, an annual prize for music, religious or profane, but it is on condition that the latter shall in all cases be of the most undoubted morality. To the Institute of France he wills an annual sum of 6000 francs, to be thus divided: The author of a poem, and the composer, 3000 francs each. The Institute is left to decide upon the merits of the works competing for the prize, but ROSSINI strongly urges that there shall be melody in the successful works. From the moment it became apparent that the life of the maestro was in danger, he was never without the presence of some of his more intimate friends. MM. VAUCORBEIL, MICHOTTE, PERRUZZI, IVANOFF, J. TAMBURINI, and Dr. FORTINA, were among the most devoted. The artists of the Grand and the Italian Opera called daily at Passy for news of ROSSINI.

The English papers have a new direction for becoming a Prime Minister: "Turn round and round till you become 'Dizzy.'" (The pun, probably, of some dizzypated person.)

HALEVY, composer of "La Juive," was himself a Jew. Each year the Association for Musical Composers derived a revenue of five or six thousand francs from a mass from some prominent composer, who gave the copyright to the society. On being applied to, HALEVY expressed surprise that he, a Jew, should be asked to write such a composition, but was assured that the religion of a work of art was universal. "Very well, so be it," he replied, "you shall have your mass; but I will not write the credo," and so it happened that AMBROISE THOMAS wrote the credo.

Slipper Design in Application.

In the illustration the slipper is of gray cloth, while the design is of various bright colors of cloth and black, worked on and embroidered with different colored silk twist. The illustration shows the stitches used. Of course, any other color of cloth may be chosen instead of gray.

Emery Bag.

MATERIALS: Half an English walnut-shell, muslin, red velvet, emery, black sewing-silk, copal varnish.

This emery bag is made of the size of the walnut-shell of muslin, filled with emery, and covered with red velvet on the upper side. Work the velvet in point russe in the manner shown by the illustration. Having completed the cushion, glue it into the shell, which must be varnished in order to polish it.

Two Netted Rosettes.

Fig. 1.—This rosette consists of an embroidered figure of the shape shown by the illustration, around which crochet the following edge: 1st round.—1 sc. (single crochet) in the point of a leaflet of the embroidered figure; * 7 ch. (chain), 1 sc. in the point of the following leaflet. Repeat from , at the end of the round 1 sc. in the first sc. of the round. 2d round.— 5 ch., 1 dc. (double crochet) in the middle stitch of following chain-stitch scallop, 5 ch., 1 sc. in the following sc. Repeat from . At the end of the round work 1 sc. in the sc. at the beginning of the round. 3d round.— 5 ch., 4 dc. in the following dc. of the former round, between every 2 dc. 7 ch., then 5 ch., 1 sc. in the next sc. of the former round. Repeat from *. At the end of the round 1 sl. (slip stitch) in the last sc. of the former round.

Fig. 2.—This rosette is worked over a steel knitting-needle of a size to correspond to the fineness of the thread. Begin with a foundation of six stitches, join in a round, and work on this: 1st round.—In every foundation stitch two stitches. 2d-6th rounds.—Two stitches in every added stitch and one in each of the others. 7th-9th rounds.—Without widening. Embroider in the manner shown by the illustration in point de reprise and satin stitch.

Bag for Water-Proof and Over-Shoes.

This bag is made of brown carriage leather bound with brown braid. The handle is of plaited brown braid. Cut of carriage leather two equal pieces twelve inches long and six inches wide, and round one end in the manner shown by the illustration. Next cut for the bag two pieces each ten and a half inches long and five and a half inches wide, round one end of these like the preceding, bind the sides and the upper end with braid, and sew these to the first pieces in the manner shown by the pattern, in doing which lay a broad box-pleat in the under end. Next cut two pieces for the revers on the upper end, round them in the manner shown by the illustration, bind with the braid, and sew them to the pieces which form the foundation; then bind these together. The middle pocket thus formed is for the reception of a water-proof, and the outer one for the over-shoes. The braid for the handle is plaited of double brown woolen braid, the ends of which are raveled out to form tassels.

Infant's Crochet Shirt.

See illustration on page 965.

This shirt is crocheted with coarse white knitting-cotton over a foundation of white cord. With this cord loops are formed on the upper edge, which are crocheted over in single crochet. An illustration shows a section of the upper part of the full size. Begin on the back edge of the right back with a foundation of forty-six stitches, making the shirt five inches long. On this foundation crochet backward and forward two rounds in single crochet, always putting the needle through both the upper veins of a stitch, and at the end of the first round leave a loop of the cord before crocheting over it the first stitch of the second round. Continue to leave these loops on the upper edge at the end of every round. In the 3d round work the button-holes by crocheting after every three single crochet three stitches over the cord only, passing over three stitches of the former round. After this follow ing rounds, as far as the middle of the shirt, narrow one stitch on the upper edge in every second round, then work after the completion of the 42d round a gore on the under edge twenty stitches long, then the 43d-49th rounds over the entire row of stitches, a gore on the upper edge (eighteen inches long), 50th-55th rounds over the entire row of stitches, a gore on the upper edge (fifteen stitches long), 56th-59th rounds with the entire row of stitches. The shirt is now half finished; the other half is worked to correspond. Then crochet on the under edge, always putting the needle through the edge stitches so that the cord loops come on the right side, two rounds single crochet. On the upper edge crochet in every loop three single crochet, and on the corner loop from six to seven single crochet. Crochet around the arm-hole with single crochet. Each shoulder band is five inches long, and consists of four rounds single crochet, which are worked backward and forward over a requisite foundation and sewed on the shirt.

Gentlemen's Knitted Suspenders.

See illustration on page 965.

These suspenders, which are wider on the shoulders, are knitted of white knitting-cotton, as are also the straps, by means of which they are fastened to the trousers. The knitting is done on two needles plain, in backward and forward rounds, and forms a double layer of knitting joined at the sides. Begin with a foundation of twenty-eight stitches, and knit as follows: slip the first stitch, then alternately knit 1, slip 1; always slip as if intending to purl the stitch, and let the thread lay before the stitch. In every following round, which must be knitted in the same manner, knit the stitch slipped in the preceding round, and slip the one previously knitted. Work in this manner fifty rounds (two needles form one round). For the widening then make one in every thirteenth round by throwing the thread around after the first and before the last stitch on each needle. In order to prevent any irregularity in the work this made stitch must always be knitted as a twist stitch in the next round. Having completed the first half of the suspenders, work the second half to correspond, and make the button-hole in the manner shown by the illustration. The end of the first half is now fastened by means of a buckle to two little straps, which are also furnished with button-holes.

Boy's Crochet Suspenders.

THIS new form of suspenders is especially commendable. A kind of bavette in front reaches almost to the neck, and supplies the place of a vest. The pattern is of red zephyr wool, worked in Tunisian crossed stitch, and edged with a row of little scallops worked with black wool. The Tunisian cross stitch is distinguished from the ordinary Tunisian stitch by knitting in the first round of every pattern row from every two stitches lying together, always the second and afterward the first, by which means the stitches cross. Begin on the under edge of the bib-shaped part. Fig. 57, Supplement, gives the pattern of half of this. In order to form the button-hole in the under part divide the stitches, and work each half separately till they are long enough for the button-hole, after which again work over all the stitches together. Widen according to the pattern. Having completed this part edge it with a round as follows: * 1 sc. (single crochet) in an edge stitch, one picot composed of four chain and one slip stitch in the first of the four chain; 1 sc. in the same edge stitch, pass over one stitch. Repeat from *. A similar round is crocheted on the bib part in the manner shown by the illustration. Next crochet in the same manner two suspenders, each twenty eight inches long and six inches wide. Finish both ends with a button-hole, and Short Knitted Drawers.

THESE drawers are knitted of white wool in ordinary patent. Knit each part separately. Cast on coarse knitting-needles 150 stitches, and knit first, in the round, 40 rounds patent, then backward and forward thirteen inches; next join the two parts, and knit in the round with red wool, on somewhat finer needles, again 40 rounds patent and cast off. Hem this red part down on the right side along the first line of red stitches, and run a ribbon through the hem by means of which to fasten the drawers around the waist. On the front and back sew the two pieces together part the way down, as shown by the illustration.

Cloth Legging.

THIS legging is worn over the shoe, both for the purpose of keeping the ankle warm and of protecting the stocking in muddy weather. It is of black cloth lined with red flannel, with cords stitched in as shown by an illustration. The trimming consists of a band of black krimmer an inch wide. For making the legging stitch the materials as shown above, and cut for each from Figs. 27 and 28, Supplement, each one piece, allowing a seam on the edge. Now join the pieces from 47 to 48, backstitching both outsides and one lining, and afterward hem down the other lining so as to cover the seam. Finish the edge by sewing a cord in the cloth and afterward hemming down the lining. Lastly, sew small buttons along the straight line on Fig. 28, and corresponding loops of elastic cord on the other edge. The trimming is a narrow strip of krimmer or fur.

Knitted Legging.

THIS legging is knitted of red and black zephyr wool, and trimmed with small woolen balls. Knit, according to the pattern of the cloth legging, in backward and forward rounds, one round plain and the following purled, five rounds with black and seven with red wool, and in such a manner that a ribbed design is formed, the black ribs being purled and the red ribs knitted on the outside. The legging is shaped by widening and narrowing on the upper part, but there is no seam on the back. It is fastened with buttons and loops. The trimming consists of two rows of woolen balls, which are sewed on so as to alternate.

Crocheted Under-Skirt with Waist.

THIS skirt is crocheted in red and black wool in Tunisian crochet stitch; the skirt is worked in single crochet only with the red wool. The border is worked in connection with the skirt. The under edge of the skirt is seventy-two inches wide, while the upper edge is narrowed so as to correspond to the size of the waist. The skirt given in the illustration is twenty-four inches long. Make a foundation of red wool corresponding to the length of the skirt (about 90 stitches), and crochet on this a pattern row with the red and black wool as follows: Begin with the black wool, and work 1 black stitch, 13 red stitches, 1 black stitch. (In working the 13 red stitches, run the black thread along on the under side.) The remaining stitches of the round are worked with red wool. In the second round of the pattern row work off the black stitches with the black, and the red stitches with the red wool. At the end of this, as also of the fol-

Gentleman's Knitted Shirt.

THIS shirt is knitted in patent with white wool. The back and front are worked separately, and sewed together on the sides and on the shoulders. For the front make a foundation of 140 stitches, and knit backward and forward 240 rounds in patent. Then, in order to form the slit, divide the stitches, taking the first 70 on another needle, and knit further 120 rounds. In order to form the contour of the neck cast off, in the 121st round, 20 stitches on the widest side next the slit, then in the second following round six stitches, and after this to the 148th round only two stitches in every second following round. On the left side of the front, which counts only 70 stitches, cast off in the 121st round only six stitches, and in the following alternate rounds only two stitches. Besides this it will be necessary to narrow for the shoulder 27 stitches in the following 40 rounds. The narrowing must be as regular as possible. Lastly, knit 12 rounds more without widening or narrowing, after which cast off the front. For the back cast on 130 stitches, beginning on the under edge, knit, first, 360 rounds without widening or narrowing, and then 40 rounds, in which narrow as regularly as possible 27 stitches at the beginning and end of the rounds, after which cast off. Join the back and front on the shoulders and on the sides with the exception of the upper part for the arm-holes. For the sleeve cast on 100 stitches, beginning on the upper edge, knit 248 rounds in patent, after which work in the round with finer needles for the wrist 58 rounds, alternately one stitch purled and one knitted. Sew the sleeve up and sew into the arm-hole. Bind the neck and slit and face the slit, after which arrange buttons and button-holes for fastening.

on one side, which is fastened on by a jet aigrette. The beret is tied on with black ribbons.

CASHMERE BERET.—This beret is furnished with tabs on both sides, which lie loosely over the beret and are tied over the top in the manner shown by the engraving. The tabs may, however, be let down to cover the ears and the ribbons tied under the chin, as shown in a second illustration. It is of blue cashmere lined with wadding and quilted with black silk. The trimming consists of a narrow strip of black krimmer. The tabs are bound with this and tied with blue satin ribbons.

square, etc. On the upper edge of the skirt crochet a few rounds single crochet, holding the skirt in to the size of the waist. The waist is crocheted entirely in single crochet, always putting the needle through both the upper veins of the stitches in backward and forward rounds over a cord. Figs. 48 and 49, Supplement, give the pattern of the waist. Cut the pattern of the lining, sew the parts together, and crochet according to the pattern. Begin on the back edge of the back with the requisite number of stitches. In the 4th round work the eyelet-holes by working, after every 4 single crochet, 3 chain, and passing over a like number of stitches. In order to work according to the pattern it will be necessary to insert little gores, which are worked similarly to those on the Infant's Crochet Shirt. Having finished the waist, work on the upper and under edge a row of single crochet over the edges of the cord. The shoulder-pieces are worked separately, and sewed to the waist. Join the skirt and waist with a linen belt, as shown by the illustration.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE BOLT ABOUT TO FALL.

WERE this a record of private griefs I might dwell long upon the desolation of spirit and unutterable anguish of heart which followed the receipt of those tidings that gave the death-blow to all my hopes; and, Heaven knows, these had seemed faint and feeble enough since my cruel marriage and more cruel exile. I had lost all. I felt nothing was left me in the past; and I looked forward to the unknown future from a present stand-point as desolate as it is possible for the mind of man to conceive.

Yet, as I pen these lines, and recall the dull despair of those days, I can not but reprobate my ingratitude to the one friend whom God had raised up for me in this unknown world, and my impious forgetfulness of the mercy that had secured me so kind and powerful a protector. If my situation was desolate in spite of Mr. Holwell's friendship, what would my state have been without that supreme advantage? By this gentleman I had been rescued from a crew of wretches, who were, for the most part, the very refuse and sweepings of English jails, and elevated to a position of companionship. The friendship of so respectable a gentleman won for me other acquaintances, and I soon occupied an established position among the gentlemen of the factory. Of the life which these gentlemen and their families enjoyed I will say nothing, save that to them it seemed a pleasant one. My own troubles unfitted me for such agreeable dissipation as prevailed among them, and I preferred the solitude of my office to the most boisterous dinner-party in Calcutta. The day came when the tragic and exciting incidents of public life blunted the keen edge of individual sorrow, and I was better able to appreciate the advantages I had derived from the happy chance that threw me across Mr. Holwell's pathway. But for more than a year after my receipt of Mr. Swinfen's letter I was able to take comfort from nothing; and though I still performed my daily round of duty, and contrived to give satisfaction to my employer, the pleasure and interest which I had hitherto felt in my work had completely left me.

The years which elapsed between the autumn of 1753 and the summer of '56 were years of comparative tranquillity; and before that memorable summer came we had seen the reduction of French power in the East by means of French folly, cowardice, and ignorance in the West. Enemy to my country though he was, false as he had shown himself in his violation of the treaty of Madras, I can not withhold my pity from that daring and ambitious statesman, Joseph Francis Dupleix, when I consider the ignoble treatment he received from the government he had served so well.

While the rival powers on the coast of Coromandel were fighting for the supremacy of their chosen native rulers, and disputing the validity of titles and grants given by the shadowy court of Delhi, where the Mogul himself was but a usurper of very recent date, the English Company at home pestered the Government with complaints that, despite a treaty of peace between the two nations, they were harassed by a distressing and dangerous war, produced by the ambition of the French governor. Nor were the French themselves better satisfied with the conduct of their Indian affairs. Too remote from the seat of war to be affected by the glories of success, they considered only the expense and loss entailed by those triumphs, and were unable to appreciate the future advantages which these struggles were to secure. Dupleix was too successful a man to be without enemies. These accused him of wasting the Company's money in ambitious wars; and France, after leaving this bold and faithful servant, inefficiently supported, to extend her dominions and maintain her army by the outlay of his private fortune, determined upon repudiating his claim for repayment and breaking him altogether.

At a conference which took place in London between the representatives of the French and British Governments, the French Ministry consented to recall Dupleix, and to send commissioners to India for the settlement of all differences between the two nations. Thus it happened that Monsieur Godcheu, a stranger to affairs in the East, was permitted to supersede the man who had first taught Moorish power to bow before European arms, and who had won for his country a name of might throughout the length and breadth of the Deccan. Injustice so glaring was second only to that which had flung De la Bourdonnais into a cell of the Bastille; and I doubt not that in the hour of his own misfortunes the Governor of Pondicherry remembered his underhand share in the downfall of his blameless rival.

Negotiations between M. Godcheu and Mr. Saunders, the English Governor of Madras, resulted in extraordinary concessions on the part of the French. That nation, thanks to the ambition of Dupleix and the prowess of Bussy, were now masters of the sea-coast of Coromandel and Orissa; but this advantage, together with many others, was precipitately resigned by the French Company in the general desire for peace.

While evil fortune thus overtook Dupleix, his happier enemy, Clive, was in London, feted by an admiring public, and gratified by the gift of a diamond-hilted sword, worth five hundred pounds, from the Court of Directors, which he, however, generously refused to receive unless a testimonial of equal value were presented to his friend and commanding officer, Colonel Lawrence, to whose liberal encouragement he owed so much of his success.

In the November of '55 the hero of Arcot returned to India as Governor of Fort St. David, bearing a commission as lieutenant-colonel in the British army, which had been obtained for him from his Majesty's Government by the Court of Directors, anxious to prevent those quarrels about rank between the King's and Company's officers which had so often obstructed the progress of affairs.

Instead of at once proceeding to his new government, Colonel Clive landed at Bombay, where he found Admiral Watson and a little fleet, which had been prudently dispatched from England at the time of the conference between the French and English Companies. Assisted by the Admiral, Clive attacked and routed a famous pirate called Angria, who, with his father before him, had been the scourge and terror of this coast for the last half-century. This Morattoe rascal's strong-hold of Gheria Colonel Clive razed to the ground on the 13th of February, '56, on which occasion the British forces shared ten lacs of rupees by way of plunder.

This was the last event of importance on the western coast before the revolution which overtook Bengal. Here a false security, or rather, perhaps, an habitual distaste for action or exertion of any kind on the part of the chief authorities, civil and military, had prevailed ever since the fear of Morattoe invasion had ceased to alarm the native and English inhabitants of the settlement. Every species of neglect had been practiced. The defenses of fort and city were in a dilapidated and almost useless condition. In all the arsenal there was scarce a carriage that would bear a gun; while fifty-five cannon, eighteen and twenty-four pounders, sent out from England in '53, had lain ever since neglected beneath the walls. Nor had the orders of the Directors at home been better attended to with regard to the drilling and military training of the militia. These, though entirely untaught, were hardly more ignorant than the meagre garrison, not one in ten among whom had ever seen a musket fired in earnest.

This was our condition at Fort William when the tidings of Allaverdy's approaching death came upon us. The daring spirit of the grand old Tartar chief was fading out amidst a scene of intrigue and treachery—the last act in that drama of falsehood and ambition which is forever being enacted in this Eastern world.

On the one side, Allaverdy's dying eyes beheld his beloved grand-nephew, Mirza Mahmud, the adopted child of his old age, dear to him as an only son, and whom he had installed as his successor two years before, with the Moorish name of Serrauje-ad-Doulah, or the Lamp of Riches; who was afterward known as Suraja Doulah, by which title he made himself infamously renowned to all time. On the other side, the death-bed of the old nabob was watched by his daughter—a woman of more than doubtful character, who had been married to her cousin, Shawamut Jung, and was now a childless widow.

The close of Shawamut Jung's life had been darkened by a tragedy, of which his nephew, Suraja Doulah, had been the hidden cause. He was Governor of Dacca—a province which could easily become the centre of a revolution—and possessed treasures and influence which might have made him a formidable opponent in any struggle for power. Suraja Doulah dreaded this; but his treachery assailed, not his uncle, but his uncle's prime counselor and intellectual superior, Hassein Coolly Khan. Hassein's nephew was at this time deputy-governor of Dacca. Him Suraja Doulah caused to be dispatched by assassins, who entered the city disguised in the dead of the night; and before the public mind had recovered the shock of this event Hassein himself was murdered in the streets of Muxadavad in open day.

Gloomy were the anticipations formed of the youthful director of these crimes, who of course denied all participation in the bloody work. While Allaverdy yet lingered, death swept both his nephews, the two uncles of Suraja Doulah, from the stage of politics. Both died of fever, without suspicion of poison, though it must be owned their removal was convenient for the Lamp of Riches.

There now remained but one possible pretender to the sovereignty of Bengal, and this was a child of two years old, the orphan son of Suraja Doulah's younger brother. This infant's father had been adopted by the late Shawamut Jung, and the baby pretender was now in the hands of the Begum, widow of Shawamut Jung, and daughter of Allaverdy, who had succeeded to her husband's treasures, and toward whom Suraja Doulah looked with the eye of hate and suspicion.

Hassein Coolly Khan had been succeeded in his post of dewan or prime minister to Shawamut Jung by a Gentoo called Raja Bullub, who was now supposed to exercise a paramount influence over the mind of the widow. Suraja Doulah had given this man a taste of his quality, having seized upon him, and, by imprisonment and other cruelties, endeavored to force from him a full account of Shawamut Jung's treasures. This the faithful Gentoo resolutely refused, and was by-and-by set at liberty by the influence of his mistress, who, as Allaverdy's daughter, had some power at court.

Thus did matters stand at Muxadavad, the capital of Bengal, when the imminence of the nabob's end brought affairs to a crisis. Raja Bullub, trembling for the safety of his treasures at Dacca, determined to remove with his worldly wealth and his family to a place of safety. But to effect this he was obliged to screen his real motives under a pretended access of piety. He therefore wrote to Mr. Watts, the chief of our English factory at Cassimbazar, hard by Muxadavad, informing him that his family were going from Dacca to worship at Juggernaut, and would take Calcutta on their way, at which settlement he entreated their favorable reception.

In compliance with this request Mr. Watts wrote to our president at Calcutta, and to Mr. Manningham, his junior in command. These letters arrived on the evening of the 13th of March, and during the absence of the president. They had but just reached Calcutta when Kissendass, the eldest son of Raja Bullub, and the rest of the family, landed from the little fleet of boats that had conveyed them from Dacca. There was brief leisure for consideration, and the family was received with all possible courtesy.

Mr. Holwell shook his head doubtfully when his people brought him the news of this unexpected arrival, as he and I lounged in an open veranda in the cool of the evening.

"I don't like such visitors, Bob," he said, gravely; "and yet I own it would be awkward to refuse them hospitality. In Oriental politics it is hard to know what turn events may take. If the Begum, Shawamut Jung's widow, should succeed in getting her adopted brat proclaimed nabob—and we know that Suraja Doulah is heartily detested by all classes—it would be well for the English to have secured her favor. But if, on the other hand, Suraja Doulah holds his own—which is more likely, since he has his paw upon the old nabob's treasury, and sticks at nothing in the way of assassination—we shall mortally offend him by any thing like protection of these Gentoos. Would to Heaven we had better defenses, Bob, and a more energetic garrison! for it strikes me this settlement is about as safe as a village built under the shadow of Vesuvius, or a chateau on the slope of Etna."

It was on the day after this arrival that Omichund, the Gentoo merchant, came to wait upon my patron. This man's revenues had been considerably diminished during the last three years by the Company's withdrawal of the privileges he had so long enjoyed; and to a mind so avaricious even the possession of vast wealth would fail to atone for this diminution of income. The old man's influence had also been lessened, and his pride humiliated, by the Company's ceasing to employ him as a mediator at the Durbar; and this, I doubt not, he felt no less keenly than his more substantial loss.

His manner was even more servile than usual; but I fancied I detected a sinister light in his eyes as he complimented Mr. Holwell, who gratified him with a piece of betel-nut wrapped in a leaf called pawn, a kind of sweetmeat much affected by the natives, and the interchange of which is a token of friendship.

Omichund had heard of our guests' arrival, and began at once to discuss the subject.

"Company Sahab do well to receive Kissendass," he said. "Raja Bullub, the father of Kissendass, is great friends with Begum Sahab—much very great friends. Wicked people say Begum Sahab is too much friends with Raja Bullub; but Omichund is no man to believe lies. If Begum Sahab and the little child get into power, it will be good for the English Company; but if not—"

He stopped, and shook his head ominously, with his shining black eyes fixed on my patron's face.

"If not, what?" asked Mr. Holwell, impatiently.

"What should Omichund know, Sahab?" replied the old man, with a crafty smile; "Omichund is less than no one. Company Sahab has not employed him at the Durbar these many years. His honorable masters have left off to trust him. But he is an old man, and has much experience, and eyes that see and ears that hear. He has heard something."

"What, man?" cried Mr. Holwell; "for Heaven's sake don't stand croaking there like a bird of evil omen. Speak, raven!"

"I have heard what the Soubah Allaverdy said to his great-nephew, Suraja Doulah, not three days ago," said Omichund, solemnly. "He has been long dying, the old Soubah, but the hour is near. Siva, the destroyer, has his hand outstretched to seize the old Mahometan, and he will go to the lower hell of darkness with the spirits that know not Brahman. Not three days ago the old man sent for his adopted son, and it seemed that he had an unnatural strength lent him to enable him to give his last counsels to his heir. 'Lamp of Riches, light of my soul,' he said to Suraja, 'I leave you a mission. It is to sweep the Europeans off the face of Hindostan. They are a dangerous people, my son. They make quarrels between the Hindoo kings, and profit by the strifes they raise. They make pretenses, to seize and plunder the goods of the rulers of the south; and think not that they will let you free from their depredations. The most dangerous of all are the English. I myself would have freed you from this danger, had Allah lengthened my days. The work, my son, must now be yours. The power of the English is great; they have lately reduced Angria, and possessed themselves of his country. Suffer them not to have fortifications or soldiers: if you do, the country is not yours."

Mr. Holwell affected to receive Omichund's information with entire equanimity; but when the old man had paid his farewell compliments and departed, I quickly saw that my patron was somewhat alarmed. I asked him whether it was not so; and he answered me, after his wont, with perfect frankness. He had, indeed, by this time, elevated me to a position of confidence and friendship second only to that of a son.

"Yes, Robert," he said, "I do fear Suraja Doulah. There is no tyrant so cruel, no despot so murderous, as a coward. Allaverdy was capable of hellish treachery, but he was a brave man. When the hour of extreme peril arose he cared not with what weapon he destroyed his enemy; but he did not war against possible antagonists. To be suspected by Suraja Doulah is to be doomed. He feared the deputy-governor of Dacca, and midnight assassins removed the object of his fear. He feared Hassein Coolly Khan, and Hassein Coolly was slaughtered at noontide in the streets of the city. In his two uncles he saw probable opponents; both are dead. If he fears the English, Heaven protect us against a foe so secret and so deadly; for we have not the power to protect ourselves. From the sleep which we have slept for the last ten years, nothing short of a thunder-clap will awaken us. It is quite possible the bolt is about to fall."

In little more than a month after this interview, on the 9th of April, 1756, the Nabob Allaverdy died; and about the same date came a second letter from Mr. Watts of Cassimbazar, recommending that Raja Bullub's family should no longer receive protection in Calcutta, as affairs were now very doubtful.

This prudent recommendation was unattended to, in spite of Mr. Holwell's remonstrances with his seniors in Council. It seemed, indeed, as if these gentlemen were bent upon inviting the ruin which was so soon to overtake them.

A private letter from Mr. Watts arrived about the same time to warn our president that Suraja Doulah had spies at Calcutta; that the weakness of its fortifications and garrison was the common talk of the Durbar, nay even of the very streets and market-places of Muxadavad; and that it behooved us to prevent such spies carrying their information daily to the Soubah's council-chamber.

This letter was communicated by the president to Mr. Holwell, as zemindar, who gave immediate orders at all the guarded landing-places that no one should be permitted to land or enter the town without a passport from him. Several suspected persons were arrested, and turned out of the place, and none admitted without a strict examination. My own suspicions pointed to a far more important person than any among those who were thus arrested. The English Company had made a powerful enemy for themselves in Omichund, whose pretended friendship I could not doubt was but a mask to hide his real feelings. A Hindoo, passionately fond of money, crafty, proud, and subtle, was of all created beings the least likely patiently to endure an injury such as the Company had inflicted upon him. We knew him to have ready access to the Durbar. Where else need we look for spies when this hidden foe had the ear of the tyrant?

I ventured to hint my suspicions to my patron, and found that his ideas on the subject fully coincided with my own.

Within a few days of Suraja Doulah's accession Omichund came to Mr. Holwell to inform him that Narain Sing, whose brother occupied a post of some importance about the person of the new nabob, had got into Calcutta in the mean disguise of a European peddler, and was at Omichund's house, where he awaited my patron's permission to visit him. He brought a perwannah, or order, from the nabob, demanding that Raja Bullub's family should be immediately given up. In the absence of the president and his second in authority Mr. Holwell felt himself bound to receive this messenger. He came accordingly, and was entertained with all due respect; but when he tendered his official document Mr. Holwell prudently declined to receive it in the absence of the president, to whom the paper was addressed. By this means time was gained for deliberation; and on the president's return, which occurred the next morning, a council was immediately held to decide this important question. My patron had in the mean time discovered that the nabob's messenger had been smuggled into the place by the agency of Omichund—another suspicious fact against this venerable Gentoo.

The authorities of Calcutta now found themselves on the horns of a dilemma. The fortune of the hour was yet undecided. Should the Begum's cause prosper, it would be fatal to offend her favorites; should she fail, it would be ruin to have defied Suraja Doulah.

In this difficulty the council decided that as Narain Sing had stolen like a thief into the settlement his perwannah should not be received, and he was turned out of Calcutta with contempt by unwise and insolent subordinates, who entertained themselves at the spy's expense. A letter from the president to Mr. Watts at Cassimbazar explained, and in a manner apologized for, this treatment.

Not long were we suffered to remain ignorant of the mistake we had made. Allaverdy's widow, desirous of peace, prevailed upon her daughter to acknowledge Suraja Doulah, which concession was no sooner made than Suraja put the Begum under lock and key, and at once possessed himself of her palaces and treasures, together with the person of the baby pretender. Thus in a few hours perished all our hopes of favor from the family of Raja Bullub.

Nor was the new nabob slow to show us that we had little to expect from his friendship. Tidings from home of a breach between England and France had at last aroused us from our torpor; and workmen were employed in repairing the parapet and embrasures of the fort, together with the gun-carriages—all sorely in need of reparation.

This most necessary work—so imprudently deferred to the hour of imminent danger—was but half done, when the president received a perwanah from the nabob, to the effect that he had been informed we were building a wall and digging a large ditch round the town of Calcutta, and further commanding us to desist at once from such works.

The president immediately replied that we had dug no ditch since the invasion of the Morattoes; that in the prospect of a war between France and England we were anxious to prevent the possibility of such a calamity as that which had some years since overtaken our countrymen at Madras; and for this end we were repairing our line of guns to the water-side.

The result of this hasty answer was fatal. A war between the French and English was the very danger this craven-hearted prince had been taught to dread.

After this the authorities at Calcutta endeavored to soothe the nabob's wrath with some slight concessions, and even went so far as to destroy some of our few defenses; but without avail. Suraja Doulah still obstinately demanded that we should throw down a wall we had never built, and fill up a ditch that had not been dug.

On the 6th of June came rumors of calamity. The Company's factory and fort at Cassimbazar had been invested by the nabob, to whom Mr. Watts had surrendered after a brief parley. With a garrison of less than fifty men, a deficiency of ammunition, and but a few small cannon, all more or less out of repair, it would indeed have needed the genius of a Clive to encounter so powerful a besieger. Yet had the garrison but held out for ever so short a period, the time gained would have been invaluable to us at Calcutta; since, had the nabob's march been deferred but a few days, the season of heavy rains would have commenced, and the country have become almost impassable for troops and cannon.

So deeply did Ensign Elliot, the commanding officer at Cassimbazar, feel the humiliation of this tame surrender, that he shot himself through the head, whereby at least he escaped the fate of his men, who were all put in irons and marched off to the common jail at Muxadavad. So much clemency had we to expect from the new nabob.

Dark was the gloom which now brooded over Calcutta. In every face appeared the common expectation of a swift-approaching peril. With some it took the form of fear, and many a pale face was to be seen in the streets and on the fort, for Suraja Doulah had the reputation of being a man to whom cruelty was a favorite pastime; and who could tell what hellish ingenuity he might exercise to make the cup of death unnaturally bitter?

With some bold spirits, however, this crisis was a period of feverish excitement. Warriors by nature, these poor untutored heroes sniffed the scent of battle from afar and were glad.

Among these was Philip Hay. I talked with him after the evil tidings had come from Cassimbazar, and found him in excellent spirits. However bitterly I had suffered from this man there were times when I was compelled to admire his marvelous equanimity of temper. He had borne his dreary life during the last four years with consummate cheerfulness, and had ingratiated himself into the favor of his officers, from whom he had speedily picked up any military knowledge they were willing to impart. His good conduct had advanced him from the rank of a private to that of corporal, in which position he was more than a match for the truculent Irish sergeant, Mr. O'Blagg. Between Hay and myself friendly relations had steadily continued despite our altered positions. He had seen my good fortune without envy—nay, indeed, I believe with a lazy kind of satisfaction, as releasing his conscience from the burden of my ruin. He could now rub his hands cheerily, and say, "Egad, Bob, 'tis the old Scripture story of Joseph and his brethren over again. My selling you into slavery has made your fortune."

Meanwhile I on my part had never omitted to do him a service when the opportunity arose; and though my small influence had not gained him much promotion, it had secured him some trifling benefits, for which he was needlessly grateful.

I found him lounging on one of the batteries, and looking up the Hooghly with an eager expression in his eyes.

"Well, Bob," he cried, as I approached, "I think we are near the end of this dead calm. Be sure the taking of Cassimbazar was but the first act in a stirring tragedy, and we shall soon hear the thunder of the nabob's guns."

"I think the French have taught these Eastern tyrants not to count too much upon their ponderous artillery, which they can but fire once in a quarter of an hour. It was said in the Decan the other day that Bussy's musketry drew smoke from the Morattoes' breasts, and sacrificed hecatombs upon the fire-altars of the French. Depend upon it, they have begun to awaken to the power of European artillery."

"But not such artillery as ours, Bob. The nabob knows our strength to a gun, and knows he can crush us; and, what is more, means to do it, Mr. Robert Ainsleigh. So much the better, say I; welcome the struggle. Let us not walk meekly into the Indian lion's jaws, like these poor cravens of Cassimbazar. Give us a hard fight and a bloody death, if needs be, so that history may record how one handful of Englishmen were found to defy the Eastern tiger.

Do you know what I would do if I were commander of the fort?"

"I can not conceive what original piece of strategy your heroic genius might devise."

"I would collect every ounce of powder we could scrape together—and the Lord knows it would not be much—in the cellars below the fort, and blow fort, factory, and Englishmen to the stars, before the nabob's black devils should enter our gates."

"It would be a more brilliant ending than the capitulation of Madras, and hardly a more costly one, and as a last resource might fairly be tried. But when we have used all our gunpowder in defending ourselves, we shall not have the means of so heroic a suicide. Alas, Phil, I fear a darker doom and a more ignoble end awaits the English in Bengal!"

Upon this we parted, with a friendly nod of farewell; I being obliged to return to my patron's house, where my services might at any time be wanted to copy or translate a letter, or for some other small business detail. Mr. Howell was now constantly backward and forward between his house and the council-chamber, where all the excitement of expectation and uncertainty prevailed.

Now that danger was at our very doors, there was at least some show of activity. Letters demanding reinforcements were dispatched to Madras and Bombay, but with little or no hope that help could reach us from either station in time, since the sea was closed by the south monsoon for the present, and the journey by land the work of a month. Nor did we shrink from the humiliation of asking nearer aid from the French and Dutch, only to meet with contumely and disappointment from both. We had no resource, therefore, but in our own feeble numbers. These, augmented by militia, amounted to scarce five hundred men, two-thirds of whom were Topasses, Armenians, and Portuguese inhabitants, of whose temper or constancy we knew nothing. Our Indian matchlock-men were increased to fifteen hundred, and we now lost no time in storing provisions and erecting such works of defense as we were capable of constructing at so short a notice.

DIAPHANE LAMP SHADES.

THE beautiful articles to which this name has been given are no doubt familiar to most of our readers, and in the large lamp and gas-fitting establishments are generally to be seen a great variety of them. In effect they resemble the costly porcelain transparencies used for the same purpose, but possess the advantage of being much lighter, and also combining various colors with the agreeable light and dark shading of the white porcelain.

First cut the card-board of the proper shape for a shade, having it all in one piece if possible; or it may be made in two pieces, and joined neatly afterward with gum-arabic. Next trace the patterns upon the card, choosing any outline group of flowers, birds, fruit, patriotic emblems, or other subject, arranging them so as to cover the whole shade as nearly as possible. A wreath around the centre looks well, or the bunches may be made to look like medallions, with a scalloped border inclosing them in circles, and a neat running design filling up the intervening spaces.

LAMP SHADE WITH MEDALLION FIGURES.

Lay the card-board, when all are drawn, flat upon a board, and commence the cutting with a sharp penknife, being very careful not to cut entirely around each leaf and flower, but to leave just enough untouched to hold it to the main card.

When all are cut the points and edges of the leaves and flowers, on one side, throughout the entire pattern, may be pushed slightly in with the point of the knife, thus letting in the light upon one side of every leaf, bud, and blossom, and casting a deep shadow on the other side, when held up to the light. By having this pushing done on one side only the proper effect will be produced, and the light will appear to fall most strongly upon that side of the picture. Now join the edges of the shade so as to form the required shape. When this is done, and all are cut and pushed in as described, take double tissue paper of the brightest green color you can get, and put a lining on the inside over all the figures, gumming the edges along the top and bottom. Then cut away the green paper from every one of the flowers and buds, and paste over them other colors of double tissue paper, using the brightest red and yellow, and leaving some without lining, to imitate white ones. Then over all put a smooth lining of white tissue paper, which will conceal the rest, and give it a neat appearance.

The edges of the lamp shade may either be bound with ribbon or cut with a scalloped edge. An ordinary wire frame will answer for a rest for it.

Other beautiful transparencies can be produced in card-board, and used for transom window lights, and for the sides and glass panels of vestibule doors, and many other similar uses.

A beautiful and appropriate design for the square transom window over a hall-door is one of the American eagle, with wings spread, bearing the ribbon in his mouth on which are seen the well-known words, "E Pluribus Unum;" and many other national designs may be copied from the seals of the various States and of the United States. These will look best without the colored lining, unless a dark effect is desired, when a double sheet of green or crimson tissue paper may be put over the whole, and will look better than a variety of colors.

The various patterns of crosses, with wreaths and branches of ivy around them, are very pretty when hung up in the window; or the same designs will look well applied to the lamp shades. The style of drawings required for these patterns is so simple that the specimens given will suggest others, and even a child may make sketches sufficiently accurate and artistic to serve the purpose.

The bronzed iron frames used for porcelain gas shades may be filled with these card transparencies, and will have a beautiful effect. The card best adapted for these is prepared with an intermediate sheet of black, and when cut the effect is very much the same as porcelain.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IF a catalogue could be made containing the names of those who have been victims of kerosene explosions during the last five years, the public would be shocked at the frightful number. Almost every week some painful accident from this cause comes to our knowledge. One, most heart-rending in details, recently occurred in the town of Sing Sing. A mother—Mrs. Leslie by name—was holding her babe in her arms one evening, while her little boy, about three years old, was playing under the table, on which was a lighted kerosene lamp. Suddenly the child jarred the table; the flame of the lamp flared, an instant explosion followed, and a blazing stream of oil ran over the table, upon the floor, setting the little boy's clothes on fire. The frightened mother laid her infant on the floor, and rushed to the rescue of her boy. But immediately her own dress was in flames, and the wild screams which burst from her lips, as she saw the cruel fire also surrounding her babe, brought the neighbors to her assistance. The three sufferers were speedily wrapped in carpeting, which extinguished the flames, but no human aid could save them; they died in a few hours, leaving a husband and father desolated by the sudden and terrible accident.

When any person's clothing takes fire it is seldom of any use to give directions to the sufferer. Indeed, it is generally best to say not a word, but seize a blanket, a woolen cloak, or any woolen material—hold the corners as far apart as you can, stretch them out higher than your head, and, running boldly to the person, make a motion of clapping in the arms, mostly about the shoulders. This instantly smothers the fire and saves the face. The next instant throw the person on the floor. This is an additional safety to the face and breast, and any remnant of flame can be put out more leisurely. Dry flour is one of the most convenient remedies for burns, and is excellent. It causes relief from pain by totally excluding the air from the injured parts. Dredge on a thick layer of flour, and cover with cotton-batting.

In 1854 M. De Lesseps, a wealthy and intelligent Frenchman, conceived the plan of opening a canal direct from the Mediterranean to the Red Sea, across the Isthmus of Suez, a distance of ninety miles. Although many English engineers pronounced the scheme impracticable, a stock company was formed, and the work commenced in 1859. With only one serious interruption it has steadily progressed until the present time, and the projector promises that the canal shall be open throughout its entire length in the fall of 1869. Port Said is the Mediterranean terminus of the canal, and Suez is to be the southern terminus on the Red Sea. The town of Ismailia is the half-way station, and to this place the canal has been for some time open for traffic. The work of excavation is going on with marvelous rapidity by the use of stupendous dredging-machines. This huge canal, 90 miles in length, 309 feet in width and 26 in depth, will cost about $75,000,000. But the commercial world will speedily perceive the advantages it affords; and commerce opens the way for civilization and Christianity.

A correspondent of the American Journal of Horticulture says that she has entirely destroyed the insects which infested her rose-bushes by the use of quassia, and that the plants thrive under the treatment. Quassia may be found at any drug-store. Use two ounces to a gallon of water; boil fifteen or twenty minutes.

Report says that Terre Haute is likely to have a first-class seminary for young ladies before long. A benevolent gentleman has given $100,000 for the purpose of establishing one there.

An English magazine has for some months past opened its columns to a discussion on the advantages and disadvantages of wearing corsets. The opinions elicited have been not a little curious in details. As a general thing, the gentlemen who have expressed their views—and a good many have done so—approve of ladies wearing them; and some go even farther. One writes: "Allow me to inform A. L. and F. C. that I, although not a widower but a married man, have worn ladies' stays for the last three or four years, and find them very comfortable indeed, and would not go without them. I would recommend them to wear them as near the same shape as the ladies as possible; the fulness at the top is an improvement. I generally wear blue silk or scarlet French merino for winter, and the Paris wove (white) in summer. Your correspondents need not feel at all bashful in going to be measured. Stays are worn by gentlemen a great deal more than they think."

A trial is about to take place in Geneva which will create a great sensation in Switzerland. A nurse, named Jeanneret, is charged with poisoning not less than nine different persons whom she had within the space of six months been engaged to attend. The woman appears to have had a monomania of crime, as she neither robbed her victims nor derived any benefit from their death. She is even said to have nursed them with great tenderness. One of her victims, having showed symptoms of poisoning, recovered; and subsequently the nurse was suspected and arrested.

The Rumford Institute in Boston established some time ago a Laboratory for the preparation of food, under the supervision of a Board of Direction versed in Chemistry, Pharmacy, Agriculture, and Mechanical Science, with the working superintendence of the most skillful experts. The Laboratory is under the constant supervision of Professor Blot. The principal article prepared is soup in all its forms, which is of a delicious flavor, and put up so as to keep well.

The "silver wedding" of Mr. and Mrs. John B. Gough was recently celebrated at "Hillside," their residence in Boylston, Mass. It would seem, from the number present, from the value of the gifts, and the cordial manner in which they were presented, that this occasion was one of genuine interest, not merely to the recipients, but to the donors. Among the gifts were a massive solid silver centre-piece, designed to hold either fruit or flowers, and an ice-cream set of fourteen pieces, silver, lined with gold, the offering of friends in Worcester and vicinity. A number of Boston friends presented an elegant and costly bronze clock of exquisite taste in design and finish, accompanying their gift with a memorial bearing the autographs of fifty-two prominent citizens of Boston. A gold watch came from friends in Chicago; the faculty and students of Phillips Academy, Andover, the Young Men's Christian Association of Philadelphia, the Sunday-school in Berlin, and many individuals from numerous cities remembered the occasion. The gifts amounted to over three thousand dollars.

Frazer's Magazine contains an interesting description of a globe of the planet Mars, which was lately exhibited at a meeting of the Astronomical Society of England. Lands and seas were laid down as well-known entities, respecting which no more doubt is felt among astronomers than is felt by geographers concerning the oceans and continents of our own globe. Four extensive continents, and many oceans and seas, have received special names. One of the most singular features of Mars is the prevalence of long and winding inlets and bottle-necked seas. There is little disparity between the extent of oceans and continents, and these are mixed up in the most complex manner. A traveler could journey for upward of 30,000 miles always in sight of land, generally with land in view on both sides, in such intricate labyrinthine fashion are the lands and seas of Mars intertwined.

A curious paper has been read before the French Academy of Medicine on "The Physical and Intellectual Development of Youth by Electricity." From various experiments the writer, Dr. Pogglioli, concludes that the electric fluid exercises a direct influence upon the physical and mental growth of young persons; and he proposes that, by way of experiment, six pupils from each class in a college be subjected to his electrical treatment.

One man has seldom two funeral services performed for him. But an eccentric old gentleman has just died in New Orleans, and was buried with the usual rites. Many years ago, also, he was sick, and died—as was supposed. Preparations were made for the burial. On the appointed day the coffin containing the body was placed in a handsome hearse, which, followed by a long train of mourners, was proceeding toward the cemetery, when the horses suddenly took fright and ran away, the coffin being thrown violently to the ground, and burst open. The surprise of the spectators may be imagined when from the coffin was seen to arise the supposed dead man still instinct with life. He very quietly walked home, protesting against being put away in so summary a manner, and declaring his intention to live for many a long day.

Little things make the happiness or misery of life, especially of home life. Kind words, cheerful faces, consideration for others—in short, genuine politeness renders home delightful. But how is it with the members of many family circles? If an acquaintance treads on your dress by accident you are quick to accept the tendered apology, and say, "Never mind," or "It is of no consequence," even if the garment is torn; but if a husband or child does it, what then? If you enter a friend's house and find the parlor in unwonted confusion, and the children crying and fretting, you accept the apologies offered, and endeavor to assure your friend that you appreciate the situation; but if you go home at night and find that mishaps of unexpected kinds have unsettled the order of your household, what then? Do you pour oil on the troubled waters, or stir them up again? Politeness to children exercises a wonderful influence. The little words, "Thank you," or, "You are very kind," from parent to child, sound very pleasant, and will often make little hearts happy and bright eyes sparkle with gladness. Be polite at home.

If you want to make yourself miserable think all the time about yourself and your own affairs. Be constantly on your guard lest somebody encroach upon your rights. Never yield a point. Be very sensitive, and take every playful joke seriously. If your friends seem to neglect you put the worst construction you can upon their conduct; and by no means take any satisfaction in seeing others enjoy themselves.

A certain gentleman occupying a position in the State Department was once sent to Europe as bearer of dispatches. On his return a friend inquired: "Well, how did you enjoy your trip on the Continent?" To which he replied: "Oh, I didn't visit the Continent; I only had time to see Paris for two or three days, and had to give up the Continent."

According to the records of the Five Points House of Industry, that charitable institution has, during the past year, furnished 400,000 meals to the hungry people of that locality; entertained constantly a family of 250 persons; and given temporary shelter to 1289 persons. The average daily attendance in the schools has been over 400, and the whole number of children taught 1089; lodgings have been furnished to 80,000 homeless poor, and 150,000 pounds of bread have been given to the outdoor poor, besides large quantities of meat and vegetables, as the necessities of the applicant for relief demanded.

Two Fichus for Girls from 6 to 8 Years old.

THESE fichus are worn with high-waist dresses, as seen in the illustrations, and are therefore made of the material of the dress. The fichu, Fig. 1, is trimmed around the edge with a fluting of the same material headed with silk piping. A silk rosette fastens the crossed ends in front. The trimming of the fichu, Fig. 2, is of a scalloped strip of the same material as the fichu, bound with silk, and laid in box-pleats on the other side. This is headed with a bias fold. The bow is of silk ribbon. Both fichus may be cut, by reference to the illustrations, from the pattern given for Dress for Girl from 6 to 8 years old, No. I. of the Supplement.

muffs are particularly new, not being sewed together, but fastened with hooks and eyes.

POCKET MUFF.—This muff is of gray fur lined with blue silk and wadding. It may be hung around the neck with a heavy gray silk cord. This cord is finished with two tassels, and is so arranged on the flap as to bring the tassels in the middle in the manner shown by the illustration. For making the muff cut of fur from Fig. 55, Supplement, two pieces. In one of these pieces make a slit along the double line on Fig. 55, and set in a pocket of silk. Then line both pieces with blue silk and a layer of wadding; stitch these together on the side of the muff, after which join the fur part with overcast stitches, and afterward the silk lining by hemming down one side over the other. In the same manner sew the seam from 43 to 44, but in sewing this sew in also the flap cut of fur and lining from Fig. 66. Lastly, arrange the cord and tassel in the manner shown by the illustration.

shows this blouse, on which is pleated a short skirt. Cut the blouse from the pattern given for Dress for Girl from 8 to 10 years old, No. III., Supplement. The skirt consists of a straight piece of material sixty inches long and eleven inches wide, sloped to nine inches in front, and pleated on the upper side. The trimming consists of flutings, which are set under the edge of the skirt.

bias fold of cashmere. Cut from the pattern given in No. VII., Supplement. The wide strip is two inches, and the narrow one an inch and a quarter wide.

Ermine Cloak, Cap, and Muff.

THIS sack-shaped cloak is of white rabbit skin flecked with black; it is lined with light blue silk and a thin layer of wadding, which are quilted together in diamonds. Large bronze buttons and loops of gold cord serve for fastening the cloak; the under edge is trimmed with wide Angora fringe. Cut from the pattern given for the Sylphide Paletot, Harper's Bazar, No. 55. The cap is also of the same fur, trimmed on the left side with a tuft of Angora fringe and an aigrette of heron feathers and curled white dove feathers. The aigrette is headed with a large bronze button. It is fastened on with an elastic cord. Make the cap from the pattern and description given in No. XV., Supplement. The muff is trimmed with Angora fringe and lined with blue silk.

inches long, which are fringed out on the ends, and pleated at the upper end, which is covered by another end nine inches wide and nine inches long, and also fringed on the lower end. The loops which lie over this are each four inches wide, and the same in length. The upper loop, which is fringed on the end, is four inches wide and three inches long. The knot which covers the seam made by setting the ends on the pleated belt an inch and a half wide consists of a straight piece of material five inches wide.

SASH WITH GORED ENDS.—This sash is trimmed with black silk knotted fringe six inches wide. The length of the long ends (without the fringe) is twenty-four inches, and the width of the lower part ten inches, sloping toward the upper part to four inches. The inner sides of the long ends are straight, all the sloping being done on the outside. The upper short end is sloped on both sides, and is fifteen inches long, the under end eight inches and the upper four inches wide. The upper end of each is laid in a pleat. The three upper loops are each five inches wide and long, and the lower loops are six inches wide and four inches long. Each loop is laid in three pleats; after which sew the loops and ends on the belt an inch and a half wide. A knot hides the stitches made by sewing them on.

BLACK SATIN SASH.—The long ends are trimmed with fringe, and are of double material, twenty-four inches long and nine inches wide. The sides of the loop are corded. The illustration shows the length and width of each. Both loops and ends are pleated in box-pleats, and arranged on a pleated belt an inch and a half in width. Instead of a knot a little bow covers the stitches made by sewing on the loops and ends.

MY BOY.

A lock of golden hair,
Tied with a silken thread;
A tiny shoelet lying there;
A snow-white curtained bed;
A little broken toy;
A book all-soiled and torn;
A jaunty velvet cap my boy
Has often, often worn—

Alas, is all that's left!
(Such is the Father's will.)
His joyous laughter sounds no more;
His little heart is still.

RACHEL GREY'S WORK.

CHARLES MANNING drew in the reins so suddenly that the horses settled back upon their haunches and stood stock-still.

"Rachel Grey, I wonder if you are beside yourself!" he said, as he loosened the reins and the spirited steeds shot forward again. "I declare that if you were not my cousin, and I had not, consequently, some small amount of personal regard for you, I should be tempted to capsize this sleigh and throw you into that snow-bank!"

Rachel Grey laughed merrily.

"I am not mad, most noble Festus."

"Then you have been reading 'Aurora Leigh,' or 'Alton Locke,' or poring over Margaret Fuller's rhapsodies until your head is full of all sorts of ultraisms. Your brain is fairly turned."

"You admit that I have brains then?" she answered, with a sly glance at his face. "Thank you, Sir. I was quite in the dark on that point. I plead guilty to the charge of having read 'Aurora Leigh,' but I have no acquaintance with Kingsley, and do not venture to emulate Margaret Fuller. Nevertheless, I do not intend to spend my days in doing fancy-work, or in crimping my hair."

"You have no need to do the latter," said the young man, casting an admiring glance at the mass of wavy brown hair that rippled back from his companion's brow. "It crimps itself. But these ideas of yours, Rachel, are utterly preposterous."

"Why? I should like to be instructed, Charley."

"Why? Oh, because!—You see, Rachel, the two sexes have different missions. It is ours to do the world's work. We men do not wish that woman should soil her dainty fingers with it. It is our business to do the work, and it is yours to make yourselves charming and fascinating, and all that. When we come home from our daily labors we want to rest ourselves with the sight of your grace and beauty. Woman's work, forsooth! It is to amuse, please, and fascinate. If she does that, she does all that is required of her. We'll do the work."

Rachel laughed outright.

"I beg your pardon, Charley. But how much of the 'world's work' do you and Ned Payson and Wallace Clyde and the rest of your set do, do you think? Just about as much as Miriam Barker, Madge Payson, and I do; and not a whit more. We are none of us doing our work. We are simply amusing ourselves, young men and young women alike. And for my part, I am tired of it, Charley!"

"You say," she continued, after a little, "that it is woman's mission to make herself 'charming,' and imply that it is her true work to 'amuse,' rest, and soothe the real workers—meaning men. Now, I do not feel that most of the men with whom I come in contact are at all in need of such ministrations. If"—and here her voice took a deeper tone, and her cheek glowed like the heart of a rose—"if God should ever send to me one of his true workers, one who, worn and weary from the field of labor, really needed help and cheer, surely I could better play the part of helper, sympathizer, and friend, if I had myself borne somewhat of the burden and heat of the day."

"Oh, pshaw, Rachel! You always take a fellow up so seriously; of course I did not mean that. I meant that woman did her part if she was beautiful, graceful, and, in a word, charming. The flowers have their mission as well as the trees and the golden grain. It is to please. And that is just woman's mission."

Rachel sighed.

"You do not understand me, Charley. Perhaps you can not. But did it never occur to you that there are women who can not content themselves with being mere ornamental appendages to society—women who feel, in view of all there is to be done for the world and for humanity, almost—I speak it reverently—as Paul felt when he cried, 'Woe is me if I preach not the gospel.' As for me, dear Charley, I can not spend my days in simply pleasing myself or others."

Charles Manning's lip curled sarcastically, in spite of the little hand that rested on his arm.

"What great thing do you propose to do?" he asked.

"Nothing great. I mean to do the duty that seems nearest."

"But you have some sort of an idea as to what your 'mission' is? I hate that word!"

"So do I. But remember it is a word of your choosing, not of mine. No, I have no definite project. Still, I think my work will be something akin to Glory McWink's."

"You absurd child! Do you mean you are going to do housework for some good Aunt Henderson?"

"By no means. Although I am inclined to think even that would be a better way of spending one's life than in making it one prolonged course of the German. To wash dishes, if you remember, was not the crowning ambition of Glory's life."

"Oh!" and here the young man, with one flourish of his whip, dextrously cut off the head of a dried mullein stalk that peered above the snow—"oh! You're going to found an orphan asylum! That's what it is. Miss Rachel Grey, I wish you joy. Do you intend being matron of the institution yourself?"

"I haven't got as far as that yet," she answered, laughing. "No, cousin Charley, I do not expect to found an orphan asylum, or to do any other great work. But while there are homeless, homeless, friendless children, wailing in every nook and corner of this great city—toward which you may as well turn your horses' heads again, for the sun is setting—I feel that I can do something better with my time than to use it as we have all of us used ours for the last two winters."

"Humph! The next time I call at the handsome house on Bently Avenue I shall expect to find the drawing-room crowded with just such little rapsallions as that"—and he pointed to a dirty-faced, tow-headed urchin by the road-side—"and Miss Rachel Grey playing the part of a ministering angel. Come, Rachel, be a good child, and give up these new-fangled notions. There is such a jolly set of us, and it will spoil every thing if you go to putting on airs and playing the Sister of Charity."

"I will try not to shock your tastes or your sensibilities, Charley. I shall do nothing 'ultra,' and I do not intend making a martyr or a recluse of myself. But my mind is made up. If it be 'putting on airs' to say that I have led hitherto a frivolous, useless life, and to feel that if I would save my own soul alive I must henceforth do something to make other lives better and happier, then I must put them on."

The horses had struck the pavements again, and the noise and tumult of the great city soon drowned their voices. Charles Manning left his cousin at the door of "the handsome house on Bently Avenue," and went his way wondering "what had come over Rachel," and comforting himself with the thought that this fancy of hers would last just about two weeks.

The Greys of Bently Avenue were poor-rich people—a class of which every town and city of our land holds far too many. People who, while living handsomely, entertaining elegantly, keeping an army of servants, and making a fine appearance generally, are yet poor—because living beyond their income—and perpetually harassed by the question of ways and means. Rachel had long ago learned that while whatever was required for show—whether furniture, dresses, plate, or jewelry, was sure to make its appearance, by hook or by crook—the comfort of a little ready-money in her purse was often denied her. Despite her well-appointed chamber and her elegant wardrobe she often felt poorer than the maid who dressed her hair. For the latter had her wages, independently hers, to keep or to spend precisely as she chose.

When Rachel after a year or two in "society" awoke one day—whether aroused by outside influences, or by the growth of her own spiritual nature—to a new sense of responsibility, she looked about her for something to do. There was work enough. The fields were whitening with the harvest, and the laborers were few. But hers were slight, girlish hands, unused to toiling for herself or for others. What burdens could she lift? what sheaves could she bind with those small fingers?

Little children with white, wan faces and tender limbs that shivered in the wintry blasts crept past her in the streets, or shrank away from cruel blows and crueler words, to hide behind the dry-goods boxes, or to crouch in the shadow of some stately dwelling. But she could not take them to her luxurious home, to wash and feed and clothe them. That was out of the question. There was little danger that Charley would ever find the drawing-room of which he had spoken converted into an almshouse.

If she could only economize, she thought, as she sat by her window and looked out into the night. But how? She had nothing to do with apportioning the household expenses; and as to her wardrobe—why, the credit of "the family" must be maintained. "No scrimping and saving in that direction" was her father's command, and she knew that it must be obeyed.

What then could she do?

She went to sleep pondering the question; and she awoke repeating it as earnestly as he who of old cried out to Paul and Silas, "Sirs, what shall I do to be saved?"—In at the eastern window streamed the morning sun, gilding the cornices and the pretty nick-nacks upon the dressing-table, and lighting up a small picture that hung upon the wall above her bed. Rachel looked at it for a long time, while her eye kindled and her heart beat tumultuously. A sudden thought had come to her like an inspiration.

"I can paint," she said, in a low, eager voice. "That little picture took the first prize at Madame B—'s; and I know I can do better things now. I have not lived all these years for nothing, and at last I have found my work. I had a 'gift for painting,' they said, when I was a school-girl. I will use it to some purpose henceforth, and, God helping me, some homes shall be brighter, some child-hearts happier because I have lived."

Soon after breakfast, in an unnoticeable bonnet and cloak, with her second-best furs on, and a thin, brown paper parcel under her arm, Rachel Grey entered the store of a picture-dealer in the lower part of the city, and asked to see the proprietor. She was shown into the counting-room. As the door closed behind her a tall, gentlemanly man wheeled round from the desk where he was sitting, with an air that said more plainly than words, "Be as expeditious as possible, for I am in a great hurry."

"I will not detain you long, Sir," said Rachel, bowing. "I called merely to ask you what this picture is worth?"

The gentleman took the little painting, cast a careless glance upon it, then scrutinized it more closely, then studied the young girl's face for an instant.

"Is it your own work?" he asked, placing it in a favorable light, and looking at it through his hand.

"Yes," she answered; "it was painted when I was a school-girl. I think I could do better now."

"Finished up by your teacher?" he asked, still continuing his observations.

"No, Sir; no pencil but my own so much as touched it," she answered, her face flushing.

"I meant no offense," he said, smiling. "Only I know such things are done sometimes. This is a very fine picture. Is it for sale?"

"I should be unwilling to part with that," she replied. "I value it for its associations. But I can paint another like it, if you wish."

"I do wish it, decidedly," was the answer, "if you can be content with moderate payment. Neither painters nor poets can expect to receive what their work is really worth nowadays, unless they have some reputation—which you have not, I conclude?"

She shook her head.

"I shall be satisfied, for the present at least," she said, "with whatever you choose to pay me."

"Then you may bring me a copy of this as soon as you please. And let me see whatever else you may do. I will pay you all I can afford—as much as you can get any where."

Rachel's heart bounded as she hastened homeward. At last she had found something to do. Her idle, useless, aimless life, her day of waiting was over. And she thanked God that the work given her was the one thing that she could do best—the doing of which would be a constant joy.

The old easel was brought down from the garret; the pencils and pallet that had lain idle for so long were brought forth from their hiding-places. She was not always successful. At first her fingers seemed to have lost their cunning; and she made more than one or two copies of the painting before she succeeded in producing one that she felt willing to offer to her friend, the picture-dealer. But with eager, heart-satisfying labor, came its inevitable companion, growth. Her strength increased with the using.

When the next year's Christmas bells were chiming Rachel Grey felt very rich; no millionaire in the great city more so. For in many a poverty-stricken dwelling the Christmas fires burned cheerily upon hearth-stones that but for her would have been dark and cold. Little feet, warmly clad, danced about the ruddy blaze; little hands were outstretched in joyful gratitude; little hearts sung for joy as they had never sung before. She had found her work.

And in it she found rest and peace. An unemployed "gift," no matter what it may be, brings constant unrest to its possessor. Paradoxical as it may seem, our powers find repose only in action. Rachel's progress was slow, but sure and steady. Her aspirations were pure and true; and aiming ever at a higher and higher ideal, she "went on unto perfection."

Went toward it, feeling ever that the perfect beauty for which she yearned could never be reached this side of heaven. But feeling also that to aspire and to fail is truer success than to sit with folded hands content in dreamy idleness.

I am writing a story of to-day. Rachel Grey took up her work with no thought of fame; but, unwooded, it is approaching her. Already she wears a tiny wreath of laurel, whose living verdure shall grow with the years, half hidden amidst the ripples of her lustrous hair; and her beautiful art brightens the homes of the rich, even as the money it has brought her has helped to brighten those of the poor.

God bless Rachel Grey, and all true workers who, like her, make their work holy by self-sacrifice!

PARIS CORRESPONDENCE.

THE sojourn of the court at Compiègne still attracts the attention of Paris, and we may say of all Europe.

It is known that during this privileged season all the distinguished personages and celebrities of all sorts in Paris are invited in turn to dwell for a week under the roof of the sovereign, to participate in his life, and to sit at his table.

Among the illustrious persons admitted to this honor there have already been this year Jules Sandeau (of the French Academy), Paul Féval, Gustave Doré, and Ambroise Thomas; and Emile Augier, Octave Feuillet, Camille Doucet, and Ernest Legouvé, all of the Academy, are to be invited by-and-by.

There are four series of invitations, for a week each, and the guests of each series number about a hundred. They bring with them one or two servants, and their saddle-horses, in order to hunt, if it seems good to them. The ladies are accompanied by one or two maids, and also bring their horses if they are fond of riding. There are, besides, a hundred saddle-horses in the Imperial stables, designed for those of the guests who have none of their own.

The most elegant toilettes are displayed at Compiègne. The ladies dress four times a day, and vie with each other in magnificence. The walking dresses are short and of comparative simplicity. The indoor dresses are trained. The evening dresses are naturally also trained and decolletées. There is dancing every evening.

The most interesting hour of the day is that when the Empress takes tea. This is served at five o'clock, in her Majesty's private parlor, and the honor of being present is reserved as a special favor. She does not, therefore, invite all the guests, but only a choice few, and generally more men than women. This is the time for conversation; the wits tell stories, or engage in courteous discussions, in which the Empress often joins unexpectedly. The Empress is very much of a Spaniard, and very much of a woman, that is to say, passionate in her opinions, quick at repartee, and steadfast when on the defensive. Her friends find in her a valiant advocate, and where admiration is concerned she knows no politics. For instance, she is a great admirer of Victor Hugo, and speaks of the poet's works with an enthusiasm which does her credit.

The Empress's fête was gayly celebrated at Compiègne by improvised private theatricals. A little piece composed the night before by Jules Sandeau and Paul Féval was admirably played by them, together with Messrs. Delesert, Henri Rivière, and the Count de Lezay-Marnesin. The laurels of the evening were carried off, however, by an actress whose first appearance on the boards revealed incomparable talent; the young Countess Welles de Lavalette (the daughter of the Minister Rouher), a model lawyer's daughter, glib of tongue, fertile in expedients, and witty enough to raise a laugh from the seven sages of Greece. With her figured the wife of Marshal Canrobert, the Princess Marie d'Albe, and Mademoiselle de Lagrenée. The Empress's ladies of honor each offered her a present, the work of their own hands. Among these a magnificent white satin cushion, on which the imperial eagle was embroidered in gold, was remarkable for its beauty.

The Empress's toilettes are all ravishing. On Sunday, at mass, she wore a blue satin trained dress, trimmed with Russian sable, with a polonaise of the same, likewise trimmed with sable, and a bonnet of iris velvet with aigrette. On the promenade she wears short costumes, as we have said, usually made by the dress-maker, Madame Laferrière.

Another beautiful toilette is of cigar-colored plush; under-skirt with a wide-pleated flounce of gros grain; poplin over-skirt, simply caught up behind à la paysanne. The extremely unique casaque of the same plush is very much gathered in at the waist, where it is trimmed with a gros grain bow with four coques and ends. This casaque is adjusted behind, and forms tabs in front like a mantelet. The very full sleeves are simulated. This stylish toilette is the Compiègne.

A dress of very dark ultramarine-blue cloth, shot with black, is bordered with fringe. The over-skirt is caught up over a black velvet under-skirt with a deep flounce, surmounted by a puffing of velvet. Black velvet chemise Russe; ultramarine-blue cloth casaque, shot with black and trimmed with fringe with large sleeves, which show the chemise Russe underneath.

Velvet under-skirts are extremely recherché just now; and black or colored silk tunics produce a very pretty effect over them. The casaque is always like the tunic, and the chemise Russe like the under-skirt.

One of the most beautiful novelties of Madame Laferrière is the Louis XIII. velvet mantelet. This is a little mantelet with short, square tabs, with a cape slightly cut up in the shape of a heart, and a black velvet bow at the centre of the slope. The mantelet is edged with a puffing. The Empress has one of these in black velvet, with dress to match. One of her ladies of honor wears a very beautiful one of lapis-blue velvet, a new and very dark shade of blue.

With the costumes round toques of felt or velvet, trimmed with feathers, are worn at Compiègne. At Paris ravishing hats, dyed berets, are the rage. These resemble the Dubarry coiffure. They are almost round, with a feather forming a pouf in front and sometimes falling behind over the hair, and an aigrette at the side. They are admirably adapted to youthful faces.

On the day of the fête the Empress wore a splendid dress of Solferino poul de soie, with a satin train of the same color, trimmed with magnificent point d'Alençon lace. She wore a magnificent diamond parure, and the royal crown of diamonds adorned her brow.

ELIANE DE MARSY.

MY CHRISTMAS MYSTERY.

FOR years I had spent Christmas with the Yarnolds, at their place down in Lincolnshire. Such a habit had this become that I never thought of Christmas except in association with the old Manor-house they lived in, and the wintry aspect of the pleasant scenery surrounding it. The understanding was that I should not wait for an invitation; but in the December of the year of which I am going to speak—a year not very remote—I did receive a letter from my old friends, couched in such warm, cordial terms that I could not have refused to accede to their wishes whatever other arrangements I might have contemplated.

A special day was named for my going down, and I was advised to take the train leaving London at five in the afternoon, so that the carriage might meet me at the station when the train came in, and take me and my luggage on to the Manor-house. To this I assented in my letter acknowledging the invitation, and so was not only pledged to spend the holidays at a particular place, but also to start on a given day at a fixed hour.

These arrangements subsequently became important, because, had they not been entered into, I might not have gone to the Manor-house that year; I certainly should not have started on the day agreed upon, for on the morning of that day a very unpleasant circumstance happened. The morning's post brought me a letter from a stranger, of rather a startling nature. It was in a woman's handwriting, and signed Martha Rathgrave. The letter commenced in fiercely-indignant and upbraiding terms, and it charged me with cowardice and villainy. Then the tone changed to one of piteous appeal and entreaty. It is not necessary that I should set down the exact terms of the letter here; enough that, as I gathered, the writer was a frantic mother, whose daughter had been tempted from her home by some designing scoundrel, and who, distracted between indignation and misery, besought in hysterical and incoherent terms that as far as possible the injury might be repaired by the restoration of the misguided Agnes (that was the name given) to her home and friends.

The shock of such an epistle may be imagined. My astonishment at the receipt of it was unbounded. That it was intended for me there could be no mistake. My name appeared in full on the envelope, with my address—Hare Court, Temple—and my name was repeated at the bottom of the fourth page of the sheet of note-paper. Yet I swear I had never heard the name of Rathgrave before; and as to being a party to the abduction of the unfortunate Agnes, the charge was simply ludicrous.

Martha Rathgrave wrote from Chertsey. Had the day been at my own disposal I should certainly have started off at once in search of the lady, with a view to clearing up the mystery. But there was my packing, and I had fifty little matters to see about before the hour at which it was inevitable that I should catch my specified train. There was nothing for it but to write a letter, and I sat down for the purpose. I sat down; but under the circumstances a letter was a difficult thing to write. What could I say that would in any way satisfy Mrs. Rathgrave? To tell her that she was mistaken, and that I was not the man she supposed, would obviously to her mind be adding untruth to the catalogue of my misdeeds. She had called me a coward; I hesitated at convincing her that I was a liar.

While sitting pondering over this, I presently bethought me of an expedient. I could not go to Chertsey myself, but I could send a friend. Exactly; but who? I thought and thought, then suddenly I hit upon it. There was Gilbert Stone. The very man; young, smart, fond of adventure, and ever ready to do a man a service. Moreover, he was easily to be found—his chambers were only in the next Court. Without further reflection I resolved to take him into my confidence in this strange business, and to ask him to fathom the mystery for me.

With the open letter in my hand I started off for Stone's chambers. They were on the fourth floor, and when I had mounted to the top of the gloomy staircase I found, to my disappointment, that his outer door was closed. Thinking it still possible that he might be there, I gave a sharp rap, but there was no response from within. The case was hopeless.

I had decided this and was about to turn away, when I heard somebody begin slowly to mount the stairs. It was a heavy, weary step, but came on steadily, round after round. I leaned over the balustrade, and was mentally contrasting the step with Stone's light, agile bound, when to my intense astonishment, on the figure coming into sight, I recognized Stone himself. At the same moment he caught sight of me, and certainly his astonishment was not less than mine. He started, and put out a hand against the wall to steady himself.

"Wh-what do you want?" he gasped, in an angry tone.

"You're not well?" I rejoined, giving him question for question.

"Nonsense! Never better in my life. What is it?"

I said it would be necessary to go into some little explanation, and he then crawled up the few remaining steps, and putting his back against the stair-window, folded his arms, and intimated that he was ready to hear what I had to say. He seemed to have no intention of asking me into his chambers, and though I thought this odd, I would not appear to take any notice of it.

There is seldom too much light in the Temple in December, and this morning was specially gloomy. So, in the position Gilbert Stone had taken up, his face was wholly dark to me—I could not see a line of it. In a few words I explained what had happened, and proposed to read the letter. He nodded, and I went through it from end to end. He apparently listened intently; but when I had done, and had folded up the paper, he still retained his listening attitude, and it was only when I said, "Now, I want you to see into this for me, old boy," that he started up and replied, "With pleasure; give me the letter." I gave it into his hand.

"And you know nothing whatever of these people?" he asked.

"Absolutely nothing."

He laughed.

"All right. You are the genuine victim of a mystery. Envious being! Well, enjoy yourself, old boy. Consider all this as good as squared. You'll hear from me. A merry Christmas to you!"

I reciprocated the wish, we shook hands, and I hurried away to prepare for my journey with a sense of relief. In a few hours I felt certain the unpleasant little mistake would be cleared up. Still, I felt anxious for Stone's letter. And that reminded me—I had not told him where I was going. Well, no matter, I couldn't toil up those stairs again; he must address me at my chambers, and his communication would be forwarded to Lincolnshire in due course.

And now I reach a portion of my narrative where it is necessary for me to observe the utmost exactness of detail, in order to gain credence for what I shall have to state. My packing was finished at 4.30; a cab then conveyed me and my portmanteau and hat-box to the Great Northern Terminus. The train starting at five was, as I knew, express to Peterborough, not stopping on the way; it ultimately reached Lincoln, the station nearest my destination, at nine that night.

There were not many passengers by that train. I noticed this myself, and it was confirmed by the guard, with whom I got into conversation, and who was kind enough to offer me a compartment to myself, in case I preferred it. I did prefer it, as I had some papers I wished to look over going down, and the guard showed me into a first-class carriage (No. 287), and locked the door to secure me against intrusion. As soon as we were fairly out of the terminus I took the bundle of papers I have mentioned from my pocket, determined to make the utmost of the rapidly-fading light, for though the carriage-lamps were lit they were not pleasant to read by.

The oscillation of the carriage as the train bounded along at express speed was irritating; but in spite of it I soon managed to get absorbed in my work. For some twenty or thirty miles I read on and on, making myself master of the details of a somewhat intricate case which had been submitted to my judgment. Then a very natural thing happened. My mind reverted to the event of the morning, I suppose, and suddenly the name of Agnes Rathgrave began to intrude itself into my reading. The words mixed themselves up in an odd fashion with the writing before my eyes—gleamed and flashed there with such vividness that I began to lose myself in idle speculations about this unknown girl. Was she pretty? Interesting in manner? Loving in disposition? These and similar questions were bewildering me when I was suddenly startled by a sound as of a deep groan close to my ear.

Though I believed myself alone in the carriage I looked up sharply. Daylight was waning; but the lamps had in consequence brightened, and I had no difficulty in seeing about me with the utmost clearness.

Imagine my astonishment, then, when, on raising my eyes, I discovered that I was not the sole occupant of the compartment!

Unquestionably, it was shared by a companion. The seat next but one to my own was occupied by a lady, who sat gazing intently out of the farther window. There could be no doubt about her being there, yet I felt certain that she had not entered the carriage at King's-cross, and it was quite impossible that she could have entered it since, while we were tearing along at express speed. My flesh crept, and I felt a lifting of my hair as I looked at her; yet I did look at her very intently, so intently that I can recall every minute particular of her appearance and attire.

She was, so far as I could judge, not more than twenty years of age, petite in figure, with small, delicately-shaped hands and feet. As she wore a black veil shiny with bugles down to her mouth the upper part of her face was hidden, but the lower portion was most delicately turned. Mouth and chin were beautiful; so was a little shell-like ear, of which I caught sight. But what struck me most forcibly was the snowy whiteness of the complexion; there was no flush in it; even the lips were bloodless. The lady's dress was neat to simplicity. She wore a black-and-white-check silk, the skirt quite plain, and a short velvet mantle. Her bonnet was also of velvet, with a cluster of pansies in it over the left temple. I saw no jewelry. My attention was specially drawn to my companion's hands from their unusual smallness, and the exactness with which her gloves fitted. Moreover, she had a peculiarity of the left hand; she kept it tightly clenched, and I presently saw that her object in doing so was to retain fast hold of a crumpled fragment of paper; but the apparent tenacity of grip might, I decided, be unconscious, as she was clearly much self-absorbed.

Can I say that as I gazed at my companion I experienced a sense of terror? No; it hardly amounted to that, especially after the first shock of discovering that she was there. How she had come there certainly puzzled me. It was most singular that after what had passed the guard should have admitted her. It was more singular still that he should have been able to do so without my knowledge. On the other hand, there she was, sitting bodily before my eyes, as real and tangible as the carriage itself.

Beginning to smile at my own alarm, I presently mustered up courage enough to address the lady. Bending forward, I inquired whether she preferred the window down.

The noise of the train was so great that I could hardly hear my own voice; but she heard it, and turning toward me smiled graciously. Her lips also moved, and as she placed her right hand on the window-strap at the same moment I understood her to answer me in the affirmative. So I bowed, leaned back in my seat, and tried to resume my reading. In this I was only partially successful. My eyes were constantly wandering toward my companion, who was again watching the fading landscape through her veil, while I speculated on the mystery of her being there.

"I will speak to the guard at Peterborough," I mentally determined.

As I did so our speed began to slacken, and looking out I saw that we were close upon the old town. The express stage of our journey was near its end. The beautiful façade of the cathedral was already in view. Within a few minutes we were entering the station. The platform was on my side the carriage (the reverse had been the case in starting at King's-cross), and as the name of the place was shouted out, mingled with a cry of "Tickets!" I noticed that my companion turned her face my way.

"You get out here?" I inquired.

She inclined her head.

I put my hand out to open the door for her. It was locked. At the same moment the collector came up and asked to see my ticket.

"This lady will get out here, if you will unlock the door," I said.

"Lady, Sir; what lady?"

I turned sharply to where my companion had been seated. She was gone!

"There was a lady seated in this carriage a moment ago," I stammered out.

"Impossible, Sir."

"But I tell you—"

We were interrupted by the appearance of the guard.

"What's the matter, Sir?" he asked.

"Tell me," I demanded, eagerly. "Did you or did you not admit a lady into this compartment before the train started from London?"

"Sir!" he ejaculated; then, peering in my face and seeing the look of consternation there, he added, in a conciliatory tone, "Been dreaming, Sir; there can't have been no lady here along of you, Sir. BOTH THE DOORS WAS LOCKED."

I darted to the other door and tried it—fastened! A cold shudder crept over me as I looked at the amused faces of the two men. My own must have been ghost-like.

Fortunately, there was no time to discuss the matter further; time was up, and the train moved on. As the station receded from view, and a sense of being alone again came over me, I nearly swooned with terror. There could be no blinking the truth to myself now; I HAD SEEN A GHOST! It had appeared to me in that place, and for all I knew it might return. My eyes glared at the seat it had occupied. I dared not turn from it, yet I felt assured that should the phantom present itself again I should throw myself from the carriage in the very madness of terror. My only consolation was that the train stopped at the next station, Boston, only a few miles distant, and there it would be practicable for me to get into another compartment, one in which there were booked and duly accredited human passengers.

The distance between Peterborough and Boston was interminable to me in my agony of alarm; but it was traversed without any fresh ghostly experience, and the instant the train stopped I leaped out. The relief of escaping was so intense that I could hardly stay to collect together my papers, rugs, and other trifles. A porter proffered assistance, and I gladly availed myself of it, though I had to put up with his astonished looks when he found I was only moving from one carriage to another, apparently without an object. I selected a compartment this time with plenty of life in it—two burly farmers and an apple-faced old lady gave promise of security from further horror, and I was congratulating myself on the success of my move when, just as the train began to move, the porter I had engaged came to the window and touched his cap.

"Beg pardon, Sir," he said, "but does this belong to your papers? Found it on the seat of the other carriage."

He held out as he spoke a crumpled fragment of manuscript; I recognized it the moment I took it. There could be no mistake as to its being the fragment of paper my mysterious fellow-traveler had clutched so tightly in her hand!

The train had started, and it was impossible to give back the paper. It was not mine; I had no right to it; yet so peculiar was the chance that had given it in my possession, and so strangely was it connected with the most singular experience of my life, that I felt bound to preserve it. As the eyes of my companions were all upon me in that undisguised stare common to country folk, I simply placed the fragment in my pocket-book, determined to examine it on reaching my journey's end.

My reception at the Manor-house was so cordial, and it was so absolutely necessary to render one's self agreeable among a houseful of guests, that my adventure almost passed out of my head until I found myself in the dead of the night alone in the sleeping-chamber which had been assigned to me. It was a great, old-fashioned, wainscoted room, with a huge chimney in which the wind roared, and a bay-window opening among trees, that, now bare and gaunt, swayed their skeleton arms up and down before it with an incessant creaking in every joint. All the alarm I had felt in the railway-carriage instantly came back to me with redoubled intensity. I found my eyes wandering from chair to chair, confident that I should presently see my ghostly companion seated in one of them. And instead of trying to banish this impression from my mind by reflecting on other things, I found the one subject drawing me to it with irresistible fascination. I could not even resist at that dismal hour the temptation to examine the paper in my pocket-book.

The sight of this, as I drew it out, gave me a turn; yet it was a very simple matter. A mere crumpled scrap of writing. I sat some time with it lying open in the palm of my hand, looking at it dreamily. Then an idea, suggested by the shape of the paper and the wrinkles in it, suddenly seized me.

"This is part of a letter," I said aloud, "a part held in a hand with a desperate clutch while the rest has been wrenched away. She must have held this in a death-grasp."

A gust of wind howled round the chamber, and moaned itself piteously away. The cold dew of terror came out in beads upon my brow.

It was some time before I could summon courage to undertake a minute examination of the writing before me. When I did it yielded little: there were only a few lines on one side of the paper, and they were broken and fragmentary. This was all I read:—"MAKE YOU MY WIFE AND I SHALL NOT FORGET.....FOOLISH IMPATIENCE RUIN ALL.....YOUR FAMILY.....EXPOSURE.....TO BE REGRETTERED." There was nothing more; all that might have rendered this an intelligible sentence had been torn away; as it was, the fragment was worthless. It told nothing, and how could it in any way throw a light on the mystery of the apparition which troubled me more and more as I reflected on it? Indeed, I felt that I dared not think over it too intensely, and though the ghostliness of the chamber (exaggerated by my own imagination, no doubt) weighed heavily upon me, I boldly extinguished the light and threw myself on the bed, where, after a time, fatigue resulted in broken slumbers.

All next day I debated with myself whether I should take my host into my confidence in the matter of my railway mystery; but though Yarnold is a capital fellow, he is one of those sturdy, hard-headed, unsentimental yeomen, with no possible belief in the supernatural, and I decided that he would only receive my statement with incredulity or open laughter; so I kept my counsel for that day. Next morning my letters were brought up to my room. All that had come to me at the Temple had been put into an envelope which I had left directed with my clerk, so that he might forward them to the Manor-house. The letters chiefly related to matters of business; but the last I opened had more special personal interest. It was the letter I had expected from Gilbert Stone, and related to the commission he had undertaken.

Stone's communication was short—a mere note—but to the purpose. He had called on the lady, Mrs. Rathgrave; had found her greatly concerned at her daughter's elopement with some person unknown, but who appeared to have corresponded with the girl in my name, borrowed, in all probability, from the London Directory, to which authority the mother had gone for my address. Stone added that he had effectually cleared up the mistake so far as I was concerned. He wrote in haste, as he was going off with a friend to spend his Christmas in the country.

"Thank goodness," I ejaculated, "there is one mystery cleared up. Now, if I could only satisfy myself about my fellow-traveler—"

I stopped abruptly. Surprise took away my breath; while speaking I had held Stone's letter in my hand, regarding it with a fixed and thorough gaze. Now, with a quick, lightning-suddenness, a discovery flashed upon me.

THE WRITING ON THE FRAGMENT OF PAPER WHICH THE WOMAN HAD HELD IN HER GRASP WAS IDENTICAL WITH THAT OF THE LETTER BEFORE ME!

No wonder I was mute with utter astonishment. Of course, the first impression yielded to doubt; but a close and minute comparison of letter for letter decided me. The words I had read overnight were in Gilbert Stone's handwriting. What, then, did it all mean? What, had happened?

I went down to breakfast revolving those questions in my mind, and greatly perturbed.

Yarnold met me in the corridor; he had been reading his letters; there was a sheaf of them in his hand. His face was radiant.

"More guests, my boy!" he exclaimed, shaking the letters at me as we met. "By Jove! we shall have to get the Manor-house enlarged by next Christmas."

"Indeed!"

"Yes: and as it is we shall have to quarter one of the new-comers on you; a friend of Sir Harry Finch's. You may know him, by-the-way; he is at the bar."

"Does Sir Harry mention his name?"

"Oh, certainly—let me see, yes, here it is—Gilbert Stone."

I was conscious of starting and changing color. Yarnold looked surprised, as he well might, for he could little guess the strange thoughts and misgivings which were already shaping themselves in my mind about the man whose name he had mentioned as about to come there as his guest. However, I submitted to his surprised looks, rather than make any statement as to those doubts and misgivings. They were, indeed, so vague that I could hardly have put them into words. I contented myself with remarking that I believed I knew Sir Harry's friend, and Yarnold himself, to my relief, soon changed the subject.

Three nights after, Gilbert Stone came down. His surprise at seeing me was naturally very great. I had not mentioned to him in town where I was going to spend my Christmas, and it certainly seemed a strange coincidence that his friend Sir Harry Finch should have brought him down to the same place. It was, though he did not suspect it, more than coincidence; it was destiny. He did not mention his letter transmitted to me that morning, and of course I said nothing about the discovery I had made, identifying the writing with that of the fragment left by my spectral companion in the railway train. In truth, little passed between us, for I fancied that, great as was his surprise at seeing me, his uneasiness was greater. Nor, I could tell, was this lessened on his hearing that it was my room he was to share. He affected to be charmed, but I saw that his lower lip dropped and quivered. I had already come to regard him with grave suspicion, and I determined to observe him closely.

There was dancing that night, and Stone threw himself into the amusement with enthusiasm—I thought with recklessness, if not desperation. Suddenly, when the gayety of the scene was at its height, I saw him give a hurried glance round the hall and steal away. I followed him, but at a distance. He ascended the stairs, and traversed the corridor leading to our room. His step was noiseless, and I pursued him like his shadow.

The room was full of moonlight. As he went in he thrust to the door, but did not close it. I stole up and looked in. He was stooping over a portmanteau, from which he took out a small writing-desk; a key attached to his watch-chain enabled him to open this. What could be his object? The moonlight was strong enough to show me that he took from the desk a handful of open letters. But a man does not leave the dance to read letters by moonlight. No, nor by lamplight; though while the thought was in my mind he struck a match and lit the taper on a table by his side. Then he held out one of the letters toward the hardly-kindled flame, so that the corner of the paper almost ignited. His object, then, was not to read, but to destroy—to destroy something before I was there to observe his movements.

In the instant of my detecting that intention I was in the room, my right hand had firm hold of his wrist, and we were glaring at each other, eye to eye.

"Stay, Gilbert Stone!" I cried. "You destroy nothing."

"Who will prevent me?" he demanded, fiercely.

"I will!"

"And by whose authority?"

"That of the dead!"

His look changed, and he staggered from me. Then with the courage of desperation he summoned up all his strength and made a rush, seizing me by the throat. Our struggle was short and sharp: I threw him, and he lay at my feet glaring.

In the contest the letters had fallen, and lay scattered about us. Among them was the one he would have destroyed in the flame. I recognized that at a glance, for it was much crumpled, and a half-circular piece had been torn out of the bottom of it. Hardly a second glance was necessary to convince me that I had in my pocket-book the missing piece, which would render it complete.

As Stone gazed at me with vicious eyes I tore out my pocket-book, produced the fragment, and fitted it into the letter, which it matched with exactness.

"How dare you come here to pry into my letters?" the man demanded, with an attempt at swagger.

"I have given you my authority," I replied; "it is that of the unhappy woman to whom you wrote these words: 'You know that I have promised to make you my wife, and I shall not forget that promise when the proper time comes, unless you by your foolish impatience ruin all, bring disgrace upon your family, and lend yourself to an exposure that will assuredly have to be regretted. Be reasonable, and confide wholly in your devoted Adorer.'"

It will be seen that I pieced out the sense of the fragment (in small capitals) by means of the letter itself.

The horror of Gilbert Stone as I did so was intense, and was only exceeded when in a few stern words I told him how it had come into my possession. At that narrative all his manliness left him; he fell at my feet, and abjectly implored my pity, my compassion. I reminded him that as yet I only suspected him of some offense dark enough to arouse the spirits of another world to rise up to avenge it.

"Yes," he exclaimed, with a shudder, "it was she—it was Agnes."

"What! Agnes Rathgrave!" I cried in amazement.

"The same. It was to her that this letter was addressed."

I was bewildered, confounded, and I said so.

"You shall know all," he said, "but my lips burn, my throat is parched; I must have water—water."

He scrambled to his feet and, going to the carafon, poured out a draught into a glass, and gulped it down eagerly.

Then he entered on a deliberate confession, which revealed all. He admitted that it was he who had made advances to Agnes Rathgrave, but in my name, simply used as the first that occurred to him with which to screen his own. In that name he had promised her marriage; and two nights before she had come to his chambers in mad desperation, bringing with her his letter, and threatening exposure unless he kept his promise. Her words were exasperating, his temper short, and he rushed on her and tried to tear the letter from her hand. Part he secured; but in the struggle she stumbled and fell backward, bearing with her the small portion by which she held. That fall was fatal. To his horror the woman lay dead at his feet. "I see her now," he cried, putting his hands before his eyes, "lying there stiff in her silk dress, and with the short veil half hiding her dead face." He added that he sat gazing at the body half the night, then he thought him that there were empty chambers in the same court to which his key would gain him admission. To those chambers he had carried the body through the darkness, and there it remained.

This statement fully accounted for the state of trepidation in which he met me on his stairs in the morning, and the readiness with which he undertook to clear up the Rathgrave mystery, about which he knew too much already. His subsequent letter to me was of course a lie; he had not seen Mrs. Rathgrave, having only too strong reasons for keeping out of her way.

"But I had managed it all so cleverly," he added, "that I might have got off unsuspected if the poor dead wretch had only been laid at rest in a Christian grave. But she has appeared to you: she may appear to others, and it is useless to fight the dead."

He started up and pressed both hands tightly over his heart.

The color had gone from his face while he spoke, and I now saw that it was distorted and convulsed.

"You are ill!" I exclaimed. "Let me ring—"

"Too late, my boy, too late," he said, faintly. "It is ten minutes since I drank the water—"

"Well?"

"It was poisoned."

He dropped forward on his face, and before assistance could come to him had breathed his last spasmodic breath, and was dead.

And thus the spirit of the murdered victim of his heartless cruelty and treachery was mysteriously avenged.

THE FROST QUEEN'S COURT.

WHERE the chilliest moonbeam shoots its ray,
Far from the realms of the dazzling day,
Crowned with crystals of glittering sheen,
She holds her court—the fair Frost Queen.

From the river's depth at her birth she rose,
Silently o'er as the soundless snows,
Bursting the chains of the stagnant tide,
And Winter smiled as he claimed his bride.

Her robe of snow-flake, wonderful, white,
Than the lustre of diamonds gleams more bright—
Her jewels of ice, yet rarer gems
Ne'er sparkled in monarch's diadems.

Whatever is there, her palace through,
Moonlit, dazzles with myriad hue,
By Winter 'twas reared: more luminous far
Than mortal dwellings its splendors are.

Splendor and silence both are there;
Floats an influence strange through that chilly air,
Prisoning and deadening the life-blood's flow
In the earth's glad veins; white, to and fro,

The courtier elves, a glittering band,
Silently speed their queen's command:
There's a mystic power in her chilling breath,
For the Frost Queen's life is Nature's death.

Swift at her word an icy spell
Seems on each living thing to dwell,
Enthralling the land, enthralling the flood,
Holding in death-like chains the wood.

She breathes, and the flowers they cease to grow—
She breathes, and the mill-stream fails to flow;
The bosom of earth is in slumber bound,
There is death above—there is death around!

From her palace her subject-sprites proceed,
Eager the Frost Queen's bidding to speed,
Decking, as if for funeral rite,
Nature's corpse with their jewels bright.

On the dry dead branch of the withered tree
Their crystals they hang all silently;
The lifeless soil, in its shroud of snow,
They make as with diamond spark to glow.

And ever through Nature's wintry night,
Jeweled with splendor, cold and bright,
Proud in her beauty, chilling in mien,
She holds her court—the fair Frost Queen.

Radiance there is in that palace fair,
But 'tis not the light of life is there:
There's a mystic spell in the Frost Queen's breath—
She breathes, and straight it is Nature's death.

CHAPTER XVII.

STRANGE WAYFARERS IN HORN.

On the 24th of March, 1866, Prussia forwarded a circular dispatch to the minor German States, setting forth her differences with Austria.

All Europe felt the oppression of the coming storm. The thunder-clouds which had long been darkening the political sky began to send forth pale, brief flashes, and to mutter ominously. Throughout Germany the excitement was intense, although, for the present, in great part suppressed. The people waited panting in the sulphurous atmosphere, and the lightning drew nearer, and the clouds grew blacker, and the thunder rolled louder day by day.

On the 7th of April Austria demanded the demobilization of the Prussian forces.

In the district that includes the principalities of Lippe-Detmold and Pymont, and sundry neighboring lands, one chief cause of excitement was the departure of bands of young men to enroll themselves in the Prussian army. Recruiting went on vigorously—some said secretly. But the amount of secrecy can not have been great, since every man, woman, and child in the two principalities was talking about it.

Among the fortunate Lippe-Detmolders the recruiting agents had small chance of doing much.

In Lippe-Detmold there were no taxes.—That eloquent sentence conveys all that need be said on the subject in these pages. But Lippe-Detmold had neighboring lands that were not so blessed.

In Waldeck, for example, there was much discontent and a good deal of poverty. The peasants would tell you, with touching simplicity and good faith, that their august ruler was very good. Oh yes; he was good and kind-hearted, and would never oppress the poor. But he had bad servants under him—hard, unjust stewards, who ground the people down. As to the Prince—if they could only let him know their grievances, they would soon be redressed; but—bless you!—the Prince was away in Vienna, or some place at the other end of the world!

Patriotism or enthusiasm for a United Germany had very little to do with it, but nevertheless the fact was, that Prussia found many accessions to her armies in tiny Waldeck; and numbers of these recruits passed through Horn on their way southward.

The knot of old cronies that still gathered nightly in the hostelry of the Pied Lamb had to yield so far to the resistless current of fact as to discuss the portentous events that were happening. Every day brought fresh tidings of moment.

Night after night the landlord and the sacristan sat opposite to each other with grave faces—Schnarcher's gaunt, hard, and savage; Quendel's broad, fat, and solemn. Schnarcher seemed to protest, in every fibre of his lean frame, against the course of events. Quendel opposed only his ponderous immobility to the current.

Peters sank lower than ever in the opinion of his old friends. They could not divest themselves of a suspicion that contemporary history was justifying the apothecary in a good many theories and opinions which he had propounded during the past year; and this naturally hardened their hearts against him.

It is not so very difficult to excuse a man for being wrong; but it is sometimes terribly hard to forgive him for being right.

The sacristan's temper was especially exacerbated by the sight of parties of burschen, who would stop occasionally to refresh themselves at the Pied Lamb or the humbler ale-house on the other side of the main street, as they tramped through Horn; and many were the derisive and cutting remarks that fell from the old man's lips. Even Quendel, in whose huge bulk the landlord instinct was alive and active, sometimes shook his head deprecatingly at some bitter outburst of the old sacristan's displeasure; and would make a clumsy attempt to convey in an aside to his beer-consuming customers that the Herr Küster's sentiments were not entirely shared by him, the host of the Pied Lamb. These attempts invariably resulted, it is true, in drawing down upon his own head the vials of Simon Schnarcher's wrath; for the old sacristan was a great deal too keen not to perceive his friend's double-dealing. But Quendel bore any amount of scolding and abuse from the sacristan with an unmoved mind. Indeed, he appeared rather to enjoy the exhibition of his old crony's energy and scorn, so long as such scorn was let off by means of the safety-valve of personal vituperation directed against himself.

Come what might, Simon Schnarcher would continue to drink his beer and smoke his pipe in the speiseshal of the Pied Lamb every evening so long as he should be able to hobble thither at all. But chance customers were liable to take offense and walk off to the rival ale-house.

When Otto walked into his uncle's house at Horn on the morning which succeeded his interview with Liese, he found no one in the room on the ground-floor, which served as parlor, kitchen, and dining-saloon, except old Sophie.

His uncle was out, she said, at the Herr Pastor's. There had been a christening that morning at St. Mary's. Had Otto come to Horn about the letter which had arrived that morning from Herr Schmitt? Ach Himmel! the Herr Küster was finely put out about it! In truth he was put out about most things lately. The world was going on a queer road, thought Sophie.

Otto did not care to stay and listen to the old woman's grumblings, which were but an echo of the sacristan's. Besides, he was eager to disburden his mind of the serious disclosure he had to make to his uncle, and he did not desire to be damped and discouraged by Sophie's lugubrious account of how much the Herr Küster had been "put out" lately.

Otto asked for a glass of beer and a crust of brown bread; and having taken this modest refreshment after his walk, he went out again to stroll through the little town, where almost every

"Hanne's well and hearty, thank ye, Otto; well and hearty is my old woman; and—and busy—very busy. The fact is, lad, it's washing-day with my old woman, so I—I just came down here to have a look at the pigs. 'They're thriving most amazing; only look at the beauties.'"

The science of pig-culture had not made very great progress in Detmold; or, at all events, it had not extended its blessing to Franz Lehmann's farm. The animals he contemplated with such fond approval would have made but a sorry figure at Baker Street. The discovery that the pig is an animal which loves and thrives on the daintiest cleanliness was far from the farmer's mind; and, in fact, his pigs were ill-built, long-legged, black-bristled, ugly beasts enough.

But they had certain grand porcine peculiarities which distinguish the race every where. They wallowed languidly in the filthy mud which covered the sty, or grubbed with greedy snouts in the well-filled trough. One very large fat creature, that had evidently gorged itself to repletion, lay stretched on its side in such a manner as to command a view of the trough out of which the others were still feeding, and blinked with one half-opened eye languidly upward at the rich dainties, giving vent every now and then to a muffled grunt that was almost rapturous in its expression of satisfied gluttony.

Lehmann gazed down pensively into the sty.

"Ah, thrive they do, most amazingly!" said he, softly. "Nice creatures, ain't they?"

"Well, yes; I suppose they are, of their kind. But I have no particular fancy for them. 'They're greedy, dirty, lazy beasts, I always think.'"

"Ah, there's a deal of comfort in pigs, though; so easy-going; do such credit to their keep; never want scrubbing, or scouring, or grooming. Give 'em their bellies full, and there ain't no peace, comfortabler creatures in the world.

ised to be his, and to be true to him, and to love him always, and how they both hoped that "cousin Franz," who had been Lieschen's loving benefactor from her babyhood, would approve of their attachment, and give his consent that they should be betrothed.

"Softly, lad, softly!" cried Lehmann, putting his hand over his eyes. "You fairly take my breath away!"

Then, after a moment, he seized Otto's hand and shook it heartily, saying that he had always loved him from a boy, and that he knew no one to whose care he would more gladly intrust little Lieschen.

"God bless you, Herr Lehmann. You make me very happy!"

"Ay, ay, but there is much to be said first. I doubt you and Lieschen are but a couple of children that don't look beyond the day. Have you spoken to the sacristan yet on the subject?"

"No; he was from home. But I am going back now to Horn, and I shall tell him all."

Lehmann shook his head. He did not encourage Otto to expect a very favorable answer from his uncle. There were various circumstances which led him to fear that the sacristan would disapprove of such a match—circumstances of which, perhaps, Otto was ignorant, but which must be explained to him before he bound himself irrevocably to marry Liese. In the first place, she would have no money, or next to none. The farm would pass, after the death of Franz Lehmann and his wife, to a distant relative of the former. That had all been settled long ago by the will of Lehmann's grandfather. Had Franz had a son the farm would have descended to him. As it was, he—Lehmann—had no power to bequeath a rood of the land to Liese. There were other circumstances which it was right Otto should know.

Otto broke in impatiently:

"Um Gottes willen! dear Lehmann; say no more! Money! Do you think that if my darling could come to me covered with gold and jewels I should love her or value her one grain the more? You have said the only words I wished or cared to hear—namely, that you are willing to trust me with the dear maiden. What else matters to me or to Lieschen! When my uncle knows that you have given your consent he can not withhold his own. Besides, I can work. I am strong and young. Don't shake your head and look grave, mein bester freund. All will be well; I feel it. I must hasten back to Horn now. If I had time I would go in and salute Frau Hanne, and ask her to say a kind word to me on my betrothal, but—"

"Ach behüte! Thou dear Heaven, how hot-headed these boys and girls are! Go in to speak to Hanne now! Why it's as much as I shall dare to venture inside the house for my dinner. Ach-h-h! you don't know what washing-day means. I shall just stay quietly here and think matters over. I'm a slow-witted man, Otto; and I don't take in new ideas so easy as some. I require time and a good long pull at my pipe to set my thoughts in order."

Otto wrung the farmer's honest hand, and set off running in the direction of the sacristan's house.

Once at a turn of the road he stopped for a moment and looked back. Franz Lehmann was leaning with folded arms on the wooden fence of the pig-sty; and Otto said to himself, laughingly, "I hope he does find some comfort in his pigs, the good farmer! Ah, a shrewish wife is a sore cross to bear. Now my Lieschen is so sweet-natured and gentle!"

As Otto came near the Pied Lamb on his way down the main street he saw a little knot of persons assembled close to the inn. Quendel stood at the open door of his hostelry, whence five men, poorly dressed, dusty, and travel-stained, had just emerged. At one or two windows on the opposite side of the way heads were to be seen. The blacksmith had come out of his forge to see, and the horse-faced man who kept the "general shop" had paused in the act of serving a customer, and was staring stolidly across the half-door of his shop.

The travelers pursued their way with the resolute air of men who had yet many a mile to tramp, and the denizens of Horn watched them in silence.

"Good-morning, Herr Quendel!" said Otto, stopping for a moment at the door of the Pied Lamb.

"Morning, Otto! You're not going to join that distinguished party, are you?"

"Not I. Who are they, and where are they journeying to? They haven't the look of handwerkslurschen."

"Nothing so respectable. As to who they are, I don't know any thing except that they come out of Waldeck. As to where they are going—well, least said soonest mended, perhaps.

"I DON'T MIND TELLING YOU THAT THEY'RE RECRUITS GOING TO JOIN THE PRUSSIAN ARMY."

living creature, including the dogs and the horses, was his personal acquaintance.

"I will be back again before my uncle returns, Sophie," he said.

"Ganz gut. The Herr Küster will be at home to his dinner at 12 o'clock. Nay, you may chance to meet him coming from the pastor's house."

Horn was not a place whose outward aspect varied very much or very often. Otto felt almost surprised to find every thing in the same state as he remembered it when a school-boy. Not that that period was so very remote, but changes had taken place in himself: a great deal had happened to Otto since yesterday; nothing, apparently, had happened to Horn during the last ten years.

He strolled on, exchanging a nod or a warmer greeting with various acquaintances as he passed up the broad main street, but not stopping to get into conversation with any one, until he came to where the houses grew rarer, and the gardens wider, and Lehmann's farm came into view.

Its vast steep barn-roof shone red in the morning sunshine, and was a conspicuous object even among the other towering edifices of the like kind which skirted the road. Otto knew that farmer Franz would in all probability be lounging about the homestead at this hour, and as he drew nearer he saw Lehmann's tall figure in the farm-yard.

Otto called out a greeting while he was still at some distance from his old friend, and the farmer turned toward him with a face of pleased surprise.

"Come in, lad, come in! Mind the duck-pond, and don't tread on the old dog's tail; he's purblind now, poor beast! Well, Otto, and what brings you to Horn betimes in the forenoon? Come to see your uncle, eh?"

"Yes, Herr Lehmann, I had some business to talk over with him. How is your good haus-frau?"

Lehmann's face fell a little, and the sparkle went out of his blue eyes.

You're too young to understand it yet a while, Otto. But sometime or other—when you're married and settled—and when"—added the farmer, with a movement of the corners of his mouth which began as though it meant to be a smile, but stopped short of it—"when it's washing-day you'll understand the comfort there is in pigs."

Otto laughed. Then his face grew grave again. "When I'm married, farmer Lehmann!" he exclaimed, with a little sigh.

"Yes, to be sure. You will be married some day. Most folks are. The Lord only knows why the half of them do marry. But I suppose it's all for the best."

Then the farmer asked Otto how he got on in Detmold, and what was the news there; and the young man told him of Herr Schmitt's approaching departure, and how he—Otto—had once more a place to seek in the world. They spoke, too, about the rumored retirement of Major von Groll from the land-stewardship; and Otto confided to his friend his intention of applying to the Justizrath von Schleppers, and his hope that that benevolent old gentleman would assist him.

Franz Lehmann was not one of those who swelled the chorus of the Justizrath's praises. He had, indeed, imbibed a strong prejudice against the lawyer. But he thought and said that he saw no reason why Von Schleppers should refuse to lay Otto's case before the Prince. And if that were done, Lehmann believed that his highness would surely give Otto a good post at once—something better than a mere jäger's place, the farmer thought; for every one knew that the Prince had liked and valued Head-ranger Hemmerich. Franz Lehmann's friendly words of encouragement warmed Otto's heart, and in his open impetuous way, almost before he had thought in his own mind how he should make the disclosure, he poured out to the farmer all the story of his love for Liese, and she had prom-

But I don't mind telling you"—here Quendel subdued his harsh bass voice to a whisper that reminded one of the preliminary hoarse wheezing sometimes to be heard in the pipes of an organ when the bellows begin to move, and before the fingers of the player have touched the keys—"I don't mind telling you that they're recruits going to join the Prussian army."

"Ach so!" cried Otto, turning to look after the men with increased interest. "Well, as things are, perhaps they couldn't do better."

"I am sorry to hear the Herr Küster's nephew make such a speech," said Quendel, with grave rebuke.

Then when Otto was half-way down the street, and the little knot of idlers had dispersed, the landlord relieved his overcharged feelings by a string of sonorous oaths.

"Couldn't do better, quotha! Hol' mich der henker if I know what they could do worse!"

A MONSTER PIE.

AT this season of good cheer, it may be appetizing to read the description of the huge game-pie, compounded by the celebrated Ude, and presented by the Earl of Sefton to the appreciative corporation of Liverpool. This pie was to be a monster proof of the author's learning and generosity. Its contents were to be of the best; it was to overflow with good things; it was to be an Amalthea's horn, brimming with bonne-bouches. One fine morning, inspired by the sunshine that streamed round him as he stood monarch of all he surveyed in the Earl's kitchen—M. Louis Eustache Ude, formerly cook of Louis XVI.—collected around him great piles of game, poultry, veal, ham, bacon, forcemeat, and truffles. His caskets of spices stood near him, open, a bin of flour was at hand, and huge rolls of flower-scented Devonshire butter were within call. Ude first buttered a large brazier pan, and then lined it as one would line a hat, with a thin unctuous sheet of fat bacon. In the centre he gravely placed a very large turkey, breast downward, well larded, and stuffed with four very fine boned and larded pullets, seasoned with salt, pepper, and allspice, and with forcemeat laid in the trenches of the backs. The great composer then deposited round the patriarch turkey, the centre of all, eight boned and larded pheasants, seasoned and stuffed with truffles, and inside each pheasant was a boned and larded partridge, on the principle of the Chinese puzzle, and promising well for the future. The chinks and cavities were filled in with truffles, calf's liver, bacon, livers of game and fowls, and the white flesh and dark opaque livers of six rabbits, which had been chopped into forcemeat to garnish the monster corporation pie. But this was a mere sketch at present. The troops were on the ground, it is true, but the real battle had yet to be won. A shovel of coals too much on the oven fire, and the splendor of a Sefton might be doomed to dust and ashes. Ude, gay and sanguine, then stuffed in a good deal of larded veal, some special wedges of ham, and twenty pounds of fragrant and carefully culled truffles. He covered the whole with a sheet of fat bacon, seasoning it all over; he parted from it with a longing, lingering look; and hermetically closing the brazier by putting a paper all round the cover, put it in the oven for a fiery probation of two hours. It was then allowed to get quite cool, and was tempered by imprisonment in an ice-house to make it thoroughly cold. Ude then dipped the brazier into warm water to loosen the contents, and, the first stage of the work of art being over, he removed the gravy and fat, and put the meat, etc., into a temporary purgatory of ice.

The paste had now to be made. He first threw about a coal-scuttle of flour into a vast earthen bowl, and prepared the butter in a stew-pan with boiling water and some salt. The flour was beaten up into a paste with a giant wooden spoon, then worked on the dresser, and placed before the fire for a moment, covered with a cloth, to help the manipulation. So far so good. Ude felt like Phidias when chiseling out the form of Apollo, or like Cellini when in the fiery agony of casting his famous statue of Perseus. The fate of Europe seemed to hang upon that pie. Heaven only knew what indignations among the worthy corporation the failure of that paste might not occasion. Ude next spread on the honored table of the venerated Earl a large thick sheet of paste, and moulded the inner walls of the treasure-house of delicacies. The iced meat was already firm, and jellied together to receive its envelope, which Ude skillfully lapped over the top. He then covered the top with a second vast sheet, and patted it down over the first, shaping it as he did so, and moulding the walls with architectural hand and dextrous masonic fingers. When form and symmetry were obtained Ude squeezed out of the fat putty-like paste a projecting border to form the foot, and with nimble fingers pinched out a border and cornice-rims for the top. With a large ring of paste the Ulysses of the kitchen framed a chimney to the pie, as a sort of ventilating shaft, and also shaped a garland of sharp myrtle-like leaves to wreath the ring and chimney aforesaid, while all around he wove a trellis-work of brittle thread, and spread vine leaves of paste, and made a sort of low wall round the flue to prevent the gravy and fat from boiling over, and so spoiling the monster corporation pie. The great work was now nearly accomplished; it only wanted two or three finishing touches from the master-hand. Ude brushed the pie with dore, and then gravely and thankfully placed it in a moderate and carefully-tempered oven. It took three long hours, and it was all the fire could do in that time to blend those flavors and soften those intermingled meats. Before he withdrew it from the oven, Ude, ever cautious, thrust with thoughtful probe into the chimney of the monster a long keen larding-pin, to make the final assay, and try if the meat were soft enough and thoroughly done down to the lowest stratum. He next, with learned unction and placid triumph, added down the funnel the gravy and fat hoarded from the brazier. He also made a jelly of bones of fowls, rabbits, turkeys, and pheasants, and some knuckle of veal and ham highly seasoned with spice, bay leaves, sweet basil, thyme, cloves, mace, cayenne, and plenty of salt. Then reducing this jelly, part of it was poured when boiling into the pie. This pie took two days to become cold. It required great care to lift, as it was too heavy for one French cook. The remaining jelly was spread over the pie when it was opened. It was indeed a veritable chef-d'œuvre, reflecting much credit on Ude's heart, but more upon his head.

GREEK FUNERALS.

IN Greece it is the custom to dress up the dead in his best clothes, and put on a new pair of shoes; the hands and feet are tied; the body must lie facing the east, two long wax-tapers standing up alight at the head and feet, and a small picture of the Holy Virgin placed on the chest. All relations must call at the house, and remain in there and taste no food of any kind until the body be buried. A cup full of wine is brought into the room, and they wash the hands and face of the corpse with the wine, and deposit the empty cup inside the waistcoat of the dead. As soon as the body is removed a stone is placed on the floor where the body was lying, and a small cup full of wine, the stone and the cup remaining on the floor for three days and three nights, with a wax-taper burning the whole time. When the body is lowered into the grave the priest empties a large bottle full of wine. When a distinguished person dies there is always a funeral oration recited at his tomb. On their return from the cemetery all the intimate friends and relatives return to the house and have a regular feast, consisting of all kinds of viands, except flesh, with plenty of wine and raki. Three days afterward a quantity of cakes are blessed by the priest in church, and distributed to all the friends and acquaintances of the deceased. Exactly three years after burial the priests and relatives proceed to the grave and disinter the dead; if the body be found perfectly decomposed they collect the bones and transfer them to a monastery or a church, for which they pay a fee of fifty piastres; should, unfortunately, the body be found in good preservation, through their sins or those of the deceased, they replace the remains in the grave, and have prayers read in church for the remission of their sins and the decay of the body of their relative. Bishops are buried in a sitting posture in an easy-chair, and a wax-taper burning; if, at the three years, on opening the tomb, the taper be found still burning, it is considered an infallible proof that the holy father had become a saint. When a Turk is buried the priest, or hözza, puts in the grave a key and a copper coin; the key is for the purpose of opening the door of Paradise, and the coin for giving bagish to the porter. The Christians in Turkey believe that three days after a Turk has been buried he becomes a dog and walks out of his tomb; while they maintain that when a poor Jew is lowered into his grave the earth throws up the corpse seven times, unwilling to receive in her bowels the body of such a wicked unbeliever; but that, after the seventh time, the body is deposited again, and a large stone placed on the top of the tomb. This is believed by the uneducated portion of the Greeks, who also believe that every Easter the Jews steal a Christian boy, and make use of his blood for seasoning their unleavened bread.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Make a tight-fitting bodice, merely reaching to the belt in front, extending over the hips to form a pointed jockey basque behind like those seen on riding habits. Trim with lace, either thread or guipure, headed by a ruche of faille or a row of passementerie. If you have broad shoulders, design a Pompadour square with the trimming; if you are narrow, make bretelles. The coat-sleeves have a ruffle of lace at the elbow.

A MODERN EVE.—Get a black ottoman velours with very heavy cord. Make with two skirts; the upper has six narrow breadths and is looped high at the sides. A band of black Astrakhan borders each skirt. Your velvet sacque will complete the costume. Mink, sable, and chinchilla are very fashionable furs, but at present the preference is for the curled fleeces. The garnet shades now in vogue would suit you in lieu of the forbidden drab.

HELIE.—A braided chignon will cost from $15 to $20. The crêpes for the front hair from $5 to $7. Address any of the hair-dressers named in the Bazar.

A COUNTRY GIRL.—The goods you send is a species of poplin. Make a single skirt and polonaise. Line the polonaise with flannel, and add a cape also flannel lined. Trim with a pleated ruffle of the same six inches wide on the skirt, three inches on the polonaise.

BELLE.—The covers for the Bazar are not quite ready. You shall be informed about them in due time. A handsome cloak for a middle-aged lady is a fine black beaver cut as a loose sacque rather long, with a large round cape. Trim with several rows of silk braid, or with Astrakhan. Trim your drab poplin house dress with garnet velvet cut bias from the piece. Make the skirt a demi-train, bordered with a two-inch band of velvet. The bodice has revers faced with velvet. A bow for epaulets, and at the wrist of the coat-sleeves. Make a bias ruffle scalloped and bound with black satin on the skirt of your plaid poplin. The black poplin over-skirt has six narrow widths looped at the side à la camargo. Trim the black skirt with a plaid binding and fringe. Do not alter the shape of your velvet cloak. Border it with lace and passementerie, and form bretelles, as they will become your slight figure. A quilling of narrow black lace across the top of the head, with a velvet band around the chignon, is the coiffure you want.

A SUBSCRIBER.—The elbow cape is merely a round pelerine or talma reaching to the elbow.

A GRATEFUL READER.—Puffs around the sleeve at the arm-hole appear to shorten long arms. Puffed bretelles graduated give the appearance of breadth to a slight figure. A small cape, square in front and pointed behind like a hood, is also becoming. Bands of black satin piped with orange is the trimming for your dress.

Y. D. M.—Satin is one of the most fashionable materials for evening dress. It is a great risk to have your wedding dress dyed; besides, white is greatly worn this season. Why not trim it handsomely with black lace, or with satin of a becoming color? Make your black silk with two skirts, a flounce on the lower one, lace and a pleated ruche on the upper skirt, and short polka basque.

AGNES H.—To roll your hair in curl papers is less injurious than the application of heat. There are lotions advertised for curling straight hair, but we know of none that we would recommend.

YOUNG MOTHER.—We have not given any directions for crocheted or knitted sacks for children. It will be easy for you to work one, however. Cut a pattern of the size and shape desired, and work in any of the stitches described in No. 58 of the Bazar, widening or narrowing as the pattern requires. It will be easier to work each piece separately, and then sew or crochet them together. In a short time both leggings and drawers will be illustrated in the Bazar. It will be very easy to combine the two and so work what you desire.

SUBSCRIBER, No. 33.—We know of no book like that you desire.

A FRIEND.—In Harper's Bazar, No. 56, you will find a recipe for making the hair grow.

NELLIE MAY.—We know of no other planchette than Kirby's, the price of which is one dollar and upward. The back numbers of your Bazar have been sent.

NORA.—In crochet or knitting + signifies a double repetition. A certain portion of the work is to be repeated and we represent it by +; but if within that portion some stitches need to be repeated we represent them by *, and the larger repeated portion by +.

PAT.—The average duration of life of the hare, the cat, and the sheep is 10 years; of the dog from 14 to 20; of the sow and partridge 25; of the crow and eagle 100; and it is said that the goose sometimes lives to the extraordinary age of 150 years.

SOLDIER.—Not knowing your capabilities it is impossible to advise you in regard to a proper occupation. The money you have saved it will be well to invest in Government securities until you decide upon a business, when you may find better use for it.

KATINKA.—The title of the spiritual ruler of Japan is Mikado, that of the temporal one is Tiagon or Tycoon, the latter being the sovereign de facto and the former sovereign de jure.

EDNA EABLE.—There is no such thing as purl in crochet. To purl is to knit backward in knitting.

MAX A.—We know of no book on the subject to which you refer. We have given various glove patterns in the Bazar, which can be adjusted so as to answer your purpose.

C. H. CLARK.—The books bought at trade sales are precisely the same as all others in market.

HELENA.—The turning down of the lower right-hand corner of a visiting card signifies condolence; the upper right-hand corner, congratulation; the upper left corner, an ordinary call; and the left lower corner, adieu. These words are often engraved on the reverse of the card so as to show when turned down.

Mrs. L. H., St. Louis.—This is said, on French authority, to be a good mixture for dyeing dark hair light:

White wine 1 pint.
Rhubarb 5 ounces.

Boil down to one-half of the quantity, strain, steep the hair in the mixture, and let it dry without wiping.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE is a perfect hair-dressing for preserving and beautifying the hair, and rendering it dark and glossy. No other compound possesses the peculiar properties which so exactly suit the various conditions of the human hair. It is the best and cheapest hair-dressing in the world. For sale by all druggists.

PRANG'S AMERICAN CHROMOS.—WHITTIER'S "Barefoot Boy," by PRANG, from a painting by EASTMAN JOHNSON, costs only five dollars, and both poet and artist say it is "every way satisfactory." It is a sweet picture.—N. O. Picayune.

ALMOST every day we hear many persons complaining of headache, loss of appetite, and that they are not fit to do any thing, etc. Many are the days that we have felt so ourselves, and in fact have gone to bed and imagined ourselves sick, but for the life of us could not tell what was the matter. One day, while thus complaining, a friend said to us, "Why don't you try PLANTATION BITTERS? They are really a good thing, and will make you feel like a new man." Upon his recommendation we purchased a bottle, and took them according to directions. They seemed to go right to the spot, and gave us immediate relief. Ever since we have taken every opportunity to recommend them.—Post.

MAGNOLIA WATER.—Superior to the best imported German Cologne, and sold at half the price.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR REMOVED from any part of the body in five minutes, without injury to the skin, by UPHAM'S DEFLIPATORY POWDER. $1 25 by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, 115 South Seventh St., Philadelphia.

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by News-dealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

MOths-PATCHES, FRECKLES, AND TAN.—Now is the time to clear the complexion for the winter from those disagreeable discolorations, by using PERRY'S MOth AND FRECKLE LOTION. Sold by all Druggists.

SOZODONT.

An Eminent Chemist says:

489 BROADWAY, N. Y., July 5, 1866.

I have made a chemical analysis of the preparation for the teeth known as "SOZODONT," for Messrs. HALL & RUOKEL, the object of the analysis being to ascertain whether it contains substances detrimental to the teeth or gums.

An impartial sample of the "SOZODONT" was purchased by me personally from a leading Drug House of this city, and carefully analyzed for acids and other corrosive or injurious ingredients likely to have a detrimental action on the teeth or gums, but nothing of an objectionable character was found in its composition. Parties sending Club or other orders for less than Thirty Dollars had better send a Post-office Draft or Money with their orders, to save the expense of collections by express; but larger orders we will forward by express, to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages for Clubs of less than Thirty Dollars.

Parties getting their Teas from us may confidently rely upon getting them pure and fresh, as they come direct from the custom-house stores to our warehouses.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within thirty days, and have the money refunded.

N. B.—Inhabitants of villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one third (besides the express charges) by sending directly to the

"GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY."

CAUTION.—As some concerns, in this city and other places, imitate our name and style of advertising and doing business, it is important that our friends should be very careful to write our address in full, and also to put on the number of our Post-Office Box, as appears in this advertisement. This will prevent their orders from getting into the hands of bogus imitators.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine, Weekly, and Bazar. These three periodicals fully merit the high encomiums which they have received from the press, and the support which has been given them by the reading public. Whether one considers their beautiful and instructive illustrations, which leave untouched no subject of domestic or foreign importance—their literary merit, which has given them the highest place in the current literature—or their judicious editorial management—they must be emphatically pronounced the three best family periodicals in the world.—The Advance: Chicago.

Now is the Time to Subscribe.

"Unquestionably the best sustained work of the kind in the world."

Harper's Magazine.

The most popular Monthly in the world.—New York Observer.

It is one of the wonders of journalism—the editorial management of HARPER'S.—Nation.

"A complete Pictorial History of the Times."

Harper's Weekly.

AN ILLUSTRATED NEWSPAPER.

The model newspaper of our country—complete in all the departments of an American family paper—HARPER'S WEEKLY has earned for itself a right to its title, "A Journal of Civilization."—N. Y. Evening Post. The articles upon public questions which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY from week to week form a remarkable series of brief political essays. They are distinguished by clear and pointed statements, by good common-sense, by independence and breadth of view. They are the expression of mature conviction, high principle, and strong feeling, and take their place among the best newspaper writing of the time.—North American Review.

An Illustrated Weekly Journal of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

Harper's Bazar.

A Supplement containing numerous full-sized Patterns of useful articles accompanies the paper every fortnight, and occasionally an elegant Colored Fashion Plate.

HARPER'S BAZAR contains 16 folio pages of the size of HARPER'S WEEKLY, printed on superfine calendered paper, and is published weekly.

HARPER'S BAZAR contains, besides pictures, patterns, etc., a variety of matter of especial use and interest to the family; articles on health, dress, and housekeeping in all its branches; its editorial matter is specially adapted to the circle it is intended to interest and instruct; and it has, besides, good stories and literary matter of merit.—New York Evening Post.

TERMS FOR 1869:

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00

HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to pre-pay the United States postage.

Subscribers to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Each periodical is stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

The volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name and address should be clearly written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and the new one must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

FACETIE.

DESIROUS OF SUICIDE.—The following extraordinary advertisement appears in a French paper: "A man discouraged, and who wishes to end his life, wishes to meet with a desirous of meeting with an English gentleman who will promise to settle 10,000 francs upon the children. He will then place himself on a high place, to fight all his duels, mount the summit of a glacier, descend into the crater of Vesuvius, or precipitate himself from a balloon. Address M.A.D., poste restante, Paris."

LITERARY.

A new novel by Mr. Edmund Yates is announced to appear shortly. It is to be called "Wrecked in Port." It is rumored that the same talented author is busy at a sequel to the above, which he has already christened "Preserved in Sherry."

CONSOLATION.

"What is your consolation in life and in death?" asked a clergyman of a young miss in a Bible-class that he was catechizing.

The young lady blushed and hesitated.

"Will you not tell me?" urged the clergyman.

"I don't want to tell his name," said the ingenious girl, "but I've no objection to telling you where he lives."

"Aunt," said a sentimental niece to a bereaved widow, "now you're prosperous and 'well to do,' let us get some pretty tombstones for good Uncle Daniel; you know he has none at his grave."

Aunt Keziah lifted up her hands, and emphasized this touching expression: "Jane, if they want any thing of Daniel at the Judgment, they can find him without a guide-board; I tell you he'll be there in time."

The United States contains the following singularly named post-offices: Marrow Bones, Sorrel Horse, Ti Ti, Toto, Why Not, Alone, Backbone, Carryall, Fame, Time, Stony Man, Sal Soda, Newborn, Yankee Jim's Rough, Rough and Ready, Pipe Stem, Shickshiny, Overalls, Snowshoes, Miracle Run, Simmer, Lookout, Paint, Last Chance, Ogunquit, Memory, Tally Ho, Spuyten Duyvil, Tired Creek, and Our Town.

What large fruit does a gigantic married couple resemble?—A big pear, of course.

MEDICO-CHIRURGICAL GASTRONOMY.

EXAMINER. "What is the best local application for gastritis?"

CANDIDATE. "Bread Sauce."

CHEAP LAND.—Farms in Arkansas sell at from three to five cents an acre. An Arkansas paper says that dirt is such a drug in that State that if a purchaser does not look out they'll smuggle forty or fifty extra acres on him in making out the deed.

TO THE THOUGHTFUL.—Not every man can grow coffee who has coffee-grounds in his cup.

A young lady in the mountains of Virginia once asked a member of her Sunday-school class who made him. Upon his confession of ignorance on that subject she tried to shame him by pointing to a very small boy who was an fail on the rudiments, but was rather taken aback when he replied: "Think he oughter: he don't look like he's been made more than three weeks, and hain't had time to forget where he come from."

We have ever found that blacksmiths are more or less given to vice. Carpenters, for the most part, speak plainly, but they will chisel when they get a chance. Not unfrequently they are bores, and often annoy one with their old saws.

A THRILLING SITUATION.

ENRAGED INHABITANT. "Did any one see you enter?"
TAX COLLECTOR (taken by surprise). "Not that I know of."
ENRAGED INHABITANT. "Then no one shall see you leave!"

A COQUETTE'S CAUTION.

A-knitting in my easy-chair,
My thoughts are fluttering here and there,
My feet are on the fender;
Beside me sits my faithful pug;
My favorite "tabby" on the rug
Fills me with fancies tender.

I think how in those days of yore
I reckoned lovers by the score;
How now my fortune varies.
To-night I sit in lone despair,
And now bestow my love and care
On kittens and canaries.

Time was there did not come a post
But brought of "billets-doux" a host,
From writers fond and clever;
But now 'tis bills the postman brings,
Or circulars, and such-like things—
But love-letters, oh, never!

Once every morning brought its guest;
My knocker scarce had any rest,
My "flames" were always calling;
'Tis "Taxes" now, or "Water Rate,"
Who turns the handle of my gate,
And knocks with zeal appalling.

I was a jolly dancer then,
A favorite partner with the men—
In waltzing I'd no equal;
My dancing now is all alone,
When with rheumatic pains I groan.
Oh, what a bitter sequel!

Instead of rides to cover-side,
At "Clothing-Clubs" I now preside,
And serve on "Tract" Committees;
Instead of "parties" without end,
I Dorcas Meetings now attend;
Yet who my sad lot pities?

I flirted till it was too late;
O'erthrown by avenging fate,
Behold in me a warning:
Young maidens, do not always flirt;
Be wise, and Nemesis avert,
And waste not Life's bright morning.

"Mr. Timothy," said a young lady who had been showing off her wit at the expense of a dangler, "you remind me of a barometer that is filled with nothing in the upper story."

"Divine Almira," meekly replied the adorer, "in thanking you for that compliment let me remind you that you occupy the upper story entirely."

A POPULAR VESSEL—Courtship.

A cowardly fellow—a "gent"—lounging for the enchantment of servant-girls, kicked a news-boy the other day for pestering him to buy an evening paper. The lad's revenge was ingenious and complete. He waited till another boy accosted "the gent," and then shouted, in the hearing of all bystanders, "It's no use to try him, Jim; he can't read."

A MOVEMENT IN REAL ESTATE—An earthquake.

What is the most dangerous ship to embark in?—Authorship.

Never tell your secrets in a corn-field, for it has a thousand ears.

HOW TO TAKE THE CENSUS OF THE CHILDREN OF A NEIGHBORHOOD—Employ an organ-grinder for five minutes.

A PUBLIC SINGER WHO "DRAWS" WELL—The mosquito.

OCEAN LUMBER—The sea-board.

It is said that as the twig is bent the tree is inclined. Some young ladies will grow queerly if the Grecian Bend prevails long.

The coats of the Irish reapers have been described as "a parcel of holes sewn together."

THE COMMONEST SOCIAL VIOLE—Advice.

GRATE PREPARATIONS—Getting ready for winter fires.

One of the papers contains an advertisement: "Lost, a large black silk umbrella, belonging to a gentleman with a curious carved ivory head."

A man buying a horse made his bargain with the seller that he should pay fifteen pieces of gold in hand, and be in debt for the remainder. A short time after, the seller demanding payment of the balance, the other answered, "No, you must keep to your bargain; it was agreed that I should be in your debt for the remainder, and how can that be if I pay it?"

A negro clergyman addressed his congregation thus: "B'low'd bredren and sisters, you dono how to tell de sheeps from de goats. Bery well! I shall ask you which ob dem hab de wool, and which ob dem hab de hair?"

An honest dame in the town of —, standing beside the corpse of her deceased husband, bewailing in piteous tones his untimely departure, observed, "It's a pity he's dead, for his teeth are as good as ever they was."

If you want to abbreviate a man's stature from six feet to four, ask him to lend you twenty-five dollars. Of course he says he is short, and shows it by the rest of the conversation.

J. B. was a stingy old creature, eager for money, but he was a zealous member of a church, and ostentatious in his religious exercises. "John," said Catharine to her brother, "what could have made that stingy old wretch a Christian?" "I can tell you," said John: "he has read that the streets of New Jerusalem are paved with gold, and he is determined to get there."

"Why don't you ask me how I am?" smilingly said a lady visitor to a four-year-old girl.

"I don't want to know," was little innocent's reply.

"What is it that causes the saltiness of the ocean?" inquired a teacher.

"The codfish," was the reply.

Why is praising children like a preparation of opium?—Because it is laudin' 'em.

THE FIRST VEGETABLE EVER KNOWN—Time.

Query: is the wheel of time ever tired?

MEMORIA TECHNICA ZODIACALIS.

Lest January should be hot,
It boasts a Man with Water-pot.
St. Val. in February wishes
That love should swim like little Fishes.
A Ram appears in March, nor scorns
To take the winter by the horns.
In April water-butts are full,
And butts are dealt in by a Bull.
Crickets and boating start in May,
And so the Twins about it play.
In June we've out-of-doors confab,
And what are picnics sine Crab?
The days of dogs proclaim July,
And dogs before a Lion fly.
Good corn and wine in August merge in,
A month made happy by a Virgin.
September 23rd, inspect
If your bank Balance is correct.
When leaves in rich October fall,
Then Scorpions and insects crawl.
November's Archer stands to try
And shoot the meteors in the sky.
December crawls in tattered coat,
And shakes his gray beard like a Goat.

GENTLEMAN. "No, I'm really afraid I can not do myself the pleasure of dining with you to-day; but the fact is, I have some business belonging to my Ward which must be attended to."

LADY. "Oh, indeed! Your Ward! I did not know you had one. What is her name?"

GENTLEMAN. "Well, they do call it the Bloody Sixth; but I am afraid that is rather a libel upon our Boys."

COALS OF FIRE.

SMART YOUNG LADY. "Why am I like Balaam?"

ASTUTE GENTLEMAN. "I really can not conceive."

SMART YOUNG LADY. "Because you are speaking to me."

ASTUTE GENTLEMAN. "Yes, to be sure; and an Angel makes me speak!"
